SOCIALIST PARTY WANTS ELECTIONS IN APRIL 1983

AU131236 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 13 Jan 82 p 1

[Summary] Vienna (AZ) -- Following a decision of the Austrian Socialist Party [SPOE] National Executive Committee, Deputy SPOE Chairman Karl Blecha declared on 12 January that the next parliamentary elections will be held on schedule in the spring of 1983, and that this decision should put an end to all speculation about an earlier election date. Blecha named April 1983 as the date of the elections and declared that six months before an SPOE party congress would adopt an election platform and nominate the candidates. He added that Chancellor Kreisky would decide on his own candidacy in May this year.

KREISKY CRITICIZES ROLE OF CHURCH IN POLAND

[Fritz Pesater report on speech by Chancellor Kreisky, given at a meeting of the Council of Elders, an organization affiliated with the SPOE, in Vienna on 13 January -- Kreisky recorded remarks in quotation marks]

[Excerpts] In his report, in which he naturally also did not ignore the main domestic policy issues -- nuclear energy and the conference center -- Kreisky had very sharp words on the topic of Poland. The date was aptly chosen. Precisely 1 month after the proclamation of martial law in Poland, Chancellor Kreisky stated today before socialist pensioners why things in that communist state had to go the way they did. Even though he repeatedly compared the aspirations of the Polish workers with those of the Austrian Social Democrats in the thirties, Kreisky subsequently referred to a specifically Polish variant of the aspirations to more democracy. The dispossessed peasants had brought their traditional Catholic creed into their new enterprises, something which also explains the position of the church in Poland. Kreisky then critically stated this very position of the Catholic Church:

"These vast masses of Polish workers -- once put into motion -- in their helplessness first and foremost depended on the advice the Roman Catholic Church would give them. And the Roman Catholic Church cannot be blamed that it did not know how to give the best advice in such situations because, properly speaking, this is not what the church is for. The church has other tasks. And I saw this coming, how they shuttled from one place to another -- the bishops -- and how they continuously busied themselves and yet did not busy themsel es, how they assumed responsibilities and yet did not assume any responsibility." In addition, there existed radical currents among the workers and the trade unions which again and again wanted to display their power to the rulers. But there were no rulers who ruled, Kreisky said, and no government which governed. Another mistake of the Polish workers, according to Kreisky, was that: "People there cherished the illusion -- or they succumbed to the illusion -- that if only the Polish proletariat really strikes out for the big struggle -- this struggle will be responded to by the struggle of the workers in the other communist states."

The chancellor then examined the problem of how Austria and Austrian social democracy should respond to the situation in Poland. One of his answers was: "This is why socialists must demand that this regime release the people from the prisons, and that we will only begin to talk with it when it releases the people from the prisons."

The chancellor's rhetoric took him from Poland briefly to the United States where he reproached President Reagan's economic policy for prolonging the current world economic crisis.

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES NATION IN NEW YEAR'S SPEECH

LD311436 Hamburg DPA in German 0942 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Bonn, 31 Dec (DPA) -- The text of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's New Year's speech which will be transmitted today (Thursday evening) by both television companies:

On the last evening of the year many people will be making a very personal review of 1981. I should like to widen this look backwards and, with you, think about the challenges we have withstood, where we stand today and what new targets are set us for the new year. There is no doubt that 1981 was an exceptionally difficult year and a dark shadow which for several months, particularly in December, darkened the sky over East Europe does lie over this new year. I refer to the developments in Poland. I said in the Bundestag shortly before Christmas: My heart is on the side of the Polish workers.

The Bundestag itself unanimously affirmed its solidarity with the Polish people. It appealed to the military regime to let the Polish people resume and continue the process of renewal -- under its own initiative and without outside interference.

I take this opportunity to thank all those who, for example by giving donations and packages, are helping to alleviate the plight of the Poles. I ask you not to let up in this practical solidarity! Humanity, but also the common, more recent history of the Poles and the Germans calls on us to give aid of this kind. This is why we German taxpayers have helped Poland economically to a greater extent than other taxpayers elsewhere in the world.

If in 1982 despite everything there were to be violent outside interference in Poland, without doubt the peace of Europe as a whole would thereby be more greatly jeopardized than it was in 1980 as a result of the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan which still continues. The Soviet leadership knows this. It also knows that the states of the European Community and of the Atlantic alliance will stay firmly and determinedly together when threatened. Herein lie the roots of the security of our peace and also of the security of Berlin.

In the new year, too, we can rely on this. Our allies can rely on us. We Germans in 1982 will make our political contribution, our financial contribution and -- by means of our Bundeswehr -- our defense contribution to the common welfare. The neutral states of Europe in the north, east, west and in Central Europe which are dependent on equilibrium are also relying on this. Relying on this are even communist governments and many millions of people in East Europe.

In 1981 there was a change in the heads of state in two of the most important, friendly countries for us. Since then the close and friendly German-French relations have been further consolidated in numerous trusting talks between President Francois Mitterrand and myself. On several occasions I have had an intensive exchange of ideas with new U.S. President Ronald Reagan. I am looking forward to the next meeting with President Reagan next week. Of course, peace has not only an East-West but also a North-South dimension. Therefore, despite our own economic difficulties, we are contributing to the welfare of the developing countries.

Many of us, above all young people, think that they cannot rest because the world in a variety of ways is not in order. Some seek a way out through uncompromising attitudes, through abandoning tolerance, through absolute moral claims. Some even seek a way out in violence. I do not think this is a reason to panic. I condemn pessimism. It threatens inner tranquility. But I say quite clearly that the strength of our democracy lies in our -- externally and domestically -- not being dependent on a policy of strength or violence. We persistently adhere to the dictate of tolerance. We seek to balance out conflicting forces peacefully. Nor do we intend getting confused about this in the new year.

In the desire for tolerance and dialogue, in the desire for compromise and balance, in the passionate desire for reason anyone gripped by fear or dread cannot be shaken.

I, too, feared at times in 1980 and 1981 that the dialogue between the world powers could fall victim to a new arms race. That is why we persistently campaigned in East and West for a disarmament dialogue. We have achieved an important partial success: Since the beginning of November, the two world powers have been at the negotiating table in Geneva in order to bring nuclear medium-range missile arming under control. These are weapons which could extinguish us and all Europeans! That is why we remain firm: The best thing would be for both sides to reduce them to zero. We do not want to overestimate ourselves, but we will use our full weight in 1982 as well to bring about moderation and restraint in international relations.

An important stage along this road was the visit by General Secretary Brezhnev at the end of November. During this, I naturally put forward unequivocally the Western alliance's common standpoint. This was done, however, in a discussion atmosphere characterized by the common war experience of Mr Brezhnev and myself and the will that these horrors should never again be allowed to recur. This same basic conviction also characterized my discussion with General Secretary Honecker. It resulted from the special German responsibility toward peace. After a phase of setbacks in German-German relations, it was important to give a sign to encourage the Germans here and in the GDR and to work towards a future of reasonable good-neighborly relations.

Peace and a stable economy: these were our main concerns in 1981. They will continue to be so in 1982 also. Unemployment has become the main challenge. I know that many of you are affected by it. I know how many of you, although content at present, are concerned about the future. Every country in the world -- including the East, also the Third World in the South -- is severely affected by the world economic crisis.

Finally, ladies and gentlemen, 1981 has been a difficult year for us. But our peace has been preserved. We ourselves -- as consumers, employees, employers and self-employed -- have both politically and economically maintained our reason and our will to perform. That is why we have reason for self-confidence in 1982. I wish us self-confidence, I wish us equanimity and optimism. We would have a lot to lose otherwise. But with active good sense we have much to gain! In this spirit, I wish us all a happy new year.

CHANCELLOR INTERVIEWED ON POLISH EVENTS

DW311055 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2130 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Lothar Loewe interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Florida on 30 December -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] What is your opinion about the U.S. sanctions? Do you think they will be effective?

[Answer] It is a gesture and an expression of deep concern, even anger. We have experienced economic and other sanctions on various occasions during the past few years. Even the originators themselves surely do not assess the effectiveness as being of a world-changing nature. Just the same, they express a specific attitude which imprints itself not only on public awareness but also on the awareness of those against whom they are directed. To this extent they are politically significant indeed.

[Question] Don't you think that the reaction to what has happened could have been harsher at least in some circles, for example, on the part of the Young Socialists or of your party chairman, Mr Brandt?

[Answer] No, I do not think so. Although there are such voices here in the United States -- I also read a newspaper commentary -- the speakers quite obviously failed to read the nearly unanimous resolution of the German Bundestag of 18 December which really leaves nothing to be desired with respect to clarity and detail. I have not read such a resolution by any other parliament in the world. What people have particularly failed to note is how I, in talking before the Bundestag, prior to this resolution, made it absolutely clear that I am on the side of the workers with all my heart. I do not think much of repeating such statements every week. This is verbalism, idle talk; this will not change the world.

One of the essential criteria for acting or not acting is the assessment of the situation in Poland by the Roman Catholic Church there and by the Holy See in Rome. The Roman Catholic Church is a fully intact organization in Poland, with branches all over the country. Surely it can easily form a judgement. We heed this judgement to a great degree, and so far we have been following this judgement in our own assessment of the situation and in our deportment.

As far as ostpolitik beyond Poland is concerned, it has been in difficult situations more often than not over the past 12 years -- this term ostpolitik has been in use only since these 12 years -- as has our policy toward the West, Mr Loewe. And it is a very great success that the USSR and the United States are now negotiating at long last in Geneva on the reduction of their medium-range weapons. Let us please not forget this during the present press disputes over whether or not the West is loud enough about Poland. These negotiations really should not be given up in connection with all the contemplations on what the West might perhaps put into action regarding Poland. This highly important partial success of ostpolitik should not be ignored over all these things. It is necessary to keep in mind that it is vitally important for the Germans but also for the Poles, Russians and the many people in Europe that these medium-range missiles be reduced to as low a balance as possible, best of all to zero.

[Question] You do not expect the United States to call off the negotiations in Geneva in the event martial law continues for an extended period of time?

[Answer] No, I do not expect them to do that; and I would be against that.

GENSCHER EXPECTS CONTINUATION OF POLISH REFORM

[Excerpt] Bonn, 4 Jan (DPA) -- The Federal Government expects clearer signs from the Polish leadership of a continuation of the policy of reform and renewal. In an interview on West German Radio today, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher confirmed that such signs would make it easier for West Europe and above all for the United States to pursue a policy of restraint. The leadership in Warsaw had to realize "that we want to see deeds as well as words."

Genscher said that the Polish head of government, General Wojciech Jaruzelski, had in the meantime replied to Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's letter of 26 December, in which Schmidt has also asked for signs from Warsaw. Bonn wanted to make Jaruzelski's answer, which was currently being assessed, a central element in the talks at the EEC foreign ministers conference in Brussels and with the U.S. Government.

Genscher stressed that the Federal Government was in agreement with the United States and with the partners in the EEC that three aims should be achieved in Poland. The dialogue between the Warsaw leadership and the Catholic Church and the trade union Solidarity had to be resumed, the internees must be released and martial law ended. These aims had to be the focus of the discussion in Brussels and of the German-U.S. talks in Washington and every step had to be evaluated according to the extent to which it helped achieve these aims. Genscher added that he was in no doubt that the U.S. Government, which saw the three aims in the same way as Bonn, would be open to an objective discussion. Genscher said that in the last few days many people had spoken too much about the alleged or supposed differences in the Western camp and had thought too little about how the Polish people could be helped.

BUNDESTAG OFFICIAL URGES WESTERN SOLIDARITY

[Text] Hamburg, 3 Jan (DPA) -- Rainer Barzel, chairman of the Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee, has expressed his dismay at the fact that martial law is still in force in Poland in an interview with BILD-ZEITUNG. Barzel said that the Poles had been given 14 days' grace which, however, had not been used. The EEC foreign ministers would thus have to take a hard line at their meeting tomorrow. The West must at last show some solidarity and force Poland by concerted efforts to return to the path of reform. For his part, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt had to declare at his meeting with the U.S. President his willingness to participate in the West's sanctions.

WISCHNEWSKI OPPOSES 'PENAL SANCTIONS' ON WARSAW

[Text] Mainz, 2 Jan (DPA) -- SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, in connection with events in Poland, has spoken out against "penal sanctions." In an interview for the Mainz ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG (Saturday edition), Wischnewski said anyone "calling for or imposing sanctions at an inopportune moment risks closing the doors, and [remainder of sentence indistinct]."

Therefore, the talks with Polish Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski had been useful since they had been open and informative for both sides, Wischnewski emphasized. Rakowski had been left in no doubt that Bonn, at the price of future sensible cooperation, would insist on the demand that the course of reforms and renewal in Poland be resumed.

An (?edited) version of the interview was prereleased to DPA on Friday.

SPD OFFICIAL OPPOSED TO SANCTIONS AGAINST POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 2 Jan (DPA) -- Peter Glotz, SPD Federal Manager, has spoken out in favor of a cautious and considered policy toward Poland, while at the same time rejecting sanctions against Poland. Glotz, speaking on Southwest Radio, said it is wrong, through sanctions, to drive Poland into a situation which would make impossible any national dialogue between the Solidarity trade union, the Catholic Church and the authorities. It is also wrong to destroy the chance of concrete disarmament negotiations between East and West at a time of great outrage over human rights violations in Poland, Glotz said. For the sake of one moment's display of moral rectitude we would have to accept years of a markedly increased risk of war.

Statements made not only in the United States but also in Europe calling for measures against Poland are countered by Glotz with a quotation from German sociologist Max Weber, who in 1919 said that any politician pursuing nothing but power politics might appear strong, but his actions are in fact empty and senseless.

CDU OFFICIAL ENDORSES U.S. SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR

[Text] Hamburg, 2 Jan (DPA) -- Schleswig-Holstein Minister President Gerhard Stoltenberg (CDU), in connection with the situation in Poland, has made a point of endorsing U.S. sanctions against the Soviet Union. In an interview for the magazine QUICK, the CDU politician also said that the Federal Government and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt had "totally misjudged" the situation in Poland and the whole Eastern bloc.

Precisely calculated economic and political steps by the United States indicated to the Soviet Union that it no longer had a passport for acts of violence and repressive measures against other peoples. Although it would be more impressive if the Western alliance showed an undivided line, without the U.S. signal, the danger of wars at a regional level to begin with would soon be substantially greater and not smaller, the CDU deputy chairman said. A change for the better in Poland would result only from an economic cure, not the "moral insight of the communist power apparatus."

The millions given to Poland are, in view of the mistaken assessment of the political situation, a misguided investment. A number of credit institutes are quite rightly upset. Only 2 years ago Schmidt had praised the then Polish party chief, Edward Gierek, as one of the most significant European politicians. Today, Gierek is considered in both East and West as the man who, through his totally unsuccessful economic policy, took Poland to the brink of the abyss.

The text of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

EFFECTS OF SANCTIONS ON PIPELINE DEAL VIEWED

DW301203 Bonn DIE WELT in German 30 Dec 81 p 2

[Hans Baumann article: "Russian Gas Also Without American Technology"]

[Excerpt] Essen -- The oil sector says that it will be possible to tell how serious Reagan is by whether or not he puts drilling equipment on the list of items embargoed to the USSR. "Hardly well-considered" is how European quarters term the U.S. contemplations of also prohibiting the delivery of pipes to the Soviet Union for the construction of the 5,000-km pipeline from Western Siberia to West Europe. On the one hand, they point out that the Soviet Union itself is the world's largest pipe producer and that the planned imports of 6 million tons during the next 4 years will come from Japan, the Federal Republic, France and Italy. Getting these diversified sources of supply to act together is termed "extremely difficult."

It is pointed out, moreover, that Russian gas can be exploited without U.S. drilling technology because it is easily available. A pipe embargo, it is argued, releases to the Soviets quantities of gas which have already been tied up contractually for West European states. The Soviets might use this gas in the event of an embargo to compensate for reduced oil supplies if oil drilling equipment from the United States fails to arrive. West European observers, therefore, draw the following conclusion: If an embargo on pipes is imposed, an embargo on drilling equipment would be largely abortive.

GENSCHER TO PARTICIPATE IN SCHMIDT-REAGAN TALKS

[Text] Bonn, 3 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher will take part in the visit of Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to Washington which starts tomorrow evening. According to a statement by the Foreign Ministry today, Genscher was asked to do this by the chancellor, who is at present in Florida on holiday. Schmidt had been considering this since Christmas.

The visit to Washington, in which talks with President Ronald Reagan and other members of the U.S. Government -- above all on the subject of Poland -- are on the agenda, was prepared over the last few days by several telephone calls between Schmidt and Genscher, according to the Foreign Ministry. Genscher will leave for Washington tomorrow immediately after the EEC foreign ministers' conference in Brussels.

It is rumored that the visit to Bonn of Polish Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski and the EEC foreign ministers' conference played a part in the decision to have Genscher take part. The Foreign Ministry has also announced that the German ambassador in Warsaw will see Deputy Premier Rakowski and Foreign Minister Jozef Czyrek with a message from Genscher. No details have been given.

MORE DETAILS OF POLISH DEPUTY PREMIER'S VISIT

Genscher Interviewed

[Unidentified reporter interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Is the imposition of martial law an autonomous Polish decision or one forced on Poland by Moscow? There is a difference in assessment -- to quote the Federal Government spokesman -- between the Federal Government and the U.S. administration. Has it been clarified which of these assessments is correct?

[Answer] I believe that no Warsaw Pact country can make decisions without considering the framework within which it pursues its policy. Even so there is still room left for a country's own decision-making.

[Question] But the question is what the principal conditions were.

[Answer] Well, this will be known only to the one who made the decision.

[Question] Do you think that following today's talks the situation in Poland will improve?

[Answer] The expectations which I expressed are aimed at an improvement. I do not want to judge at this time what the conclusions, consequences and reactions of the Polish leadership will be, but surely they will take quite seriously what we said here. I repeat: We are talking not only on our own behalf but also on behalf of the Bundestag and of our partners and allies.

[Text] Cologne, 31 Dec (DPA) -- Poland intends paying the interest it owes on its loans from the West. Following a talk with the deputy Polish premier, Mieczyslaw Rakowski, the president of the Association of German Chambers of Industry and Commerce (DIHT), Otto Wolff von Amerongen, today confirmed in a DPA interview that the first payments were made on 24 December. The total of the amount paid so far is not certain. One of the major Polish financial problems of late was its inability to pay the interest due by the end of the year, which is approximately $350 million. Von Amerongen stated that during this one talk on economic policy -- which Rakowski had requested in Bonn on Wednesday during his short visit to Bonn -- the Polish desire for confidence-building had become clear. The DIHT president, who received the Polish Government official at his home in Cologne, strongly underlined that both for and in Poland [as received -- dass fur und in Polen], not only the trust of the lending banks, but the credit worthiness of the entire CEMA bloc is at stake.

[Text] Bonn, 31 Dec (DPA) -- After his talks with Polish Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today again underlined the need for Poland to return as soon as possible to a policy of reform. In the opinion of Otto Wolff von Amerongen, president of the Association of German Chambers of Industry and Commerce [DIHT], who received Rakowski before he flew back to Warsaw on Thursday morning, the Polish politician saw the main aim of his visit to Bonn was to build confidence Rakowski had "solemnly" [feierlich] assured that martial law would again be lifted, though without giving any time limits.

In an initial review of the Rakowski talks, Genscher today underlined in a Deutschlandfunk interview again the West's three main demands: first, dialogue with the Catholic Church and the Solidarity trade union; second, release of the prisoners, and third, an end to martial law.

Before the visit Genscher had made clear that the West at most could wait just a few weeks for a definite signal from the Polish Government. Genscher warned against a quarrel in the Western camp over the causes of the present situation in Poland. The West would present a "pitiful picture" were it to have a falling out now. With regard to the open difference of opinion between Bonn and Washington, the starting point had to be a joint aim and this consisted of restoring the policy of reform in Poland.

Opportunities for agreement exist at the meeting of the EC foreign ministers in Brussels on Monday and during Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's vist to Washington on Tuesday. Genscher underlined that the joint Western attitude "on our side always will and has to be conduct characterized by noninterference in Polish affairs."

"Of course, that cannot last forever," replied Rakowski today after his talks with Otto Wolff von Amerongen when asked by a journalist whether Poland would again lift martial law. Rakowski could not say when this would be possible. The Polish leadership was "fully aware of the fact that a continuation of martial law cannot create incentives for cooperation with Poland," said Von Amerongen after the talk.

Von Amerongen emphasized the resumption of Polish interest repayments which had been made again 24 December. The DIHT president was critical of the U.S. economic sanctions. The West should carry out an exact cost-benefit analysis to see whether the negative effects of such sanctions -- in the Western alliance too -- were not greater than the alleged benefit.

Rakowski had given a report on his country's political and economic situation and here emphasized that coal production in the upper Silesian mining area had risen again during the past 10 days. Von Amerongen drew the Polish deputy premier's attention to the fact that solving the Polish problems was decisive for the credit worthiness of the entire East bloc economic system.

Rakowski, who was the first Polish Government official to make a trip abroad since the imposition of martial law 13 December and who spoke on Wednesday with Federal Foreign Minister Genscher and the representatives of the government coalition as well as with the opposition, returned to Warsaw at lunchtime Thursday.

BONN, E. BERLIN REPORTEDLY EXCHANGE AGENTS

LD311250 Hamburg DPA in German 1208 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Text] Berlin, 31 Dec (DPA) -- Bonn and East Berlin are said to have exchanged agents on 15 December. The BERLINER MORGENPOST reports in its New Year's edition that, apparently still in connection with the release of the spy in the chancellor's office, Guenter Guillaume, the Federal Republic released seven GDR agents and the GDR released three Federal Intelligence Service employees.

PRESS COMMENTS ON WESTERN REACTION TO POLAND

DW311223 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Press Review]

[Text] Commanding the foreground of editorial comment again today are developments in and around Poland. To begin with, the Duesseldorf RHEINISCHE POST discusses the different reactions in the West: It is truly shameful how the free West quarrels over the measures which would be the best answer to the dictatorship in Poland. Since the summer of 1980, people in Western state chancelleries have been secretly pondering the options for D-day -- the intervention of the Warsaw Pact true to the Brezhnev doctrine of the limited sovereignty of socialist countries. Now that Polish instead of Soviet tanks are rolling through the streets of Warsaw and Katowice, the differences of judgement in our own camp have intensified to an open quarrel.

LUBECKER NACHRICHTEN states: The disunity of the West is proverbial. The quarrel over the question of who is really responsible for the measures of oppression in Poland no doubt is purely academic. In any event it is the Soviet Union which profits from this quarrel and which even does not need to send its own troops marching.

In this connection FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU declares: The whole truth is that nobody in the world can help the Poles by force because this would plunge the world into war. The Soviet Union quite definitely will not put up with a change of system in its European glacis. This is the actual tragedy of Poland. Seeing such interconnections, however, by far does not yet mean forgiving everything or tolerating without uttering a word. Saber rattling is just as dangerous to peace as is fearful silence for reasons of political strategy. The men in the Kremlin must be made to feel unequivocal moral condemnation. Steadfastness, too, is part of detente policy.

Discussing the U.S. sanctions against the Soviet Union and the attitude of the Federal Republic, BERLINER MORGENPOST writes: President Reagan has acted, and Moscow reacts like the offended innocent: The U.S. sanctions are unprecedented and an unacceptable violation of valid international practice. Reagan's action is unprecedented indeed. For the first time the sights were set on East European reality through a camouflage screen--a reality which violates international law. The fact that Moscow decided against using its own army allows Bonn to pretend a naivete of which neither Schmidt nor Genscher can be accused. The U.S. world power, however, has decided to quit going along with this game. Hence Moscow's outrage as well as the uneasiness in West European state chancelleries. Nothing proves more evidently how our continent depends on the alliance with the United States and its protection than does the freeze of Europe under the mesmerizing snake stare of Moscow. However, one is disinclined to admit this and thus demonstrates an independent spirit in a misguided frontline position. This was BERLINER MORGENPOST.

The Oldenburg NORDWEST-ZEITUNG stresses the following point: The arrogant harshness with which Government Spokesman Becker on instructions of the Florida-vacationing chancellor adopted a position opposite to that of the United States Wednesday makes us feel extremely alarmed. Becker not only failed to show any understanding for the U.S. reaction to the policy pursued in Poland but even ignored the fact that the Western formula of strict nonintrusion, which he keeps repeating, is taken as a carte blanche. If Bonn for reasons worth pondering refuses to follow the U.S. sanction example, then the Federal Government should at least desist from doing anything that might arouse the impression in the Kremlin that the Soviet Union is being well-understood in Bonn.

Next is the STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN: Paris, London, Stockholm, Washington, and even communist parties in Western countries are agreed in an assessment: It was only as a result of the massive Soviet pressure that the military leaders in Poland were compelled to seize power. All in the West denounce this, only Bonn allegedly is wiser. It lets its government spokesman declare that one does not believe in a Soviet instigating role. We cannot but ask: What kind of government is this which, for sheer thinking in terms of detente, closes its eyes to truths and quibbles at them. The end might be a self-imposed isolation in the Western camp supported by prejudice against the Germans which is latent anyway. This cannot in any way be in our interest, the editorial of STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN says.

The Hanover ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG advocates a different view: As long as the hope is not abandoned for good that a development in Poland is possible with the cooperation of an independent -- though no longer completely free -- trade union, the Federal Government has good reason indeed not to adopt the U.S. policy unconditionally. But this plunges it into a dilemma whose dimension must not be belittled. What is threatening is an alienation between the United States and ourselves which some day might jeopardize the bases of our democratic existence.

KOLNER STADT-ANZEIGER observes: The Federal Government must have substantial reasons to assume that General Jaruzelski will relax the grip of his military regime soon and clearly. There is no other way to interpret the determination with which Bonn has repudiated the latest measures by the United States against the Soviet Union. Without any such reason the Federal Government would be veritably foolhardy.

SUEDDFUTSCHE ZEITUNG draws the following conclusions: Obvious contradictions are inherent in Bonn's policy. On the one hand, the Federal Government proposes to stick to the policy of nonintrusion, but on the other, it demands signals of a speedy change from Warsaw, for example concerning a mitigation of the martial law. Does it not begin to wonder why Warsaw and Moscow do not deem this an intrusion and why Polish Deputy Premier Rakowski hurries to convey signals? We may rest assured that the United States, but also some Europeans, will not overlook this and that the value of Rakowski as state's evidence for Bonn's policy will suffer from this. The doubts about Bonn's predictability will grow, and thus these doubts will affect a value which the chancellor especially assesses so highly. Whatever Rakowski can bring along will not be sufficient for making Bonn more credible or for winning the West over for its course. It is regrettable that the Federal Government, in its efforts to avoid harmful overreactions, has harmed itself by blindness and clumsiness. This was SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG.

BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG also discusses the Rakowski visit and writes, among other things: In this situation Bonn is running the risk of becoming the contact point of the East not only for the sake of mediating but also for breaking up the North Atlantic alliance at its weakest point. Rakowski's blitz visit to the Rhine indicates this function intended for Bonn, as did Brezhnev's Bonn visit and Schmidt's trip to the GDR earlier. Bonn should beware of this function, however.

In this connection NURNBERGER NACHRICHTEN stresses: Just the same, the calmness with which the Federal Government sticks to its position even after Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher's talk with Polish Deputy Premier Rakowski, is striking. So far nobody knows in detail what explanations or promises the high-ranking guest from Warsaw gave in Bonn. But it is more than just mere conjecture that Rakowski did not come to the Rhine to split up the West -- as CSU Deputy Graf Huyn suspects -- but to extend a hand which should not be ignored.

In conclusion a quotation from FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE which, in a fundamental foreign policy assessment, among other things raises the following question: In what shape is a political leadership which ties itself and its citizens with shackles of a good behavior, adorning these shackles with quasi-moral commandments such as: the Germans have no right to play judge over Poland, or, they must not disturb the situation? Instead of encouraging the FRG citizens, its leaders make them afraid of war. In this way the Federal Republic, and, along with it, some other parts of West Europe, keeps sliding constantly deeper into a policy of appeasement. And nobody having any authority tells the scared people, as Churchill told the British people in 1940, that they have nothing to fear except their own anxieties and egoism.

RESETTLERS STATISTICS -- Bonn, 31 Dec (DPA) -- About 70,000 resettlers from East and southeast European countries have been registered this year in the Federal Republic. Federal Interior Minister Gerhart Baum announced in Bonn today that this is the highest number of resettlers since 1958. Last year 52,071 resettlers came to the Federal Republic. In 1979 the figure was 54,887. Altogether, more than 1.1 million resettlers have been registered since 1950. [Excerpt] [Hamburg DPA in German 1051 GMT 30 Dec 81 LD]

MITTERRAND VIEWS 'POLISH DRAMA' IN SPEECH

LD312050 Paris Domestic Service in French 1900 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Excerpts] French men and women from France and from the overseas territories, I wish you a good year and, on your behalf, I wish France a good year.

Outside France, dangers are piling up. A country like France has known for more than 1,000 years that history belongs to the brave peoples who nourish the sacred love for the homeland. That is why, within the framework of our alliance, we must ensure ourselves our defense and that is what I did by ordering the construction of a seventh nuclear submarine and by defining the strategy of our armies. However, our choice is that of peace, of disarmament, of collective security so that peace should triumph, and it must triumph. The balance of power of the two great powers which dominate the world must be maintained. At the same time, it is equally dangerous that the two powers of which I am talking should be able to coexist through a division of Europe lasting almost 40 years. Anything that would allow us to move away from Yalta would be welcome, on condition that we never confuse what we want with the reality of today. The Polish drama is part of this contradiction. There is no stronger solidarity than that which unites us with the people of Poland. Let us prove it by rejecting the system which oppresses them and the domination which it begets, by defending their rights and freedoms and their legitimate desire to live in independence, and let us learn to cope with the slow pace of history.

Other objectives during 1982 will mainly be to give the European Community of the Ten a political desire and to make the voice of France heard among the peoples of the Third World. To that effect, one must stress that if there are stronger and richer countries than ours, there is none that is heard so widely. This is purely and simply because we have incessantly stated that the struggle against poverty and famine is linked with a new world monetary system and with the support of adequate prices for the raw materials on which the fate of the poorest countries depends.

I was happy to see 33 African countries represented in Paris at the end of the year. They came here to discuss with us in all trust and to see that the voice of France is identified with that of freedom. May hope and determination inspire our action. Long live the republic. Long live France.

COMMUNIST MINISTER ANALYZES POLISH SITUATION

[Text] The minister of the civil service spoke at length last night about Poland. He was appearing on television as the guest of Antenne-2. Mr Anicet Le Pors regretted the limitation placed on freedom in that country. His stance was very political since he is one of the four Communist ministers in the government. Listen to his analysis of the situation:

[Begin Le Pors recording] The measures which have been taken within the framework of the state of emergency that has been created are a brake, and for my part I hope that this is something quite temporary and that the great movement forward which has impelled the Polish people toward more democracy may continue. And this is something that must be affirmed; socialism is something that cannot be decreed. There must be no givers of lessons in the matter. Socialism must be built in each country, having regard to the world as it is, in its extreme diversity, that is to say, it is up to the French to build socialism in France and to the Poles to build socialism in Poland without external interference.

Democracy must resume its march in Poland, and this state of emergency must really be no more than an unhappy memory. [end recording]

You heard him: There must be no givers of lessons, Anicet Le Pors said. It was maybe a reply to Yves Montand. Yesterday on France-Inter the singer displayed his anger against Georges Marchais by accusing him of supporting -- and we quote him -- the Pinochets of Moscow and of Central Europe.

PHILOSOPHER CLAIMS PRAGUE FRAMEUP, BRUTALITY

[Text] Paris, 2 Jan (AFP) -- French philosopher Jacques Derrida arrived here today by train from Prague where he was detained three days on what he alleged was a trumped up drugs charge. Mr Derrida was arrested by Czech authorities last Monday while attending an unofficial seminar organised by a leading Czech dissident, philosopher Ladislav Hedjanek, former spokesman for the Charter 77 human rights movement.

According to Mr Derrida drugs were planted in his suitcase while he was out of his hotel room. The pholosopher, released yesterday, said on his arrival here that his detention was a "machination designed to intimidate intellectuals wishing to bring support to the Charter 77 movement". He said he had been "brutally" interrogated for more than six hours.

The seminars, organized by Czechoslovak philosopher Ladislav Hedjanek, a former spokesman of the Charter 77 human rights movement, were generally tolerated by authorities on the implicit condition that they take place without publicity and that they be limited to discussion of philosophy. In 1980, the year the seminars began, some of their participants were kept under surveillance and some foreigners invited to take part were escorted out of the country. But more direct action seemed to coincide with the declaration of martial law in neighboring Poland last month. After the crackdown began there on December 13, several seminar participants, including Mr Hedjanek, were apprehended, and a reliable source said pressure was placed on Mr Hedjanek to stop the meetings. The release of Mr Derrida, 51, who faced two years of detention on the drug charge, was seen as a direct result of strong pressure from the French Government.

L'HUMANITE HITS EFFORTS TO INCITE POLES

[Text] Six dead and 150 wounded, but that's in Salisbury. Ten dead and 15 injured, but that's in Beirut. Eight killed, but that's in Guatemala. Another 175 killed, but that's in El Salvador.

These tragic pieces of news, all received within the last 48 hours, scarcely affect the television, radio or press commentators. Should a human life count for less under other skies than in Europe? I quite understand that the events in Poland affect us more than others, not just because of geographic proximity but also because of the numerous ties which have been woven between that country and our own over the course of centuries. We at L'HUMANITE believe it our duty to spend longer dealing with the Polish crisis than with the bloody trials imposed on the peoples of other continents. But at least let us not skim over the latter. How can we believe in the sincerity of the feelings proclaimed so loudly for Poland by people who persist in wanting to ignore the massacres for which imperialism is responsible?

The events in Poland overwhelm us. For others they are primarily a pretext for political exploitation. That is why they are bent on predicting the bloodbath or even Soviet intervention. "Risk of Trial of Strength Today" was the headline in LE FIGARO on Saturday morning. While LE MATIN's headline read that in Moscow, "The Leaders of the Eastern Countries are Deciding Poland's Fate."

Pending more information, the Poles' fate is being decided not in the Kremlin but in Warsaw. And on Saturday, despite the wishes of the prophets of doom, the irreparable did not happen. But in the evening the cameras of French television channel 1 found a Polish immigrant and lingered over him because he was shouting: "We must hit back! Hit back!" News is manipulated, people stop at no falsification to fan hatreds, incite the Poles to the worst adventures and urge them on to cold war.

The Bonn correspondents of several French newspapers go so far as to lament through their columns the FRG's relative restraint. As if we should yearn for the time when Germany interfered -- and how! -- in the affairs of Poland.... We must, on the contrary hope with the Socialist International that "the Polish people will be able to resolve their problems without outside interference and without a bloodbath." The Socialist International moreover says that it is "conscious that unsolicited advice or harshly worded statements will not help the people of Poland."

We are convinced that associating with demonstrations such as the strike advocated in our country for the end of this morning does not help the Poles either. When you see LE FIGARO write that this strike "should have broad support" and when you know the arrangements made by certain bosses to promote it, how is it possible not to feel at least some distrust regarding such an order? French workers and teachers know only too well how churlishly the Hersant press normally combats the legitimate struggles in which they engage. With their disorganized economy, the shortages they are suffering and the constraints resulting from the state of emergency, the Poles are experiencing a distressing time. To incite violence and urge them on toward murderous confrontation is to want to condemn Poland to agony.

This is, in fact, the secret hope of those who are speculating on the drama in order to break the union of the left in France and to ruin detente in the world. It is important for Poland and also in the interest of our country and of peace to secure, on the contrary, an easing of tension. Such possibilities seem to be emerging in Warsaw. Though very small and precarious, they will depend on the end of the state of emergency, the lifting of the internment measures it has involved, the resumption of dialogue among the Polish national forces and the revival of the economic, social and democratic reforms which Poland needs. The hope of peace must not be spoiled.

DETAILS OF TERRORIST PRISON BREAK PROVIDED

[Text] Rovigo, 4 Jan (ANSA) -- Massive police dragnets, road-blocks and searches were in force yet again in northeastern Italy this morning as the search started for four women urban guerillas who broke out from Rovigo jail in a text-book operation Sunday afternoon. The quartet, all belonging to the Prime Linea (Front Line) organisation fled from the penitentiary in the center of this town over fifty kilometers southwest of Venice with the aid of an external commando, explosive, and fast getaway cars. The four were identified as Susanna Ronconi, 30, Marina Premoli, 33, Federica Meroni, 25, and Loredana Biancamano, 25.

The general area is that of Verona where the Red Brigades kidnapped U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier, deputy commander of NATO land forces in southern Europe, on December 17, holding him in a "people's prison" that police have so far had little luck in tracking down.

The four Prime Linea members escaped from the prison through a breach opened in an outside wall, four-bricks-thick, by a massive explosive charge. The blast killed a carpenter, 64-year-old Angelo Furlan, who was walking his dog nearby, and left another six persons with light injuries after the shock-wave swept through homes in the immediate vicinity.

The whole escape was planned down to the last detail and, according to the version made available by police sources here, was over in a few minutes. It was 1540 local (1440 GMT) when the four urban guerillas, who were out of their cells for the regulation one hour of fresh air in the prison courtyard, immobilized prison warder Mirella Piva. In this way, they took possession of her keys and managed to gain access to an internal gate leading to an unutilized part of the jail abutting onto the outside wall. Almost simultaneously, an urban guerilla unit of possibly three persons in all started shooting .9 caliber [as received] submachine guns at the wardens in the guard turrets. At the same time, an explosive charge, thought to consist of a large amount of TNT packed between the prison wall and a parked car, was set off, opening up the breach of about a meter and a half across. The four detainees emerged from the breach, so the official version of events goes, and ran to two high-powered cars with Milanese license-plates as the external unit continued shooting at the prison guards.

The exact number of urban guerillas involved is not known, but first hypotheses put them a at a total of six or seven. The day and time of the escape were chosen with particular care, police sources pointed out. Most of the local police were concentrated on the town's two sports stadiums for a major rugby match and a second division soccer match.

Susanna Ronconi, born in Venice on June 29, 1951, was arrested in Florence on December 1, 1980, as a result of state's evidence turned by former urban guerilla Michele Viscardi. She originally belonged to the Red Brigades and, in 1976, was one of the commandos which managed to free Red Brigades founder Renato Curcio from prison in Casale Monferrato. She subsequently passed to Prima Linea. Marina Premoli, a former literature teacher born in Genoa in 1948, was arrested near Biella in northern Italy on the basis of testimony of another "repentant" urban guerilla, 22-year-old Paolo Fogagnolo. Federica Meroni, born in Milan on March 12, 1956, is a former nurse who was arrested in Naples on December 20, 1980, after a shootout with political bureau police from Naples and Turin. She had no police record. Loredana Biancamano was born at Cosenza in southern Italy on April 9, 1956. She holds a degree in biology. She was arrested in Naples on December 18, 1977, in a Red Brigades hideout.

NATO SAID NOT TOLD OF TERRORIST THREAT REPORT

AU311548 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Text] Rome, 31 Dec (ANSA) -- Italy's Interior Ministry distributed a "secret information bulletin" last December 5 addressed to "all police stations" in Italian cities with residing NATO headquarters to warn about possible terrorist offensives against the American military, according to a revelation contained in the coming week's issue of Italian news weekly L'EUROPEO. According to the L'EUROPEO article, "the Carabinieri police commands authorized to provide security for NATO bases repeatedly maintained that the American military had been warned" about the possible offensive. In an article reviewing the December 17 kidnapping of U.S. General James Lee Dozier, the second in command at NATO land forces for southern Europe headquarters in Italy's northern city of Verona, the newsweekly writers claim that "everyone knew except NATO" that the Red Brigades were planning to hit high officials of the Atlantic alliance organization.

Questioned about the magazine report, officials from the Italian Interior Ministry and representatives of the Carabinieri police force replied with a terse "No comment" to the information contained in a pre-publication release by the magazine.

Dozier Secondary Target

[Text] Verona, 4 Jan (ANSA) -- The Red Brigades fell back on kidnapping U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier here on December 17 [when they] found it would be too difficult to nab another U.S. general, Wilson C. Cooney, deputy commander of NATO's Fifth ATAF, the group which coordinates all the allied air units in southern Europe, according to unconfirmed reports circulating here. Leaks said yesterday that the photokit of young man who used a pretext to ring the doorbell at Cooney's home in nearby Vicenza only a fortnight before the Dozier abduction apparently corresponds to the person who hired a minibus used in the Dozier nab from a Milan agency only a few day previously.

After realising that the deputy commander of the Fifth ATAF, whose headquarters is in Vicenza just east of Verona, was beyond their reach, the Red Brigades apparently fell back on Dozier as an officer who was equally important, but less heavily guarded, the leaks said. According to other reports in circles near the investigators, they now believe, though it is not known on what basis, the mini-bus which the Red Brigades used to flee, rather than the one found abandoned shortly after the kidnap, also served as a "mobile observatory." This theory claims that the van was brought into action to follow the brigadier-general's movements and inside it there is also a photographic laboratory for printing up snapshots of the prisoner in captivity.

In other developments, Dozier's wife, Judith, has asked to be submitted to hypnosis because she believes convinced [as received] that her subconcious still holds images and sensations related to the kidnap, but will not yield them up in normal states of consciousness, it was learned here Sunday. Mrs Dozier was in fact at home when the Red Brigades came to kidnap her husband. She was gagged and bound to a chair and only managed to give the alarm some four hours after the brigadier-general had been carted off in a trunk.

Meanwhile, a spokesman at the headquarters of the allied land forces in southern Europe, where Dozier was second-in-command, confirmed at the weekend that friends of the kidnapped man are offering two billion lire (about 1.7 million dollars) for information leading to his release. Reporters have so far been unable to identify the "friends" financing the fund. Verona's prefect told them, however, that "institutional organs of Italy or the United States are apparently not behind the 'friends.'"

PERTINI SPEECH STRESSES FORIEGN TERRORISM LINK

[Text] Rome, 31 Dec (ANSA) -- Italy's President Sandro Pertini spoke [words indistinct] combination of war, hunger, oppression and terrorism. In his traditional end-of-the-year television message to the nation he also reiterated his confidence in the ability of the Italian people to overcome all of the ills besetting them. The 85-year-old head-of-state delivered the speech in his usual forthright and heartfelt manner. His first thought was for the Polish people, "a people deprived of their civil and human rights, people oppressed," [words indistinct] as a veteran socialist, Pertini noted that "we greeted the October revolution full of hope" (the Bolshevik revolution in Russia in October 1917, editor's note). "We have to admit today that many of those hopes have been dashed... and we are deeply anguished," he continued.

However, Pertini warned that those who, unlike Italy, remained indifferent to the misdeeds in Latin American dictatorships, or in southern Africa, did not have any right to protest against the misdeeds in Poland. Pertini also voiced solidarity with Afghani partisans in their struggle against the "foreign dominator" and expressed concern for the situation in the Middle East which constitutes, he said, a threat to world peace. War today would spell the end of mankind on this planet, he said. Why then not use the vast sums spent on armaments to fight world hunger, the president asked. 18 million children died of nutrition in 1980 [as received]. "This massacre of innocents weighs as a harsh condemnation the conscience of all men of state, and therefore on mine as well," he said.

Pertini then turned to specifically Italian ills, voicing concern for the growing number of unemployed in the country, the economic depression still plauging the south and the Naples area in particular, and the problems posed by terrorism. In this later regard, he reiterated the view he expressed at the time of the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II in Rome, to the effect that Italian terrorism had international links. A Turk shot the pope in St Peter's Square on May 13, but thanks to an emergency operation, the attack was not fatal. There are those who hope to destabilize democracy in Italy, Pertini insisted. He noted that a year ago he was criticized and even derided in some circles for claiming that Italy's terrorism was manipulated and even masterminded from abroad. These international links have now become manifest, he said. Nevertheless, the head of state said he was convinced that terrorism was a nightmare that would one day come to an end.

In the final part of his speech, Pertini addressed himself to the so-called moral question brought to the forefront by the Masonic (P-2) lodge scandal "which troubled, which polluted our life," he said. There can be no solidarity or sympathy with those who were enrolled in the lodge, he said. Personal solidarity or party solidarity in such a case becomes complicity, he continued. Pertini said it was a moral question and that he was not concerned at this time with the eventual penal implications of involvement in the lodge scandal. The president concluded his message with a word to the nation's youth, reconfirming his full trust in their ability to build a better future.

EANES CALLS FOR ECONOMIC REALISM IN ADDRESS

[New year address to the Portuguese people by President Eanes -- live or recorded]

[Excerpts] Portuguese people: No people live isolated in the contemporary world. On the contrary, the peoples and the states establish among themselves close and inevitable relations of coexistence and cooperation. When a nation reflects on itself, it cannot do so without taking into account the surrounding world or what is happening in other regions. So, when we reflect on our acts, such a reflection will always have to be one of solidarity, of participation in the building of a more just social life capable of creating the conditions for a full human fulfillment through the assertion of man and his constituent values.

I am certain that the Portuguese people know what they want and are aware of the set of political measures which deserve the support of a very significant majority of the voters. In other words, the Portuguese people have today a political maturity born of experience, which is the most important asset to defend pluralist democracy, to impart a new vigor to the political parties and to face the requirements of economic recovery. This is the main reason for the hope which I continue to have when I look at the difficulties still looming on our horizon. For such difficulties there will be no magic or immediate solution. Particularly in the economic sphere there will be no solution without a persistent effort of harmonization, without a real sense of negotiation, without the conviction that the collective effort of a people exists and can be justified only in the assertion of justice, in the acknowledgment of quality and in the responsibility of the qualified organizations. Otherwise, economic recovery will not take place, even if some may demand the price of the exploitation of the workers and the (?physical) and moral (?desert) of the political dictatorship on which the exploitation would have to be based.

The revision of the constitution is another factor of hope in the consolidation of our political process. Once completed, it will provide the opportunity to clear up a few doubts and, above all, to provide an end to the motives of controversy to which the text of the constitution gave rise. We must expect from the revision of the constitution an important contribution to a more calm political debate, so that, at last, we may concentrate our attention on what is really important and necessary. The revision of the constitution, which all hope will have normalizing effects, will certainly not bring new problems into areas where they have not yet existed, or where we could not democratically justify that they should begin to exist. The economic question will be the crucial problem of next year, irrespective of what the political developments may prove to be. In effect, the economic indicators are the real measure of the political capability to organize collective effort, to interpret the meaning of the social will, to find the productive balance between the differing interests which manifest themselves in economic activity.

In the present situation the policy of austerity can only be viewed as a temporary means imposed by the principle of realism, which cannot however be an end in itself. No democratic society can continue with austerity, the absence of a future for the younger generation and the [word indistinct] waste of the capabilities and experience of the older generation as its only horizon. The need for austerity, now required by the force of the circumstances and by previous attitudes, calls for the need to define those medium and long-term objectives capable of becoming effective factors of mobilization, confidence and understanding. This is a task which cannot be postponed, because otherwise our plans for European integration will be jeopardized and in a few years, because of continuing austerity, the democratic regime itself will be at risk. There can be no return to a past of apparent capitalist liberalism which represents the effective control of an authoritarian state and which the businessmen, the experts or obviously the workers never defended.

There can be no place either, for more recent proposals which made people believe that the simple solution to the country's economic problems lies in the distribution of existing resources. It is on a model of cooperation between private enterprise and the public sector that the conditions for supporting and encouraging private initiative should be created in order to face the challenge of creativity and competition in an open economy. The building of our economic reality can be achieved only through a shared understanding among all components of the productive economic process, that is, those responsible for the economic policies, the workers, the technicians and the entrepreneurs.

The most suitable political solutions to the achievement of national interests will continue to be -- as is normal in a democracy -- the subject of differing views. However it is necessary not to forget, however heated such a controversy may be, that a decision on this type of question must not be made on the basis of idealistic and abstract proposals, but rather on the basis of what is democratically legitimized by the vote and the constitutional rules. On the other hand, I do not think that the country's situation and the lessons of our democratic process justify a constant search for ideal political solutions without taking into due account the path which is now already possible for us to follow toward a convergence of stances, understanding and consensus.

To those who assert themselves through comments on, and criticism of the actions taken by others, it might be useful to underline the differences, radicalize the interpretations, and artificially create bipolarized situations. But the role of the politicians who work with what actually exists in order to solve concrete problems, can only have as its responsible objective the search for a balance between the stances which freely manifest themselves in society. The political question "par excellence" at the moment is to find the possible consensus about what can be done, because this is what deserves and wins the support of society. It is, therefore, necessary to remember that what really matters for the future is the contribution which can be given to those political programs which are adjusted to the needs and possibilities of our society.

During the year that is now beginning, the holding of local elections will enable the specific expression of public opinion which, in this way, will continue to participate in the building of our organization of democratic power. Decentralization is the consistent course to reduce the vices and distortions of the central bureaucratic organizations, whether they are part of the administrative organization of the state or of the creation and dissemination of information and culture. But decentralization is also the most effective course to ensure the people's commitment to the solution of their problems.

There is not a single solid pluralist democracy which does not have, as one of its most important characteristics, a tradition of full exercise of local power. Everything, therefore, should be done to promote participation in the debate on local power and in its ensuing election process.

As regards foreign policy, developments over the past few years have confirmed the correctness and realism of its line and overall conception by which it has been guided. It is now clear that the main vectors of this conception are our close links with Europe, our association with NATO, cooperation with Africa and the pursuit of a strategy of development based on the principle of justice and the reciprocity of interests in international economic relations.

In those very delicate issues concerning international balances and where peace is at stake, it is essential to maintain great calm in the attitudes we adopt, without, however, failing to condemn the violations of the basic values which characterize our idea of politics and of internationally recognized and accepted human rights. On this type of issue our stand must fully respect the political commitments undertaken with our NATO allies, since this is the most effective way to contribute to a concrete and peaceful solution to the problems at the level of international balances.

This is the criterion which I consider applicable to the present situation in Poland or to any other similar situation likely to interfere in the existing balances in Europe. It is essential to have, today and in future, a unity of stances within the European and NATO frameworks, as only then will there be economic, political and military credibilty to exert a concrete pressure on the decision-making centers which become involved in this issue.

For similar reasons, one should watch -- with all attention and solidarity -- the Vactican's stands, where its ability to (?interpret) the events is directly related to its moral credibility. For me there was never any doubt about condemning the events in Poland, the violation of human rights, the restrictions of civil and trade union freedoms. The value of the solidarity expressed by the Portugese people towards the Polish people, as well as other peoples who endure arbitrary regimes, is stronger than the mere assertion of democartic values. It stems from their clear awareness that they themselves for decades also went through that degrading experience for human dignity, and that, some years ago, they had to defend themselves from other totalitarian threats. We therefore know exactly what our solidarity means.

What matters here, as well as in all the other areas of foreign policy, is to show that Portugal responsibly meets all its commitments in the specific framework of its alliances because this is the most effective way to contribute to the defense of international balances. I deemed it necessary to recall these concrete aspects of our political life because I see in them signs for us to maintain our hope in what we can achieve. It is with this belief that I convey to all Portugese my best wishes for a happy new year.

PRIME MINISTER GREETS NATION ON NEW YEAR

[New year speech by Prime Minister and acting President Mauno Koivisto, place not given -- live]

[Text] Dear citizens. At the turn of the year it is customary to examine the achievements of the past and ponder over the prospects for the future.

In the past 2 years the president, in his new year's speech, has concentrated mainly on world politics. He has regarded the international situation as so grave, that its importance has risen above domestic problems. In the past year this concern has by no means been reduced. On the contrary, the big power relations continue to be strained, and in various parts of the world, including Europe, there are areas where the political situation is tense and the threat of a crisis is near. It is of particular concern that it has not been possible to stop the armament spiral, but it seems to advance at an unprecedented speed.

Even though the prospects of international politics are quite gloomy one can, however, also discern events arousing hope. These include in particular the meeting between Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev and the federal chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany, Helmut Schmidt, as well as the contacts between the two German states at the highest level for the first time in over 10 years. U.S.-Soviet talks on the reduction of medium-range nuclear arms in Europe were started in Geneva a month ago. It is to be hoped that this means, at the same time, a new opening in the endeavors toward disarmament, and particularly in the efforts to reduce the nuclear arms arsenals.

The autumn which has ended demonstrated convincingly that activities by small countries too, and the desire for peace by ordinary citizens can influence international events. The CSCE follow-up conference has been in progress in Madrid, and thanks to the mediation work by Finland and other neutral countries it has advanced quite far in drawing up a final document acceptable to all sides. The government of Finland seriously hopes that all the parties will show political will and a desire for mediation after the Christmas recess so that the Madrid conference can be concluded successfully, and in this way the continuation of the negotiation process started here in Helsinki can be guaranteed in the future too.

Amidst alarming international events, Finland's position has remained stable and secure. For this our thanks go largely to President Urho Kekkonen, who paved the way on which it is appropriate for us to continue. Our relations both with our close neighbors and with more distant nations are good and correct. It is of decisive importance that our good-neighborly relations with the Soviet Union, based on the treaty of friendship, cooperation and mutual assistance, have continued to strengthen and develop. Our foreign policy, which is based on the Paasikivi-Kekkonen line, enjoys the nation's steadfast support and the trust of foreign states. An attitude of consideration toward international issues will in future too provide the best preconditions for us to act in a constructive way for peace and for a just development. The consolidation of our foreign political position, the development of our economic conditions and the increase in the internal unity of our nation have gone hand in hand, for there is a strong interaction between these three factors. Favorable experiences in one sector promote a good development in the others. A nation which is internally divided cannot hope to be entrusted with such international missions of trust as Finland has been entrusted with of late. A split nation cannot unite a split world.

In the economic sense too, the past year has been satisfactory for our country. We have been able to adapt to the world's economic development with reasonable success and to answer new challenges.

There is reason in particular to emphasize the significance of our Eastern trade. Its stable and continuing growth has largely balanced our economy and has offered work to numerous citizens. It must be noted with pleasure that the protocol for an exchange of goods in 1982, which was signed recently, will again open up new and favorable prospects for the development of our economic cooperation.

Continuing unemployment remains our major national problem. We must ceaselessly aim to alleviate it and remove it and we must concentrate all our resources on it. I hope, and I also believe that the parties, the interest organizations and the citizens are capable of good cooperation in these uncertain times. With the help of mutual trust and understanding we shall best safeguard the stable and secure development of our fatherland in future years too. The participation of every one of us is needed in this work. As the year is now beginning I wish you a good and secure new year. At the same time I convey a warm and respectful new year's greeting to the head of the realm, President Urho Kekkonen, and I believe all Finns join me in this greeting.

GOVERNMENT CONVEYS 'CONCERN' TO POLAND

[Excerpt] Polish Ambassador to Norway Karol Nowakowski was called to the Foreign Ministry 23 December, where Under Secretary Eivinn Berg expressed the government's growing concern over developments in Poland. Berg said that the brutal treatment of the Solidarity trade union, with mass internment and deaths, is in direct contravention of the spirit and the letter of the Helsinki declaration.

The ambassador received an urgent verbal request from the Norwegian Government for the release of the trade union leaders interned and for the normalization of conditions in the country. So that he would be left in no doubt about Norway's views, Nowakowski was given a copy of [prime minister] Kaare Willoch's unequivocal statement on Tuesday [22 December]. Under Secretary Berg announced that the government sees no reason at present to use economic sanctions against Poland. At a press conference before the meeting Berg stresses that Norway does not want to give any form of help to Poland which could legitimize those in power. But blocking credits and trade links could lead to a situation in which the country would be even less able to overcome its own problems, and this would be extremely undesirable.

BRIEFS

POSTFREE PARCELS TO POLAND -- The post office here at home announces that at least 120 tons of gifts to Poland have been handed in during the first 2 days when it has been possible to send parcels to Poland free of charge. The post office has called in extra staff and has also been forced to ask for additional freight railway cars for these parcels. The first parcels are expected to be delivered to Poland after the holiday. The Left Party-Communist has asked that the post office make it possible to send free aid parcels to the people in El Salvador and Chile too. THATCHER DENIES WEST DISUNITED OVER POLAND

LD311448 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1330 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Text] Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher today denied that the Western alliance was in disarray over Poland and President Reagan's sanctions. She said in a new year message on radio and television, "We in Europe and the United States are the free democratic world. The whole of the Russian tactic is to try and divide us. They must never succeed. Poland wants peace with freedom. It wants the very thing we have which we do not always value enough. We will stand together." "The whole of the Eastern bloc have had enough of the oppressiveness of communism and now the oppressiveness of military rule. They saw a spark of freedom emerging in Solidarity. But it is crushed out under the communist yoke. Communism and freedom cannot exist side by side. We in the West know that, and we in the West will stick together."

COMMON MARKET TO BE PRESSED FOR TOUGHER LINE

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Lord Carrington is expected to press Common Market foreign ministers at a meeting in Brussels today to take a tougher line over Poland.

Mrs Thatcher and the foreign secretary are concerned that the West Europeans and the United States should be seen to be acting in harmony in their approach to the military crackdown in Poland.

This will mean that community countries will have to take a tougher line in following the United States. But few observers expect that they will go as far as the United States in introducing sanctions.

The Foreign Office refused yesterday to discuss what stance would be adopted by Lord Carrington at the meeting.

Meanwhile, officials in London last night confirmed that Common Market ambassadors in Warsaw had been summoned to meet Polish leader General Jaruzelski this morning.

Britain charge d'affaires, Ramsey Melhuish, will be at the meeting.

It is assumed that General Jaruzelski will ask the West Europeans not to follow the American example of imposing sanctions on Poland.

Since the meeting is scheduled to take place in the morning it is expected that the ambassadors will be able to report to their foreign ministers before they meet in Brussels.

A special meeting in Brussels of NATO foreign ministers has been provisionally planned for next week as part of efforts to co-ordinate Western policy on Poland.

Mrs Thatcher has already rejected suggestions that the Western alliance is in disarray over Poland, after President Reagan's decision to impose sanctions.

The NATO meeting will give the American secretary of state, Mr Alexander Haig, an opportunity to explain why the Americans feel that sanctions are the best way to help the Polish people.

KIPRIANOU MESSAGE SEES HOPE FOR CYPRUS SETTLEMENT

NC311917 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 31 Dec 81

[New year message to the Cypriot people by President Kiprianou -- recorded]

[Text] Good evening. It is with much emotion that I communicate with the Cypriot people this evening, on the eve of the new year. I address to you all greetings of love and esteem. I pay tribute to your perseverance and industry. I pay tribute to your courage and militant spirit. I pay tribute to your virtues, which you have proven in the past and which promise a better future. I also wish to convey to you this evening, as we step into the new year, a message for a happier future -- the message and my conviction that better days will come.

It is not possible for injustice to continue forever. It is not possible for justice and freedom to be violated with impunity forever and for catharsis and salvation not to come. It is not possible for people to be subjected to violence and arbitrariness and for their inalienable rights not to be restored sooner or later. Universal historic and national laws have shown that the forces of darkness and oppression, the forces of usurpation of the rights of men and peoples, cannot prevail forever. There comes a time when the abhorrent regime of foreign oppression comes to an end and people become free and find once again the road to unobstructed evolution to progress and happiness.

This valid historic law must apply to our case as well. Cyprus today is not an isolated case but has become an international example of violation of principles and ideals. And the resulting hardships are not suffered by our people alone. Here in Cyprus human morality is put to the test and the world moral order is violated. And the violator of moral order and of every principle and ideal is Turkey, with its Attila, with its invasion of Cyprus and its continuing aggressive military presence in our peaceful island. And those who continue to condone the crime are not devoid of responsibility.

A total of 7 and 1/2 years have gone by since the Turkish invasion which followed the treacherous junta coup. Well known are the various aspects of the Cyprus tragedy: Our occupied land, our refugees, the dead and wounded, the missing, the enclaved, the material losses and ruins, the usurpation and desecration of our ancestral cultural heritage, the transplantation of foreign settlers to our ancient homes, the attempt to change the ethnological character of our island and the continuous Turkish threats and new expansionist designs of Ankara. Turkey's conduct is cynical and contemptuous not only as regards our drama, the drama of the people of Cyprus, but also as regards the international verdict as expressed by the resolutions of the UN Security Council and General Assembly and the decisions of the nonaligned and Commonwealth summit conferences.

In fact Turkey is constantly trying to mislead the international community about what has happened and what is happening in Cyprus. But, as it has rightly been said: "You can fool all the people some of the time, and some of the people all the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time." This is the permanent aim of Turkey -- to fool everyone forever. This, however, cannot go on indefinitely. Some day the Turkish myths will collapse. We shall spare no effort in continuing our firm and programmed policy to internationalize our problem as much as possible, which would contribute to the promotion of our aims and the successful conclusion of our struggle.

And while our efforts will be incessant and consistent in the international field, the domestic front must not be neclected. The state will do everything possible to safeguard and entrench democracy and democratic procedures, and their undermining will not be allowed in any way. Everyone is free to have his own ideas, convictions and ideology. Everyone has the right to join the political party of his own choice, and it is quite natural for various views and opinions to be expressed. All of us, however, should turn our attention permanently to the aims of our struggle, for no matter how many differences there may be on handling issues, the targets are and must be universal and immutable.

As far as I am concerned, I wish to repeat that my actions are always guided by the national interest and my target is always the vindication of our martyred people. The task is laborious and the militant tradition bequeathed to us is very heavy, considering the tremendous difficulties we are called on to face. However, I draw strength in my efforts from the support of our people and my unwavering faith in the justice of our cause.

I wish to repeat again that we are not alone in our struggle. We have as a secure support and mainstay the Greek Government, which has already proved how determined it is in its support to the struggle of the Cypriot people for freedom and justice. We have the support of the whole political world of Greece and all the Greek people. I also wish to stress that international understanding and support is widening, and in this field we shall systematically continue our efforts in all directions so that the right prerequisites may be created for pressures to be brought to bear on Turkey to abandon its unacceptable policy.

A total of 7 and 1/2 years have gone by and the UN resolutions remain unimplemented and continue to be violated. A total of 7 and 1/2 years have gone by and, despite the efforts made at the intercommunal talks, which are the right procedure for the internal aspect of the problem, there has been no progress, and responsibility for this lies squarely on the Turkish side. We shall continue the talks for a further reasonable period to find out in a new effort whether there is any substantial change in the Turkish attitude. Should there be no change, we shall then call for a new UN General Assembly debate on Cyprus and will, among other things, demand the implementation of the UN resolutions and the convocation of an international conference under the auspices of the United Nations.

I have absolutely no doubt that the vast majority of Turkish Cypriots wish a peaceful and just solution of the Cyprus problem and cooperation with the Greek Cypriots for the benefit of all. However, if progress is to be made in this direction there is need for a radical change in the attitude of Turkey. And while an honest effort has been made since 1974 for progress in the intercommunal talks, the fact remains that the Cyprus problem is basically a problem of invasion, occupation and foreign intervention. This is why our firm target is the withdrawal of foreign troops and the complete demilitarization of Cyprus. We demand implementation of the UN resolutions and the high-level agreements, which contain all the necessary elements for a just and lasting solution which would ensure the unity, territorial integrity, sovereignty, nonalignment and complete independence of Cyprus. We have accepted federation with sincerity. However, we rule out confederation or any other divisive solution or acceptance of faits accomplis. The unity of the state and people and restoration of the rights of all citizens, including the right of the refugees to return to their ancestral homes, will undoubtedly create the right prerequisites for a Cyprus permanently peaceful, free and happy for all its inhabitants. I firmly believe Cyprus could become an island of lasting peace and happiness for all -- Greek Cypriots, Turkish Cypriots, Armenians, Maronites and Latins. I believe Cyprus, free from foreign intervention of any kind and without foreign armies, will become a bridge of understanding between three continents in this vital and sensitive area of the eastern Mediterranean. This is our ambition, which is absolutely in line with our rights as an independent state and people.

Let us hope that in 1982 the path that will lead us to vindication will be opened. Let us look to the future with optimism and faith. I have the conviction that finally we shall attain our targets, regardless of difficulties. While continuing and intensifying our efforts for an honorable solution of the Cyprus problem, we shall continue, within the possibilities of the state, to face with keen interest and affection the problems of the various classes of the people. Our permanent objective remains the continuous improvement of the standard of living and the social standard of our people, guided always by social justice. A lot has been achieved in this field, and despite the many problems it is facing, as a result of the occupation and the deprivation of the largest part of our wealth producing resources, as well as other problems, mainly external problems, Cyprus today compares favorably with many countries as regards economic stability and social progress. And the difficulties being encountered today will be dealt with, bearing in mind the best interests of the people. To this end coordinated efforts are being made to find suitable ways in cooperation with the representatives of the classes of the people directly concerned.

On the occasion of the new year, I would like to address a message of friendship to the Turkish Cypriots and assure them that the struggle we are waging is a struggle for their best interests as well. A just solution, as the one we have outlined and are seeking, will fully serve the Turkish Cypriots, in contrast to the policy of division Ankara has been following so far. I ask them to trust us, because our motives and intentions are absolutely sincere.

This evening I should particularly like to address a message of honor and sincere support to the relatives of missing persons and to assure them once more that this purely humanitarian problem is foremost in our thoughts and that I shall continue to make every effort for the tracing of their loved ones. I also express my admiration for our heroic enclaved people, for whom our concern is always undiminished. I address a greeting of affection and esteem to all the victims of our struggle, to the wounded, and all those who have suffered as a result of the treachery and the invasion. I also address a greeting of esteem and affection to our refugees, to whom I repeat the assurance that we shall continue our efforts for the solution of the problems they are facing, with a view to ensuring for them temporary comfortable living conditions until the right of return to their homes is secured.

Our people have suffered terrible blows but have not been brought down to their knees. We shall remain upright on the bastions, upright until vindication, until the day the sun of justice rises once again over Cyprus. I wish all the people of Cyprus a happy new year, fulfillment of their aspirations and success of our common, sacred struggle. Good night.

DENKTAS WARNS OF POSSIBLE PREEMPTIVE STRIKE

[Excerpt] According to diplomatic sources, a few days ago Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas invited the leaders of diplomatic missions in Cyprus and warned them that in case the import of military materiel into southern Cyprus "continues" -- as he said -- the Turkish Army will proceed with a preemptive strike [last two words in English].

This warning was given verbally at meetings Denktas had with the ambassadors of both Western and Eastern countries. The foreign ambassadors conveyed this "warning" to their governments.

KARAMANLIS NEW YEAR MESSAGE NOTES WORLD PROBLEMS

[Text] On the occasion of the new year, President Karamanlis and Prime Minister Papandreou last night addressed messages to the Greek people.

The president stresses among other things in his message that the whole world is entering the new year with a feeling of uncertainty and apprehension because not one of the great problems which occupy it was solved in the year that has passed. Not only this, but recently these problems have become sharper and more dangerous. Despite the expectations of all people and the declarations of the great, it has not become possible to promote brotherhood among peoples and the safeguarding of progress within the framework of a stable and lasting peace. A recent example of the violation of basic principles, the president continues in his message, is the Polish drama, a drama that, due to foreign intervention, has acquired a form and dimension that, regardless of its final outcome, is now threatening Europe's tranquillity. The same of course can be said in the case of suffering Cyprus.

At another point in his message the president stresses: Of course our country is small, but this does not mean it has fatalistically to follow dangerous international developments. Greece, like every free and sovereign state, should contribute to limiting the dangers that threaten peace and disturb international cooperation, and especially it should not only defend but itself implement those ideas which have been born in this very same land and which have constituted the guide of all mankind. Inside this uneasy and incoherent world, our fatherland must live and prosper and, in addition to the great and critical problems which occupy all peoples, it must confront the specific problems which concern it.

These problems, specifically, are our critical national issues that are connected with our foreign relations and consequently with the country's security. As you know, these problems take, and should take, absolute priority over all other problems. However, to deal successfully with these problems we shall need both toil and sacrifices. But especially we shall need the appropriate political and social atmosphere without which the country's prosperity is impossible. In other words, we shall need to guarantee the unencumbered operation of the state by avoiding extremism and exaggeration. I believe, concludes the president, that we shall all make an effort, because it is in the interest of all of us to make the correct choices and that, despite the difficulties we shall have to confront, the new year will turn out to be good.

PAPANDREOU REAFFIRMS GREEK SUPPORT FOR CYPRUS

[Text] In a message to President Kiprianou on the occasion of the new year, Prime Minister Papandreou gives reassurance of complete and all-sided support from the government and the people of Greece. In his message Prime Minister Papandreou addresses to the Cypriot people and to President Kiprianou personally warm and sincere wishes for happiness, prosperity and strength for the vindication of the struggle of unenslaved Cyprus. The new year message of the Greek prime minister concludes: I pray and hope that 1982 may be a decisive year for the definite consolidation of the independence and integrity of Cyprus so that the hour of peace and progress for all Cypriots, without exception, may come.

ULUSU NEW YEAR MESSAGE NOTES INTERNAL PROGRESS

TA311533 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1515 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Text] Ankara, 31 Dec (AA) -- Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu said Turkey would preserve her pacific and constructive approach to all international disputes, including those to which she is a party. In a new year message to the nation, Ulusu noted 1981 had been the beginning of many improvements for Turkey whereas it had been a period of serious economic and social problems for the world. Consciousness of national unity and togetherness had been reinforced during the Ataturk centennial in 1981, he pointed out, while inflation, which had shaken the economy [words indistinct] had been largely curbed.

Ulusu regretted that the peace and stability at home could not be [words indistinct] the world or its region where Turkey is located. The recent past had seen new problems arise and international tension rise instead of settling existing disputes and problems, thus the prevailing lack of confidence had reached new proportions. "Turkey, aware of her past contribution to regional and world peace and security, will preserve her pacific and constructive approach to all disputes and misunderstandings, including those to which she is a party," the prime minister reiterated.

"It is evident," he went on, "that developments in our region play a significant role in the preservation of peace in a world which faces widespread political tension." With her cultural heritage, manpower, economic and military presence, he said a stronger and more stable Turkey will be able to make a more effective contribution to world peace. 1981 had been a year of "pulling ourselves together," Ulusu said, hence (?1982) could be a year of economic and political "take-off." This government had "full faith in the necessity for a healthy democracy" in Turkey, and was "fully intent on establishing the conditions required" for this purpose. 1982 would bear special significance for the process of rebuilding democracy started with the opening of the Consultative Assembly.

TCP SEES CONSTITUTION REFERENDUM AS JUNTA PLOY

[Statement by Turkish Communist Party Central Committee dated 31 December 1981]

[Text] The junta has announced that the new constitution will be submitted to a referendum in November 1982 and that elections will be held in the fall of 1983. This announcement is a maneuver by the military dictatorship, which is faced with foreign and domestic opposition. The reactionary military dictatorship cannot solve any of the country's problems and is trying to convince the public that there will be a return to democracy in a bid to prevent the unity of all national democratic forces and the increasing discontent of the people.

The junta is still continuing the arrest, prosecution, torture and execution of Turkish Communist Party [TCP] members and all democratic forces. The death penalty has been demanded for Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] administrators. Thousands of unionists are being investigated. Turkish Teachers Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER] administrators have been given harsh sentences. The junta wants to hold elections after having transformed the country into a huge concentration camp. The junta, which has announced that it will remain in power for at least another 2 years, will further endanger the country's security during this period through additional concessions it will make to the Reagan administration, which is increasing world tension in extraordinary proportions.

The generals are tearing up the 1961 constitution. The 27 May reforms are being destroyed. An antidemocratic, antipeople constitution is being prepared. In November 1982 the junta is planning to pressure the people with the (?option) of either naked dictatorship or constitutional dictatorship. With an antidemocratic constitution to be thus imposed, the junta is preparing the conditions necessary to keep reactionism in power. Such a situation shows how wrong it will be to remain inactive in the face of the junta's announcement. The junta should not be given a chance. A strong resistance should be shown against the antidemocratic laws enacted by the junta and the oppression of progressive forces. It is necessary to unite the democratic forces against the tearing up of the 1961 constitution and for a national democratic constitution.

The national democratic forces are entering the new year under conditions more suitable -- compared to last year -- to fulfill the duties that befall them. Freedom to all patriots and democrats who are under detention. The ban on all political parties -- with the exception of the NAP -- should be lifted. The fact that the junta has resorted to the election tactic has increased the possibilities for reaching these goals. Yes, the elections should be held. However, they should be held in accordance with a national democratic constitution that guarantees all the freedoms of the people and their national sovereignty. This duty can be achieved through the disbanding of the junta immediately, and not after the elections, and through the establishment of a caretaker democratic government with the participation of all democratic national forces, including patriotic officers. Only a democratic and independent Turkey can become a real peace factor in the region at a time when the world is faced with great danger.

WEST BEHIND WORSENING TURKISH-GREEK RELATIONS

TA021300 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0700 GMT 2 Jan 82

[Text] It can be claimed without any hesitation that Turkey's relations with Greece have always been the main topic of discussion by our public and press on foreign issues. Discussions, debates and even arguments on this subject have dragged on for years. However, this issue, which is always on the agenda, is sometimes -- as is the case currently -- escalated and gains such importance that it reaches the limits of hostility and enmity and creates a climate of war. Ministers, the prime minister and army commanders are talking openly about the possibility of war. In their statements they are using terms like "They will be frustrated" or "They will be taught a lesson." Undoubtedly such statements are being made with the knowledge of the collaborationist (?circles) and the representatives of [word indistinct]. Statements made under the influence of chauvinism are serving the purpose of the most reactionary forces, which are being further strengthened.

Let us point out from the very beginning that the progressive forces, which defend our people's interests strongly, should not feel obliged to adopt a chauvinistic stand on the issue of relations with Greece or on the differences between the two countries in a bid to prove their patriotism. In fact, adopting a chauvinistic stand is not compatible with the devoted defense of national interests. On the contrary, such a stand can only harm national interests and cast a shadow on them. Under the circumstances, the task of the progressive and patriotic forces should be to reveal to our people the essence of the dangerous game the reactionary forces are hatching and to warn them accordingly.

Dear listeners, at a time when the reactionary press organs are trying to heat up the situation through unfounded reports and lies, Bulent Ulusu, the prime minister of the military junta, threatened to frustrate Greece; and Adm Nejat Tumer, a member of the National Security Council and Turkish Navy commander, discussed the readiness of our naval forces for war.

The reactionary forces are applauding these threats, portraying them as a warning to Greece on the possibility of war. They want to use the strained Turkish-Greek relations as a tool to become stronger and to throw our country onto the bosom of the U.S. imperialists and NATO. Prime Minister Ulusu is worsening the situation through his statements. In a statement to GUNAYDIN, Ulusu said that if Turkey wanted to it could produce the atomic bomb. Where do such statements lead?

The government, which at first considered Greece's taking the issue to NATO as a casus belli, has now itself adopted the same method. It is trying to solve the problem within the framework of NATO. In an article in TERCUMAN, Ahmet Kabakli urges complaining to that gendarme of the world over Greece's stand, while Nazli Ilicak, in another page of the same issue of the paper, openly supports the Rogers plan which leaves the supervision of the Aegean Sea in NATO's hands. In contradiction of all realities, she is claiming that relations between Turkey and Greece were good during the rule of Prime Minister Rallis and have worsened since Papandreou took over. As everyone knows, this is a lie. All issues currently existing between Turkey and Greece existed while Rallis was prime minister as well. At that time the reactionary forces were calling for a crusade against Greece. It is only because the leaders of Turkey and Greece sacrificed their national interests to benefit the interests of NATO and the imperialists that a so-called agreement was reached.

This proves that the reactionary forces do not need to hide their intentions of transferring their rights in the Aegean to the U.S. imperialists. In assessing these developments the following conclusion can be reached: The escalating chauvinism is only to the benefit of NATO and serves to further strengthen and defend imperialist interests.

Differences currently existing between Turkey and Greece have no resemblance to the problems existing between the two countries during the national liberation war. At that time, the soldiers of the king of Greece landed in Anatolia in a bid to serve the interests of British imperialism. United as one, our people fought against these aggressors -- with arms and whatever else they could find -- in order to save their country. However, currently the reactionary circles are exerting efforts to involve our people in a new war in a bid to serve imperialist interests. Our people are definitely opposed to such an adventure. That is why spokesmen of the reactionary forces like Kabakli and Ilicak are calling for complaining to NATO and the United States on the Greek stand. What they trust are not the people but the imperialists. The have no right to speak to our people or to [word indistinct] them.

Our people have something to tell them. Our people want the dangerous game being played by the reactionary forces on the issue of relations between Turkey and Greece to be foiled. The task before the progressive, patriotic forces is to implement this sacred wish of our people. Issues between Turkey and Greece can only be solved by the free will of the countries outside the framework of NATO and without the interference of the imperialists. All efforts to solve these problems in the meeting halls of NATO will only make matters worse and will bring no benefits to the peoples of these countries.

TIGHTER SECURITY AT BORDERS, IN CITIES PLANNED

[Excerpts] Security Director General Fahri Gorgulu has announced that within 2 1/2 months border points will be controlled by means of computers located in Ankara. In a statement at a meeting with security branch directors in Izmir, Gorgulu explained that the directorate would begin to set up the system within a few days, adding that after it begins to function persons entering or leaving the country would be checked speedily and properly. He also announced that a new motorized police team, the Mobile Force [Cevik Kuvvet], would be set up in 32 cities to counter disturbances.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

ENVOYS MEET JARUZELSKI; MINISTERS DEBATE SANCTIONS

[Text] Brussels, 3 Jan (AFP) -- The Foreign Ministry late today confirmed rumours that Polish leader General Wojciech Jaruzelski had invited West European ambassadors to Poland to a meeting at 1100 Warsaw local time tomorrow to give them a message. Belgium, current head of the European Community (EEC) Council of Ministers, said its ambassador in Poland, Constant de Clerck, would summon the other European Community ambassadors in Warsaw to prior talks before meeting with Gen Jaruzelski. The Belgian Government said its ambassador to Poland would express EEC concern over the installation of martial law in Poland, stressing its violation of the Helsinki human rights accords and the United Nations Charter.

The EEC would demand reinstatement of basic freedoms and human rights in Poland as well as the release of all political prisoners, the Belgian Government said, adding that its ambassador would insist on Gen Jaruzelski's resuming talks with all sectors of the Polish nation. In the name of the EEC countries he would also explain that foreign intervention would be regarded by Europe as "a threat to detente." Meanwhile, foreign ministers of EEC countries are to meet in Brussels tomorrow to discuss Poland and the stance to take on the United States' sanctions campaign against the Soviet Union.

Ministers Begin Talks

LD041028 Brussels Domestic Service in French 1000 GMT 4 Jan 82

[Text] For the past hour, the foreign ministers of the Ten have been gathered at a meeting in Brussels. The purpose of this meeting is to study the position of the EEC in regard to the sanctions adopted by President Reagan against Poland and the USSR following the coup staged by the Polish Army on 13 December 1981. The foreign ministers of the Ten, who are working under the chairmanship of Belgian Foreign Affairs Minister Leo Tindemans, will be informed, probably toward noon [1100 GMT], of the message which General Jaruzelski is due to communicate this morning to the ambassadors of the Ten in Warsaw, who have been summoned to meet him at 1100 [1000 GMT].

SANCTIONS AGAINST SOVIET UNION MAY BE IMPOSED

LD021936 Montreal International Service in English 1900 GMT 2 Jan 82

[Text] External Affairs Minister Mark MacGuigan says Canada may take sanctions against the Soviet Union because of its role in events affecting Poland. Mr MacGuigan has not released any details on the proposed sanctions but says the Canadian position has been made known to the U.S. secretary of state, Alexander Haig. The United States has taken its own sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union, and Mr MacGuigan says Canada will not subvert the U.S. policy by allowing the Soviets or Poles to do extra business with Canada.

POLISH SAILORS TO VOTE ON GENERAL STRIKE

LD310046 Montreal Domestic Service in English 1900 GMT 30 Dec 81

[Excerpts] Poland continues to lose members of its merchant fleet because of defections in foreign ports.

In Canada political asylum has been requested by 4 of the 64 Polish seamen who arrived in Montreal yesterday on their way to replace defectors on vessels in Vancouver on the west coast. One member of the group says as many as 50 more may ask to stay in Canada and 8 have already indicated that they will do so.

In Vancouver there are four large Polish fishing vessels with many members of Solidarity on board. At a meeting last night some of those members decided to take a vote today on whether to stage a general strike until martial law has ended in Poland. Paul Griffin reports:

[Begin Griffin recording] Forty-five Solidarity members, representing 200 Polish seamen aboard 4 fishing vessels in Vancouver, held a meeting in a smokefilled downtown hotel room last night and decided to take a vote today on a possible general strike. Because of international law vagaries over acts of mutiny the sailors will not refuse to work but instead ask the BC Federation of Labor to make sure the vessels do not leave Vancouver. Meanwhile Tom Fox of the BC Federation of Labor is confident union members in Vancouver will support the fishermen.

The Polish sailors say there are other vessels off the west coast now and vessels in Montreal and Halifax which could also be affected by a strike. The scenario of a fleet of Polish fishing vessels held captive in Canada appears close to becoming a reality. [end recording]

CONDITIONS FOR EUROMISSILE DEPLOYMENT LAID DOWN

NC311923 Paris AFP in English 1914 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Text] Rotterdam, 31 Dec (AFP) -- The Dutch Government might under certain conditions reconsider its refusal to allow Euromissiles to be based in Holland, Socialist Foreign Minister Max van der Stoel said in an interview published here today in the daily HET VRIJE VOLK. Mr Van der Stoel, generally considered more pro-Washington than his party, said the conditions were, on the one hand, the failure of the U.S.-Soviet Geneva talks on European disarmament, and on the other, Soviet stationing of more SS-20 missiles.

Mr Van der Stoel said that if his party decides to re-examine its view on deployment of Euromissiles in Holland, there should be a quid pro quo by the honoring of certain other party demands, like cutting down the number of Dutch nuclear commitments. He added that if the centre-left coalition government decided to install the new missiles, he would no longer be able to act as minister.

KREISKY: SANCTIONS MUST NOT STOP PIPELINE DEAL

[Text] France -- In the opinion of Chancellor Kreisky the United States should not attempt to block the project of a natural gas pipeline between the Soviet Union and West Europe. As Kreisky declared last night in an interview carried by the French television service, the construction of the gas pipeline from Siberia to West Europe cannot be prevented by the U.S. economic sanctions. At a time when there are problems with oil it would be naive to attempt to stop the development of cooperation between East and West Europe in the energy sector, the chancellor declared. Regarding the crisis in Poland, the chancellor said that he considered an intervention by the Soviet Union as not likely.

U.S., LIECHTENSTEIN AID POLISH REFUGEE PROBLEM

[APA report: "United States Takes More Poland Refugees"]

[Text] Washington/Vienna/Vaduz -- The efforts of the Austrian Government for placing Polish refugees in other Western countries have produced another result, according to an announcement of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Vienna on Wednesday. Following several interventions, Ambassador Vine, head of the refugee department in the U.S. State Department, assured the Austrian charge d'affaires in Washington that the United States will increase its contingent for refugees from East Europe should the planned number of 9,000 not be exhausted before the end of the U.S. fiscal year (end of September 1982).

The government of Liechtenstein decided together with the Deanery and the Red Cross of the principality to donate an amount of 1 million shillings to the Austrian Government as direct assistance for Polish refugees living in Austria. Thus the government wants to contribute toward easing the distress of these people, and to express the feelings of solidarity of the Principality of Liechtenstein vis-a-vis its neighbor country Austria which "has taken a very heavy burden on itself by generously taking refugees from Poland."

U.S. TO PURSUE 'RESTRICTIVE REFUGEE POLICY'

[Excerpts] Vienna -- The U.S. Government has indicated to Austria that, although it is ready to let more Poles immigrate to the United States, it wants generally to pursue a "restrictive refugee policy." This was learned from Vienna diplomatic circles. According to this source, Washington has asked Vienna to understand that it is better to leave the majority of Polish refugees in Austria for the time being. Otherwise, the impression might be created that the development in Poland was irreversible.

The U.S. statement dampens Austrian hopes for an easing of immigration restrictions on the part of the major immigration countries. As has been reported, Interior Minister Lanc's trip to Australia shortly before Christmas also failed to produce the results hoped for by Vienna. As has been learned from usually well-informed sources a telegram sent by Chancellor Kreisky on 24 December to Poul Hartling, UN high commissioner for refugees [UNHCR], was possibly a result of the hesitant U.S. attitude. In this telegram on Christmas Eve, Kreisky had urgently requested UNHCR aid for coping with the problem of Polish refugees in Austria.

Earlier, the United States had indicated that it could accept more Poles mainly by rearranging immigration quotas. It is reported that in particular the not fully utilized quota for Jewish emigrees from the USSR is now being reduced in favor of Polish refugees. Moreover, it was stated that the United States is rather interested in Austria's continuing to serve as a "waiting room" for Polish refugees, and that what is meant by "restrictive refugee policy" is a policy designed to avoid giving the Poles the impression that the events in their country prevent their return forever. Actually, Washington wants to create the impression that the refugees can return to their country as soon as the military dictatorship has ended. Once they were in the United States, their return would no longer be possible. Meanwhile, the UNHCR has already promised concrete measures in reply to Kreisky's appeal for aid. Financial aid running into the millions -- the exact amount is yet to be announced -- has been promised, as well as an increase in the staff of the Vienna UNHCR Office.

SCHMIDT, HAIG IN AGREEMENT ON POLISH CRISIS

Nor was there any doubt for Schmidt that Moscow's pressure on Warsaw had grown. For Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, who arrived at the ambassadori. residence later after coming from the EEC foreign ministers meeting in Brussels, there is no doubt that Moscow is responsible for the Polish crisis. Others at the meal with Haig which lasted until after midnight, were Treasury Secretary Donald Regan, Secretary of Commerce Baldridge, presidential adviser Edwin Meese and other leading U.S. politicians and economists. According to government circles Schmidt stressed as the unquestioned objective of the West regarding Poland three main points: an end to martial law, the release of detainees and the resumption of a dialogue with the trade union and the church.

Regarding the U.S. sanctions, Schmidt said that they would certainly have an effect as a political signal, but would provide no leverage. The chancellor made it clear that prior agreement within the alliance was absolutely indispensable. Schmidt told his U.S. guests that nothing would hit Moscow so hard as a real grain embargo. As concerted measures, even if not at present, Schmidt was thinking of credit and economic measures. The chancellor stressed the reliability of Bonn as a friend and ally of the United States. Of course the FRG had to look to its own interests.

WISCHNEWSKI INTERVIEWED ON VISIT OF RAKOWSKI

DW041315 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 4 Jan 82 pp 22-24

[Interview with SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski on NATO and the visit by Polish Deputy Premier Rakowski in Bonn, date and place of interview not given]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Mr Wischnewski, did you, in your talks with Polish Deputy Premier Mieczyslaw Rakowski Wednesday last week, gain the impression that a development is underway in Poland which gives you some hope?

Wischnewski: Rakowski described conditions in his country with a clarity which I had not anticipated. After this conference I have the impression that a course of reform will be possible in Poland in the future as well. But I cannot say anything about the pace at which this will proceed, because at the moment the Polish leadership is in the process of picking up the pieces again.

SPIEGEL: What, concretely, did Rakowski promise you?

Wischnewski: What I derived from the utterances of Mr Rakowski was that reforms are necessary. This does not necessarily mean that the policy of the past several months is to be continued that way. I also think that the chancellor has received signals already.

SPIEGEL: From Gen Wojciech Jaruzelski as a reply to the letter which Helmut Schmidt wrote him over Christmas?

Wischnewski: Yes.

SPIEGEL: Does reform course in Rakowski's interpretation mean also that the trade union rights will be restored?

Wischnewski: I believe that Solidarity will remain a factor in Poland. Rakowski said that in no uncertain terms. It would be careless on my part were I to say now to what extent this would be the case.

SPIEGEL: Did Mr Rakowski give you any information about the fate of prominent civil rights advocates and trade union representatives such as Michnik, Kuron, Walesa?

Wischnewski: I did not talk with him about individuals. I rather told him quite clearly how significant we deem the release of the interned persons in general. We are the advocates of all of them.

SPIEGEL: How did he react?

Wischnewski: I believe that in that respect the time factor will play an essential part. He did not tell me how soon interned people would be released.

SPIEGEL: Did he state figures?

Wischnewski: He expressly confirmed the official figures released by the Polish leadership the week before last.

SPIEGEL: There are reports in the West on tortures in internment camps.

Wischnewski: Rakowski expressly stated that many rumors about the treatment of the people do not at all correspond to the facts. I cannot be the judge of that. I have known him for many years, and I must say that in the past I really have always been able to take the truth of his words for granted.

SPIEGEL: The United States and the Federal Republic are disagreed on whether the military coup is a camouflaged Soviet intervention or the last attempt of the Poles to cope with the crisis in the country on their own.

Wischnewski: I don't think that the findings about the situation are very divergent, but the conclusions drawn from them definitely are. The Federal Republic adopts an attitude which is helpful to the Poles. The United States, by contrast, establishes fundamental positions. We are much more practical in that respect. We share the view of the Vatican that it is necessary to revive the dialogue.

SPIEGEL: Does a real chance for this exist?

Wischnewski: Quite obviously it does. Besides, the interests of the United States in this question are completely different from those of the Federal Republic. We are a country which lives on trade. By our own experience we know that you just cannot turn exports on and off like a water faucet. Nor do we, unlike the United States, have any crude oil and natural gas of our own. We have to buy them elsewhere — also from our Eastern neighbors. In any decision we need to make we must keep our own interests in mind in addition to the solidarity of the alliance. This also holds true for the case of Poland.

SPIEGEL: Can the Federal Government in the long-run resist the U.S. demand for sanctions against Moscow?

Wischnewski: We have ventured forward. Our policy has been entirely different from that of our most important ally. Now it is up to the Poles to provide a contribution which will confirm our stance. And they know it, too. Why do you think I talked turkey with Rakowski in private?

SPIEGEL: Is Schmidt isolated or will he be calling on U.S. President Reagan with the backing of the Europeans?

Wischnewski: We will not remain alone in Europe with our attitude. I think it would be good if the chancellor were capable of presenting President Reagan with not only the attitude of the Federal Government but also that of the European Community.

SPIEGEL: So far the French and the Italians have reacted much more sharply to the events in Poland than has Bonn.

Wischnewski: It is my impression that our French friends have intensified their thinking in the past few days. I do not wish to comment on the Italians at this time.

SPIEGEL: Abroad the Germans are sometimes suspected of being so fixed on detente policy that they paralyze themselves politically.

Wischnewski: It is natural that we must be more interested than others in the preservation of detente policy. I belonged to the grand coalition government where we sometimes had to decide Wednesday after Wednesday in cabinet sessions how many hours of truck waiting time on transit roads the Federal Government had to take care of, the costs involved, and so forth. After 12, 14 or 15 hours, never again do I want to have anything to do with such a situation. Naturally there is no other country that has transit roads, transit waterways and air corridors as we have. That is a factor of German policy.

SPIEGEL: Is there for this reason a special sensitivity of both German states in the Polish crisis?

Wischnewski: There is something in both German states that makes the Germans reflect. The Germans must always consider whether they are particularly suited to push forward when making a hard decision is involved; once Hitler said in 1939 that the Polish state has ceased to exist.

SPIEGEL: Where lies the point, do you think, where Bonn could show merely hardness?

Wischnewski: I would very much follow the judgment of the Catholic Church and of the Vatican who are much better informed about the situation in Poland. As long as they see a chance, I as a Social Democrat have no reason to take another stance.

SPIEGEL: The United States considers Jaruzelski a helper of the Soviets. Why do you consider him a Polish patriot?

Wischnewski: I know Mr Jaruzelski only by the description of others. But I know Polish communists who are also patriots.

SPIEGEL: Somebody speaking like that can easily be reproached of showing understanding for repression.

Wischnewski: The one who knows the Polish character will also know that measures taken from outside will have exactly the opposite effect of what we all want, namely lifting the martial law, releasing the interned people and resuming the dialogue.

SPIEGEL: So loud protest would just be harmful?

Wischnewski: One must have a clear attitude. One must say that most clearly to the Poles. But those who believe they can achieve something with economic pressure know nothing about Polish pride.

SPIEGEL: And yet: What will become of the East European people's right to protest against dictatorships if they only hear from the West that priority is given to stable relations between the blocs because world peace is more important than Poland?

Wischnewski: You have not heard such a formulation from me today.

SPIEGEL: Egon Bahr has used it.

Wischnewski: I stick to what I say in this matter and not to what others say. I have the impression that there is one chance as before for reasonable reforms and a continuation of the democratization process. But I also know that Poland is a country belonging to the Warsaw Pact and the COMECON.

SPIEGEL: What future model is realistic for Poland in the Soviet bloc, the Czechoslovak or the Hungarian model of liberal reform communism?

Wischnewski: I rather wish Poland the Hungarian model.

KOHL ACCUSES SCHMIDT OF ENDANGERING WEST'S UNITY

[Text] Bonn, 4 Jan (DPA) -- The opposition leader in the Bundestag, Helmut Kohl, has called upon Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to come to a clear agreement with the U.S. Government on the situation in Poland in his forthcoming talks with U.S. President Ronald Reagan. Kohl said in Bonn on Monday that there cannot be a successful German ostpolitik if it does not rest on a common basis of Western policy.

Kohl sharply criticized the Federal Government and accused it of putting at stake the friendship with the United States and the unity of the Western alliance for the sake of vague hopes about ostpolitik and detente. More and more often Germany is going its own way in its ostpolitik. Because of political opportunism, sections of the Federal Government and the SPD refuse to call a spade a spade in relation to violations of human rights in Poland, the USSR, the GDR and Afghanistan. All the more irresponsible is the SPD's, above all the chancellor's, criticism of U.S. policy toward the USSR. "This can only damage German interests."

The chairman of the Bundestag foreign policy committee, Rainer Barzel (CDU), has also spoken in favor of a joint Western line in the policy toward Poland, in an interview on Deutschlandfunk. The signals from Warsaw which had been hoped for had not materialized as yet. The aim of Western policy in the light of the joint Bundestag resolution has to be the end of martial law, the release of the detainees and the resumption of the dialogue between the government and the trade union. The spokesman of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group, Manfred Abelein, accused the government of sticking to "its illusionary policy of detente." This policy is dangerous and, in the long run, intolerable for the West and for the defense of its fundamental values.

CSU SPOKESMAN URGES SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR

[Text] Bonn, 4 Jan (DPA) -- The CSU has called upon the Federal Government to give up its "attitude of rejection" and at last agree with the U.S. President to undertake joint measures in the West against the Soviet Union.

The foreign policy spokesman of the CSU Land parliamentary group in Bonn, Count Hans Huyn, said that with their refusal Schmidt and Genscher are moving into "total isolation." The Federal Government has to abandon, as soon as possible, the position it has already lost between East and West anyway. Huyn spoke in favor of a halt to deliveries of Western electronic control devices to the Soviet Union.

WESTERN BANKERS HOPEFUL ON POLISH DEBT PAYMENTS

[Text] Frankfurt/Vienna, 4 Jan (DPA) -- Hope has risen among the Western creditor banks that Poland will soon pay the interest due for the last quarter of 1981, which amounts to $350 million. According to a spokesman of the Credit-Anstalt Bankverein [of Austria], who spoke to DPA today, the People's Republic of Poland has possibly managed in recent days to accumulate the greater part of the foreign exchange it needs. There is speculation that the USSR and other COMECON states have helped the brother country to do this. Signs of this are that the USSR has taken up loans on the Euromarket and allegedly increased sales of Russian gold in the West.

Frankfurt's banking circles reject as incorrect reports that Poland has already begun the repayment of interest on a large scale. Recent receipts were small sums covering earlier payments due. The payment of the $350 million is the precondition of the funding of loans which were already repayable at the end of 1981, amounting to $2.4 billion.

In the view of Guido Condrau, the spokesman of the Western creditor banks in Zurich, even after the payment of the outstanding interest further requests for loans from Warsaw can only be discussed once the funding contract has been signed. However, there was no firm date for this yet, as there had as yet been no contact with the military government.

DIE WELT COMMENTS ON ASPECTS OF POLISH AFFAIR

Yalta

[Carl Gustaf Stroehm commentary]

[Text] Federal Chancellor Schmidt has taken up the ominous key word "Yalta" -- to use it as a weapon and as an argument against the United States. In doing this, Schmidt defends Bonn's standpoint not to apply sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union. He argues that the decisions of the Yalta conference have divided Europe into a Western and an Eastern sphere. Those calling this border into question risk a new war.

Schmidt's approach to history has something in common with the known statement about a half full glass of beer: It is not absolutely wrong either to say that it is half empty. Yalta -- the Crimean spa where Stalin, Roosevelt and Churchill divided Europe among themselves in early 1945 -- still characterizes the picture of the world, but one must also add that this division has come about without cooperation of the most involved, namely the East European people who are also Europeans as the name says.

A so-called "peace order" based on the tutelage of East European nations -- including 17 million Germans in the "GDR" -- cannot last long. Future conflicts and catastrophes are almost inherent. It is not so much a matter of U.S. sanctions or earlier mistakes or stupidities of Washington's policy. How can Schmidt talk of a Europe desirable for us in the first floor, where statemen and economic experts will talk of cooperation and detente, while political prisoners are being skinned in the cellar?

As every human work in history, the Yalta decisions are also subjected to changes and alterations. The Final Act of Helsinki came after all many years after Yalta. There is certainly no need for a German Government chief to expose himself as a protagonist fighting against Yalta. He could at least indicate that he sees through the historic process taking place at present in the east of Europe.

'New Illusions'

[Ulrich Luecke commentary: "New Illusions"]

[Text] With their statement on the imposition of martial law in Poland the EEC foreign ministers have eliminated one illusion and created another. With the changed approach of the Germans who do not deny Moscow's interference and the responsibility of the Soviets for developments in Poland any more, it became possible to voice Soviet responsibility officially in the name of the 10 European Community states. This is at least some verbal rapprochement between the reactions of the United States and West Europe.

The rest of the declaration of the 10 states is as meager as was to be feared. The U.S. sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union, whose economic effect is debatable, will not be supported; but something is being promised that was not kept in the case of Afghanistan either: Europe will not torpedo the sanctions. Miracles would have to happen to keep this promise.

The main demand addressed to Warsaw is natural and obvious: the lifting of martial law, the release of the arrested, and the resumption of the dialogue between the state, the church and Solidarity. That was really the minimum the European Community had to come up with. Trying to label this as a success of European harmony is cynical.

But let us get back to the two new illusions. The possible visit of the new president of the European Council, Leo Tindemans, to Warsaw and Moscow would certainly be a demonstrative step. One knows how it would end after Lord Carrington's visit following the Soviet attack on Afghanistan. Even more illusory seemed Secretary of State Haig's demand for a special CSCE conference on Poland. All the people in the hall knew that it would not take place, but only the French said it.

Washington's disappointment regarding Europe's reaction -- some 3 weeks after the imposition of martial law in Poland -- will not decrease after this European Community conference. With every crisis in the world the gap between Europe and the United States seems to be growing. Europe is hardly harmonious in these days, it seems much rather pusillanimous.

CHEYSSON VIEWS EEC DISCUSSIONS OPTIMISTICALLY

[Summary] The EEC foreign ministers in Brussels discussed the Polish situation today.

"Our special correspondent in Brussels, Quentin (Dickinson), spoke to minister of external relations, Claude Cheysson, who said:

[Begin recording] The 10 have really made a common analysis of what constitutes the basis of the situation, of what it was that so moved the French population, what it was that created this great groundswell in France, a rejection of that yoke which has fallen and which, no matter whether the result of internal oppression or outside pressure, was unacceptable, is unacceptable. But an interesting idea was put forward, namely that the 10 could propose to all Western countries that they construct an important plan for the rehabilitation of the Polish economy, a plan which could be made jointly by all the Western countries for Poland, on condition that there is a return to the status quo before the coup." [end recording]

GOVERNMENT DENIES FOOD AID TO POLAND 'INTERRUPTED'

LD041754 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 4 Jan 82

[Text] The French Government today pointed out that food aid to Warsaw has never been interrupted by our country, as claimed by certain Polish officials.

No New Contracts

[Text] Paris, 4 Jan (AFP) -- French export deliveries to Poland under existing contracts are continuing as normal, but new contracts will not be signed for the time being, informed sources said here today. Because of the current situation, food aid to Poland will be granted as "humanitarian aid" so as to be more readily available to the Polish people, the source added.

Polish Deputy Foreign Minister Tadeusz Olechowski yesterday said on Warsaw Radio that Paris was applying "restrictions" to its normal trade with Poland. Following the proclamation of the state of siege by Warsaw, France had suspended a scheduled delivery to Poland of "important quantities of grain" as well as certain raw materials and semi-finished products, the minister charged.

French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy said today that French food aid to Poland took many forms and that several tons of grain due to be delivered to Poland had been milled into flour for immediate use by Poles. Some food aid was also subject to ratification by Poland of low-interest loans which might explain some delays, the prime minister suggested. Shortly after the Polish military clampdown, Mr Mauroy told parliament that French food aid to Poland would continue. But a trade official at the Polish Embassy in Paris, Aleksander Jung, was later informed that new food and financial deals were temporarily frozen because of the situation in his country.

SYRIA PROTESTS REMARKS ON GOLAN ANNEXATION

[Text] Syria has protested the statements made yesterday by Claude Cheysson. The charge d'affaires at the French Embassy in Damascus was summoned to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

He was given a protest by the Syrian Government. The French minister of external relations had said that the annexation of the Golan does not constitute a new element, an element which could alter the European decision to participate in the Sinai force.

In a communique Michele Cotta, chairman and managing director of Radio France, has announced the setting up of a mission on restructuring France-Inter's editorial staff. The mission will conclude its work by 1 March at the latest. [Text] [Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 30 Dec 81 LD]

COLOMBO SENDS NOTE TO GROMYKO ON POLAND SITUATION

LD041916 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 4 Jan 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Colombo has sent a message to his Soviet counterpart, Gromyko, in which he voiced the deep concern of Italians over the grave violations of human rights in Warsaw and over the role other East European countries have played and are playing in the Polish events.

Colombo pointed out [words indistinct] a meaning of instability for Europe from a Poland where internal repression was supported from outside. After reiterating Italy's willingness to resume detente, Colombo called on the Soviet Union to evaluate the importance events in Poland have to the relationship between East and West.

[Text] Rome, 4 Jan (ANSA) -- The widespread concern in Italy over the recent events in Poland were voiced by Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo in a message sent to his Soviet counterpart, Andrey Gromyko, today, according to the text of the message released by the Foreign Ministry here later.

The message, which was handed to Gromyko earlier today by the Italian ambassador in Moscow, cited not only the grave violations of human and civil rights in the East European state, but also the questions raised by the behavior of other East European states with respect to those violations. According to Colombo, in the Rome government's view, the continuation of repression enjoying external support against the Poles could become an important factor for instability in Europe. In this context, Colombo reiterated the Italian Government's commitment to a fruitful outcome of the Soviet-American talks in Geneva designed to reach an agreement on theater nuclear arms in Europe.

But he also voiced his confidence that the Soviet Government, and the Soviet Union, as a great and world power, would fully assess the importance of events in Poland for East-West relations.

SEARCH FOR DOZIER EXTENDED TO WIDER AREA

[Text] Verona, 5 Jan (ANSA) -- The massive search for the "people's prison" where Italy's Red Brigades terrorists are holding U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier, kidnapped here on December 17, was extended last night into the northeastern province of Pordenone following reports from the area of suspicious persons travelling in the province. Hundreds of roadblocks were thrown up overnight and house-by-house searches were begun by the Carabinieri military police and units commanding police dogs.

In Verona, where the hunt for the second in command of NATO land forces in southern Europe and his captors is headquartered, police and investigators are awaiting the brigades' third communique which is expected to announce the opening of a "people's trial" staged around the kidnap victim.

Sources close to the case here said in the evening that a breakthrough in the investigation may be in the offing and cited the departure in the evening of the general's son, Scott, for the United States to return to the West Point military academy and a more relaxed atmosphere evident around the general's wife, Judith, and daughter, Cheryl.

Two Arrested in Rome

[Text] Rome, 5 Jan (ANSA) -- Two heavily-armed young men thought to be terrorist suspects were nabbed by police late last night in downtown Rome. The youths, whose identities were not disclosed, were travelling in a car carrying three rifles, a hand grenade and a large supply of ammunition. Another pair of young men in the car fled when police moved in and were not captured.

POPE SAYS WORKERS HAVE RIGHT TO FREE TRADE UNION

[Text] Vatican City, 1 Jan (AFP) -- Pope John Paul II today described the free trade union Solidarity, suspended by the Polish authorities, as part of the heritage of workers in Poland and elsewhere, and an expression of what Polish workers had accomplished to ensure the true dignity of the worker. Speaking to a New Year's Day crowd of 50,000 in Saint Peter's Square, the pope said that workers had the right to set up free trade unions, whose role was to "defend their social, family and individual rights."

John Paul II told the crowd that he was speaking Italian, instead of his native Polish, as he had noticed many locals carrying banners reading "Solidarita", the Italian name of the Polish Union. The pope said he truly appreciated this support. But he added that another reason was that it was "difficult at this time for my countrymen to come to Rome."

Before prayers, the pope said that he had called on Our Lady of Jasna Gora to come to Poland's aid, recalling that 1982 was the jubilee year of the Polish Sanctuary. John Paul II said that the Polish crisis was important not only in the history of that country, but in that of mankind. The pope hoped that "prayer will become the strength of my compatriots as it has done so many times before over the centuries, that the heritage of freedom and peace, achievement of many centuries not be lost, that the heritage of human rights and liberty rediscovered over the last few months not be lost."

Earlier, saying mass in Saint Peter's to a congregation of 15,000, John Paul said that the "lack of peace around the world strengthens belief that peace is above all a gift from God for which we must ask divine mercy." The pope told the congregation that "man can become a slave in many different ways, when his freedom is curtailed, or when his rights are forefeited." He added that this is always and everywhere against peace, but that man may also become a slave through "abusing the freedom he enjoys," and that his inventions may turn against him. In this context the pontiff warned once again against nuclear war, citing the catastrophic predictions of a report he sent world leaders last month on the medical consequences of an atomic disaster.

DENMARK

SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT SEEN ONLY OPTION

PM050927 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 23 Dec 81 p 2

[Editorial: "Christmas Peace"]

[Text] So the acting prime minister has decreed political peace for Christmas. The politicians can go off for their Christmas vacations. Some are glad, others relieved, others disappointed -- and a large number of them are probably very uncertain. It is not an easy or a pleasant task for Anker Jorgensen to once again form a government, and the Social Democrats are not rejoicing over renewed government responsibility in the present tangled political situation. But it is a task which must be accepted since no one else is equal to it.

The much publicized four-leaf clover government [popular term for nonsocialist coalition] with the support of Glistrup is not and has never been the "alternative" it was claimed to be. A nonsocialist government with such a composition and with a one-sided policy of spending cuts as its foundation cannot be accepted. A meeting of the Social Democratic Folketing group evaluated the possibilities, not in a "dramatic" or "stormy" meeting but in a sober day-long exploratory debate which ended with the conclusion that a Social Democratic minority government is the only possibility. This involves the risk of further wear and tear on the Social Democrats, but this is the price of responsibility, and the party will have to pay it. After the failure of the negotiations between the Social Democrats, the Radical Liberals and the Socialist People's Party there has to be an exclusively Social Democratic government -- and the Folketing will have to share responsibility with it.

FINLAND

U.S. DIVIDED ON POLAND, EUROPE, MIDEAST

PM311331 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 22 Dec 81 p 2

[Rafael Paro editorial: "Reagan's European Policy"]

[Text] "If present trends continue, U.S. foreign policy will probably be in a state of general crisis in the spring of 1982. What makes matters perhaps even worse is that this could coincide with a serious economic decline, which could lead to the U.S. global position being jeopardized."

This prophecy, well-supported by an acute analysis, was published by Zbigniew Brzezinski in the New York TIMES MAGAZINE a week before the army seized power in Poland and the Israeli Government annexed the Golan Heights. Brzezinski was President Jimmy Carter's security policy adviser and is now professor of political science at Colombia University. Brzezinski listed four "potentially dangerous" situations for the spring. First, the failure of the Camp David peace process between Israel and Egypt through an Israeli refusal to hand back the rest of Sinai. Second, an economic collapse in Poland, giving the Russians the opening they have been waiting for. Third, a clear political deterioration in El Salvador, with a further swing to the left in Central America. And fourth, a sharp decline in U.S.-Chinese relations, brought on by the Reagan administration's decision to include a more sophisticated type of jet aircraft in arms sales to Taiwan.

With regard to Israel Brzezinski predicted that Begin will test Egyptian President Husni Mubarak's support for Camp David through unilateral actions, either with the aim of intensifying Egypt's isolation (and thus increasing the value to Israel of the Israeli-Egyptian peace agreement) or of laying the blame for a breakdown on Mubarak (and thus justifying Israel's failure to adhere to the Sinai settlement).

Menachem Begin's decision to annex the Golan Heights fits very well into this pattern. It is difficult to point to any real security reasons for annexing the occupied area. On the other hand, it was in foreign policy terms a particularly charged action, something of a torpedo against the whole Camp David process, a hard test not only for Mubarak but also for the United States. Mubarak is closely identified with As-Sadat and with the murdered leader's pro-U.S. orientation. Mubarak's opponents in Egypt will be able to use such a turn of events against him, Brzezinski points out.

Brzezinski's criticism of the U.S. attitude to developments in Poland is if anything even more interesting, since it came just before the military takeover on 13 December. According to Brzezinski, the U.S. administration has been paralyzed over the Polish question: "Influential officials in the White House and the Defense Department actually put forward views like 'the worse, the better' -- suggesting that a collapse in Poland triggering a Soviet invasion would be a major setback for the Soviet Union."

Brzezinski's revelations of the arguments in Washington deepen the Polish crisis. It has been known that certain U.S. officials and politicians, for example, have been tempted to slow down the Poles' attempts to have their enormous debts in the West settled, for instance, through membership in the IMF.

Why have the hawks in Washington wanted to bring about a collapse in Poland -- "the worse, the better"? Rabid anticommunism is not an adequate explanation. The idea that disintegration in Poland would also weaken the Soviet Union's position is bound to be of some importance here. But the most important line of thinking has probably been that a violent showdown -- ideally in the form of clear Soviet military interference -- would make an active contribution to taking the sting out of "West European neutralism."

Judging by all appearances West European neutralism is a considerable headache for the Reagan administration. The relatively restrained official West European reactions to recent events in Poland are described as expressions of "moral disarmament." However, it looks at the same time as if the U.S. administration has missed its chances of taking the most practicable course, as Brzezinski, for example, describes it: "Consolidation of the Polish situation could in the long-run lead to much better relations between East and West and a gradual repair of European divisions."

Both Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights, and developments in Poland and West European reaction have frustrated Washington. James Reston, the New York TIMES' respected correspondent, writes in his column from the U.S. capital that one of the questions currently being asked there is whether U.S. involvement in Europe and the Middle East can continue indefinitely. Everybody seems to be possessed by the idea that they can go their own way. And if we are not careful the United States too could start to have the same reservations and change over to an isolationist course, Reston says.

Such reports clearly show that those who accused the Reagan administration of having no carefully prepared foreign policy were right. Assertions that the one hand does not know what the other is doing also seem to be true. The U.S. foreign policy decisionmaking process caused the whole of Europe considerable headaches in Jimmy Carter's day. With Ronald Reagan at the tiller the headaches just seem to get bigger and more ominous.

If President Reagan and his men consciously or unconsciously force the West Europeans to the view that the United States is more interested in confrontation than in detente -- in the case of Poland, for example -- this will have extremely far-reaching repercussions on international groupings.

The breakdown of the Polish attempt to find a compromise was the last thing West Europe wanted. Washington's moral indignation is no consolation, least of all if things are as Brzezinski and other observers have hinted -- that the U.S. Government actually preferred a collapse.

NORWAY

POLISH EVENTS SHOW COMMUNIST SYSTEM'S AIMS

PM311219 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 24 Dec 81 p 2

[Editorial: "It Did Not Come To Pass"]

[Excerpt] Today's text begins with the famous words: "And it came to pass in those days." In these days, 1981 years later, something very different is coming to pass: Our neighbors who are now having their dreams of freedom crushed are being inundated with fine sounding words, but also with hints that the tragedy of the last few days is really their own fault. If only they had not been so hasty in their zeal for reforms, if only they had taken their time, then the dream could have become a reality. As it is, things could only be expected to go as they have gone. Such an argument comes much too close to something which morally should be avoided -- laying the blame on the crime's victim, not on its perpetrator. It is a naive but widespread assumption that socialist or communist societies are "really" well-disposed toward reform and aim at loosening their method of rule. This axiom is to be found in certain fundamental texts. But unlike what is described in today's other basic text, this has never come to pass.

What will come to pass now can also be found in the old texts, if not in the scriptures. It is to be found in Moscow's articles of faith. True, these are based on the organization of the communist party -- any communist party -- but fully available for use as a compass by those who intend to consolidate their military takeover in Poland. It was asserted with unbending toughness and tirelessness when the Czech reforms were crushed after the 1968 invasion: "Any organization which wishes to join the Communist International must be consistent and systematic in its removal of all reformists and centrists from all more or less responsible positions... and replace them with loyal communists."

These are the rules. And if they are followed, all creative intellectuals will be transferred to poorly-paid hard labor. Those who have a talent for learning their party lesson will rule the country. They are the loyal communists. They are all those who know when to applaud but can do little else. Some of the outcasts will be allowed to leave the country and settle abroad -- where they will meet former political allies, socialists with faith in reforms who will try to tell them that the system which has suffered political and economic shipwreck in Poland "really" is valuable, progressive and good and, in the final analysis, has plans to liquidate itself. There is only one thing to be said about this faith -- it has nothing to do with the facts. For that is not what has come to pass.

BILL FOR SUBMARINE AFFAIR TO BE GIVEN TO USSR

PM050949 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 23 Dec 81 p 5

[TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA report]

[Text] The Swedish Defense Ministry is now collecting the bills for the submarine affair. Now that the Swedish Armed Forces commander in chief has presented a rundown of the armed forces' costs, the ministry has a bill totaling 8,187,310 kronor, 30 ore. The armed forces' bill which was presented on Tuesday [22 December] covers superintending and carrying out the salvage operation, towing the submarine, seaworthiness inspections, surveillance and the emergency measures taken in case it became necessary to rescue the crew.

However, total armed forces' costs are even greater and are still being assessed. The Karlshamn Harbor authority has presented a bill for salvage fees. The port supplied two tugs and wants 2.5 million kronor for them. In addition there have been other expenses amounting to 173,012 kronoer.

The customs service kept a watch on the submarine and this cost 362,198 kronor, 30 ore. "The Defense Ministry will now look at the bills. They will then be sent for further inspection to the Foreign Ministry before a suitable sum is proposed to the Soviet Union," Undersecretary Sven Hirdman told TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA.

USSR THREATENS PROCEEDINGS AGAINST JOURNALIST

LD041206 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1130 GMT 4 Jan 82

[Text] The Soviet ambassador, Yakovlev, this morning requested to be received by the Undersecretary of State for Foreign Affairs Leif Leifland. Yakovlev said that the DAGENS NYHETER correspondent in Moscow, Staffan Teste, has collected military information and that it would be in the interests of relations between Sweden and the Soviet Union if Teste is recalled. The Soviet authorities warn that otherwise they will take legal proceedings against Teste because he has violated the law. Leif Leifland says in his answer to the Soviet ambassador that the Soviet Union is again coming forward with the same veiled threats as before. Leifland regards this as a crude attempt to silence a journalist who puts forward awkward opinions about the Soviet system.

[Excerpt] DAGENS NYHETER has decided to recall Staffan Teste as correspondent in Moscow. Soviet Ambassador Yakovlev threatened today that measures would be taken against Teste if he returns to Moscow after the holidays. At DAGENS NYHETER Bengt Dennis, editor in chief and publisher of the paper, said that the ambassador's threatening declaration has resulted in DAGENS NYHETER considering it reasonable that Teste does not return to Moscow.

PAPER VIEWS EFFECT OF U.S. SANCTIONS ON UK TRADE

PM311305 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 31 Dec 81 p 4

[Report by business correspondent Roland Green]

[Text] British companies stand to lose important new contracts for equipment for the new Siberian gas pipeline into Western Europe if sanctions are introduced on Russian trade.

The orders, worth more than 150 million pounds represent the most important addition of Russian business since the "thaw" in Anglo-Soviet relations.

The British companies expressed concern yesterday on two counts. They are worried by the outright loss of business and the United States decision to suspend licences for American equipment to be used in construction of the pipeline route.

John Brown, the Clydebank engineering firm, has orders worth 104 million pounds for gas turbine and spares for the pipeline. The company said: "We are keeping in very close touch with the situation and we have no plans to alter our existing production programme."

Other companies with pipeline business include Ruston, the General Electric subsidiary, with a contract worth 29.7 million pounds for gas turbines and Plenty of Newbury which is supplying 20 million pounds worth of fuel gas conditioning equipment.

In addition, Rediffusion has won a contract to provide data processing equipment worth 8.5 million pounds.

Trade department officials are attempting to clear up ambiguities in the United States announcement as the government considers whether to follow President Reagan's sanctions lead.

It is not clear whether the embargo will affect British or other foreign subsidiaries of United States companies. If the pattern set in Iranian sanctions is followed, they will be exempt.

But the loss of access to United States licences and equipment could be a blow to several companies. Some British companies faced problems in supplying spares and equipment originating in America for Libyan contracts after the United States decision to impose sanctions against Col al-Qadhdhafi's regime.

Britain has a substantial deficit on trade with Russia, largely because of diamonds. Precious stones accounted for 365 million pounds worth of Russian imports last year.

Exports totalled 421 million pounds and consisted mainly of electrical, mechanical and specialised engineering machinery.

Textile and clothing deliveries were worth 44 million pounds and office machinery, mainly Rank Xerox photo-copiers, 14 million pounds. Iron and steel exports were worth 45 million pounds.

Russia was at one time an important Eastern European market for ICL, the computer firm, but new business has dried up in recent years.

Imperial Chemical Industries is hoping to build up exports to 50 million pounds a year by 1985 under terms of a new trade agreement for deliveries of dyes, pigments and other chemicals.

WESTERN RIFT OVER POLAND 'OUT OF FOCUS'

PM041509 London THE SUNDAY TELEGRAPH in English 3 Jan 82 p 16

[Editorial]

[Text] Dismay at the rift in the Western alliance over Poland, though understandable and healthy, is also a little out of focus. It has been overplayed in some aspects, yet underplayed in others. The rumpus over the failure of America's European partners immediately to match President Reagan's limited economic sanctions against Russia -- seen as the prime mover behind General Jaruzelski -- is, for example, unreasonable. Those partners were not consulted about the American measures and were given only a few hours' notice of their implementation.

America, whether Republican or Democratic, always tends to take a more moralistic approach to world affairs than her more pragmatic European partners. Moreover, as the super-power in the alliance, it falls to her anyway to give the lead. A further difference lies in that very economic field in which President Reagan has chosen to fire his first warning shots against both the repressive military regime in Warasw and its Kremlin sponsors. The trade sanctions he has announced will cost his own country very little, since America's exports to the Soviet Union have already fallen by nearly 60 per cent from their 1979 levels. It is a very different story with the Common Market, whose trade with Russia has risen by more than a quarter.

Particularly in the economic sphere, therefore, it is unrealistic ever to expect the Western alliance to proceed in perfect step, as the ragged marching which followed the sanctions move over Afghanistan demonstrated two years ago. What is, of course, vital is that the Europeans should not be seen to lag too far behind the Americans, let alone trip them up. As Mrs Thatcher said in her new year message, the West must stand together on Poland, even if Europe cannot follow Mr Reagan's lead entirely. Tomorrow's meeting of the EEC foreign ministers in Brussels will reflect this attitude.

But what has not received all the attention it deserves in this commotion is the vast gap in both philosophy and evaluation which yawns between Washington and Bonn. It is Chancellor Schmidt who is out on a trembling limb (even compared with his other European partners) over his "softly-softly" stance towards Moscow. He has been pushed there partly by West Germany's need to maintain economic and political contact with the East; partly by the pernicious pro-Soviet pressure of colleagues like his predecessor in office, Willy Brandt; and partly, no doubt, by his own ambitions to play the calm interpreter in the heated dialogue between East and West.

But things have, indeed, reached a sorry pass when all this prompts his official spokesman, Herr Kurt Becker, publicly to disavow Mr Reagan's stated view that Russia was behind the Warsaw crackdown. NATO as an alliance can have only one intelligence appreciation, and its secretary-general, Dr Luns, promptly rebuked Herr Becker for pretending this could be otherwise. Whether General Jaruzelski jumped or was pushed down not alter the nature of the force pressing at his back.

We must charitably assume that the Bonn spokesman was only indulging in some public relations on behalf of his chancellor. The alternative is too gloomy to contemplate, for if two major NATO powers are at odds in interpreting a blatant military crackdown in Poland, how are they going to manage when some dire emergency looms up to threaten the alliance itself?

ROLANDHIS PROTESTS RECENT TURKISH ACTIVITIES

[Text] The Cyprus Government has lodged a complaint with the great powers and the permanent members of the UN Security Council in connection with the recent activities by Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots that have increased tension over the Cyprus problem. President Kiprianou today, opening the third congress of Cypriots living abroad, also referred in Nicosia to the Turkish moves aimed at creating a climate of blackmail. He stressed that the necessary steps have been taken and that the great powers and the permanent members of the Security Council have been briefed on the consequences of this new Turkish adventurism.

Foreign Minister Rolandhis today summoned separately the ambassadors of the permanent members of the Security Council and drew their attention to recent activities by Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot leaders. Rolandhis also discussed the same question with the Greek ambassador.

During his meetings with the ambassadors of the five Security Council permanent members, Rolandhis denied as "totally unfounded" statements and reports of Turkish origin about the alleged reinforcement of the republic's armed forces through the arrival in Cyprus of men and war materiel from Greece. Rolandhis said the statements and reports from the Turkish side are aimed at causing the wrong impression, probably to cause tension at a moment when Turkey should have focused its attention on the talks if it really possessed the political will to solve the Cyprus problem. Rolandhis did not rule out the likely existence of other Turkish goals, such as the declaration of a Turkish state, about which many things were said in the past by Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots.

Finally, Rolandhis stressed to the five ambassadors the government's devotion to the solution of the Cyprus problem through peaceful means, based on the UN resolutions and the summit agreements.

TURKS INSTALLING 'ELECTRONIC DEVICES' IN NORTH

NC041233 Nicosia ALITHIA in Greek 4 Jan 82 p 8

[Dhim. Zannidhis report]

[Excerpt] Athens, 3 Jan -- According to the latest information, in addition to the reinforcement of Turkish troops and materiel in the occupied territories, as revealed by us last week and without the slightest official denial, the Turkish military technical corps and electronic specialists of the Defense Ministry research service in Ankara have arrived in the occupied territories. They have undertaken to build an electronically equipped base for spying and collecting information from the Greek areas.

With the installation of these electronic "eyes," the Turkish occupation troops also want -- besides checking telecommunications in the free territories -- to control the sea and airspace in northern Cyprus. The Turks have begun installing these electronic "eyes" on Pentadaktylos, at a site in Karavas and at the occupied airport of Tymbou. (Let the Turks not hasten to deny this information because we will cite pertinent details next week.)

ATHENS MEETING LED TO U.S. MOVE AGAINST TURKEY

NC041218 Nicosia I DHILINI in Greek 4 Jan 82 p 1

[Text] Athens, 4 Jan -- According to well-informed sources, the last meeting by Greek Prime Minister Panadreou with the leader of the official opposition party, Kliridhis, contributed greatly to the Cyprus issue being viewed constructively by Western officials. According to the information, this meeting contributed to the United States' intervening and pointing out to Turkey that it will not tolerate a new Turkish military move in Cyprus or any military activity to change the Aegean "status quo."

The U.S. intervention was considered an indirect guarantee of Greece's eastern borders, as Papandreou had urgently set before the Western alliance. However, this Western action was not taken to satisfy Greece only, but primarily and mainly to secure NATO'S south-eastern wing, which would disintegrate should there be a military conflict in Cyprus or Greece. As Mr Papandreou said clearly: "A war in Cyprus means a war between Greece and Turkey on all fronts."

PAPANDREOU ANNOUNCES FURTHER ECONOMIC MEASURES

[Excerpts] Good evening and happy new year: On starting the new year I would like to talk to you tonight about a number of changes pertaining to our domestic situation. Foreign affairs -- our relations with the rest of the world -- are certainly very important. Our success, however, in creating a new future for our society will be determined by our capability to solve our economic and social problems. We must change many things: the structure of production and, particularly, of industry and agriculture; the distribution of national income; the operation of our financial and credit systems, and the relation between the government and citizens. Above all, however, we must change our stance as individuals toward society as a whole.

In my previous speech I pointed out that the new year which has just begun is a narrow passage through which we must successfully pass to enter the period of implementing the 1983-87 5-year plan for economic and social development; the Symplegades Rocks we have to pass through are depression and inflation. The first batch of measures, in conjunction with the second batch being announced tonight, are aimed at removing the country's economy from the vicious circle of stagflation and placing it on an upward and socially just course. However, we should always remember what we have inherited from the previous government. We have taken over a mass of problems and obligations which are impossible to solve from one moment to the other. It is necessary to confront this state of affairs as soon as possible. For its part, the government will do all that is required by the circumstances. The success of our efforts, however, depends on the everyday and general support and cooperation of the people, of which we are certain.

As I noted at the end of the first batch of measures, which were announced on 13 December, our target is to rescue our country's economy from the complete stagnation of last year and to exert efforts toward increasing the gross national product. In order to attain this goal, it is necessary to activate our entire productive potential, which today is underemployed, and start new investments in order to increase both production and productivity. In this effort, the role of private initiative will be of particular significance, as well as the role of public investments and the program of investments by public enterprises and organizations. Today's measures includes measures for the new incentives in industry as well as for the activation of those problematic enterprises wich are viable.

I should note that in our philosophy the revival of the economy and the redistribution of income are interlinked. A legislative measure adopted by the previous government for offering incentives toward strengthening regional and economic development is the well-known Law 1,116 of 1981. This law has the following basic disadvantage: While it offers strong incentives encouraging private investment, it does not offer any substantive safeguard in controlling and appraising the proposed investment plans. For this reason, the government has decided to proceed immediately with the formulation of a new institutional framework aimed at decisively promoting initiative for investments in the private sector. This framework will include the following characteristics: The backing to be granted will be closely linked with the targets of the more general government strategy for development. It will give particular emphasis to regional development and decentralization of economic activities, but in accordance with priorities dictated by the degree of problems faced by each area. There also will be a completely decentralized system of assessing applications for submission to the status of the new law, and there will be appropriate departments to appraise and follow the implementation of the subsidized projects.

Various criteria will be used to appraise the investment proposals which aim at strengthening employment, promoting exports and providing substitutes for imports, conserving energy, developing technology, and protecting the environment. Therefore the evaluation of investments will aim at determining first, the expediency of investment from the point of view of the national economy; second, the prospects of the viability of the enterprise from the private sector's economic viewpoint; and third, the true investment contribution by the private organizations.

And now regarding our investments and production policy for 1982. The main target of the government's production and investments policy in 1982 will be to cleanse and mobilize the country's productivity potential, primarily in the sector of handicraft and industrial enterprises, which are literally suffering from a perpetual crisis and face conditions of uncertainty in the future. The problems which cause hardship to productive enterprises -- primarily the small and medium-sized -- are many. These are problems of financing, modernization of machinery and equipment, orientation of production, marketing of products and productivity in a wider sense. For this reason the government is taking measures to assist in the quick restoration and full utilization of the existing productive potential of the economy. This priority is dictated by the need for speedy production from investments and is closely linked with combating of inflation and the perpetuated depression and unemployment. The control over bank credits will play a significant role in the efforts to make an economy recovery. This control will be exercised in a manner that will safeguard the produtive utilization of the people's savings and avoid their leaking into profiteering investments, as has been the case to a big extent hitherto.

The measures announced in the first batch are now completed, with new incentives which in general aim at full utilization of the existing economic potential and in particular at mobilizing the huge productive potential of the small and medium enterprises. Soon Coordination Minister Lazaris will announce a series of special measures for the small and medium enterprises which are of decisive importance for the national efforts toward development.

With regard to foreign investments: As has already been announced, the government accepts the investment of foreign capital in our country with the proviso that these investments also be in the interest of the Greek economy. Exceptionally pleasant to note is the fact that today foreign firms, state or banking organizations are expressing strong interest in developing investment activity in our country. The government's decision is to utilize, to the highest degree possible, the interest of foreign investors and for this purpose the following measures will be adopted immediately.

1. A department will be established in the Ministry of Coordination to deal with orientation, information and evaluation of foreign investments. This department will ensure that foreign investment activity harmonizes with the country's development program, while at the same time it will put an end to the inadmissible situation of overrating foreign investments, which causes high tax evasion and loss of foreign exchange. This new department, in cooperation with departments of other ministries and the investment banks, will prepare a plan of mixed enterprises. Special attention will be given to utilizing Arab interests in the Greek economy and to realizing interstate agreements which have already been signed, such as the one with Iraq.

2. For the fuller exploration of the international money market and the promotion of investment programs with foreign investors, the institution of commercial attaches and consular authorities will be reformed radically to enable the dynamic promotion of Greek interests abroad. Of course the credits policy is also directly linked with this investments program.

Invigorating the economy and realizing the investments program, which I have outlined, certainly presuppose a credits policy which, without feeding inflation, creates favorable conditions for the offering and disposition of the necessary financial resources. The credits policy which we will follow will actually secure the financial sources through the attainment of our production targets.

In statements I made in the past I stressed that we do not believe in monetarism. We believe inflation will be hit decisively through measures that change the production structure, as we are planning, and not through the suffocating restraint of the bulk of credits. I do not believe last year's high rate of inflation was due only to the relatively high increase of credits. On the contrary, I feel inflation is mainly due to the high leakage of credits to profiteering or other unproductive activities.

In order to secure the monetary resources for financing our production targets and in order to hit inflation hard, we will proceed with a radical change in the credits system:

1. A bill will be submitted soon to the Chamber of Deputies for abolition of the Monetary Committee.

2. The credits policy is determined by the government. Exercising and supervising the credits policy are assigned to the Bank of Greece, which will be reorganized to play the role of a central bank.

3. Within the framework of the government's credits policy, the Bank of Greece will determine the total amount of credits necessary to finance the programs and the general terms and regulations for the granting of credits from various sources.

4. A strict and systematic control of trusts will be conducted by the Bank of Greece departments to establish that grant of credits by the banks and their use by the financed enterprises are in concord with the government's economic policy and the credit rules. Violations will be punished severely through the imposition of monetary sentences and the existing procedures will be simplified.

Now I proceed to one of the actually direct and huge problems facing the government and our economy -- the overindebted enterprises. As also stressed in the policy statement, the government intends to end the inadmissible status of the overindebted enterprises, which is a result of the credits unaccountability and leakage of credits to profiteering investments. Of course, we are aware that the concept of socializing enterprises or sectors has been pondered over by many people and has created strong interest. At this point, I would like to take a stand on this so significant problem. The government's policy of socialization aims at securing social control over certain basic sectors which could be described as sectors (?of cleansing) for the effective mobilization of all productive forces of the country. Already a large number of enterprises and organizations in these sectors are under state control either in the form of controlling interest -- such as banks, insurance companies, the Elevsis shipyards -- or in the form of public organizations, as the case with the energy sector, telecommunications, mass transportation and enterprises of common utility.

The administrative councils of all organizations under state control -- banks, insurance companies, public organizations and corporations such as the public power corporation, Greek telecommunications organization, Greek railways organizations, urban communications organization and so forth, public utility corporations as well as all public law corporations -- will also include elected representatives of the working people and representatives of local self-government in cases where the activities of these organizations are related to local self-government.

More specifically, with regard to the insurance companies, the government is proceeding with the establishment of a unitary insurance organization through the unification of the insurance organizations of banks which are under state control. A supervisory council will be established for the big enterprises which are exploiting the country's mineral wealth, big shipbuilding yards, the steel, cement and fertilizer industries, as they do not fall in the category of problematic and indebted enterprises. This council will include representatives elected from among the employees in the enterprise, representatives of the local self-government and the public, and of course representatives of the management of the enterprise.

This council will harmonize the program and policy of the enterprise, as it may be shaped by its administrative council, with the government's development programs and, of course, the national interest in general.

With regard to the socialization of the pharmaceutical industry, the government will proceed in 1982 with the preparation of a feasibility study for the establishment of a national pharmaceutical industry. In its first phase the national pharmaceutical industry will proceed with the production of patent medicines and other pharmaceutical products on the basis of imported raw material and, probably, also in cooperation with the private Greek pharmaceutical industries. In the second stage the national pharmaceutical industry will proceed with the local production of active ingredients.

State activity in the investment field is also important. The public investments budget, the budgets for public corporations and organizations and initiatives by the state investments banks will contribute decisively to the investment drive in 1982.

Our basic steps will be: To reexamine the feasibility of all projects at the central and regional levels; to decentralize this program at the provincial level as well as at the local self-government level; and to promote public investments based on two basic criteria, that is, the criterion of social benefit, such as investments in the field of education, health and so forth, and of productivity, such as land improvement projects and so forth. However, it must be noted that one of the most important problems being faced today is the total expenditure for projects not completed. This expenditure exceeds 250 billion drachmas and as a result the flexibility to adjust the public investments budget to the needs of the government development strategy is impeded. Of course the situation will improve considerably when the feasibility of developing projects is reexamined.

The investment programs of public corporations and organizations -- such as the public power corporation, the Greek telecommunications organization, the Greek railway organization, the urban communications organization and the military industry -- will be restructured to increase their effectiveness and to considerably reduce their deficit. The investment activities of banks -- such as the Hellenic Industrial Development Bank, the agrarian bank, the estate bank, the national investments bank for industrial development and so forth -- constitute, for the government, a decisive factor in the realization of the basic goals for self-sufficient development.

A few words about control of prices and costs: Within the framework of its general social and economic policy, the government is determined to intervene wherever necessary to set the price of important products as part of its policy to control prices and costs. In this policy our goal is to restrict unjustified price increases and to protect the Greek people's income. Control of prices and costs will be coordinated with measures that will protect the consumer from the adulteration of and bad-quality products. It will also aim at improving the structure of the Greek economy and at combatting the paraeconomy. But beyond all this, our policy in this field is a necessary step toward achieving social justice. Redistributing the national income in favor of low salaries is not enough. There should be a corresponding redistribution between compensation for work and profits in a way that should not harm the investments activity (?to be carried out) through other means.

In conclusion, I would like to stress that the fulfillment of our goals in 1982 is an indispensable prerequisite for shaping a dynamic development program for the 1983-87 period. But this has as a prerequisite the cooperation and support of the people.

I am sure the Greek people, with their unerring sense of judgment, understand all the difficulties we are facing as a result of the situation we have inherited and as a result of the more general world crisis. I believe everyone will show the necessary restraint in putting forward demands that do not promote the social and national interest. I also hope the working people of the country, for whom the state has already furnished practical proof of its interest in them, will contribute actively to increasing productivity. Success in this field is of decisive importance for cleansing the economy and for further developing the economic status of the working people themselves.

I am sure the course of time and the needs of change will require further, additional measures. The measures I have announced are necessary so that we may make the vision of change a tangible reality for the sake of safeguarding our national independence and consolidating national control over our economic and political life. The targets that we have set for 1982 may appear to be ambitious because of the current economic situation, but we are ambitious. We believe they are feasible. With the determination of the government -- the government of change -- and the people's active support, we will succeed. We will lay down together the foundations for a fresh course of the country, a course that will be nationally proud and socially fair.

Good night, and thank you.

KHARALAMBOPOULOS REJECTS TURKISH STATEMENT

NC042126 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 4 Jan 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos, referring to a statement by Turkish Foreign Ministry Director General Gurun distorting a statement by Prime Minister Papandreou, has said the following:

It is surprising, indeed amazing, that in a recent statement Turkish Foreign Ministry Director General Gurun attempted to distort a statement by the Greek prime minister and to ascribe to him aggressive intentions and provocations against Turkey. (?I particularly judge) the allegation by the Turkish Foreign Ministry director general about the so-called violation of the Turkey's airspace by Greek military aircraft a thing which, as he perfectly knows, never happened.

Mr Kharalambopoulos added: In fact it is precisely the opposite that happened. The repeated provocations, violations of Greek sovereignty and statements by Turkish political leaders leave no room for misinterpretation as to the true situation in the Aegean which, in essence, constitutes an open threat against Greece. The prime minister of Greece made it clear when he was in the opposition, and he has made it clear recently as prime minister, that Greece claims absolutely nothing from Turkey, but that at the same time we consider unacceptable any Turkish claims on Greece.

Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos concluded: Therefore Mr Gurun's statement, supported by Turkish press reports every day, do not contribute to the creation of the climate of peace that is necessary for good neighborliness and for the promotion of relations of friendship between the two countries.

Mr Gurun, director general of the Turkish Foreign Ministry, made a statement claiming that Papandreou's attitude toward Turkey has been aggressive even when he was in the opposition and that it is being continued now that he is in power. He also claimed that the violation of Turkish airspace by Greek aircraft, as well as the arming of the Aegean islands, are the cause of still greater tension in the Aegean area.

In addition, the newspaper HURRIYET says Turkey's permanent delegate to NATO, Olcay, has briefed the NATO secretary general on Greece's attitude. The paper adds that Gurun stated that because of the interruption of the talks between the directors general of the foreign ministries of the two countries there cannot be a dialogue between Greece and Turkey at ambassador level and that the problems in the Aegean, instead of being reduced, are increasing.

A government spokesman has described as strange and suspicious the propaganda being carried in the Turkish press, which is trying to create a climate different from the one that was created following the recent NATO ministerial session. The spokesman said: The government believes these activities constitute a diversionary action by the Turkish Government following the battle in Brussels, where all Turkish provocations and violations of Greek sovereignty were explained clearly at the defense ministers conference, with specific reference to statements by Turkish officials. Obviously this Turkish press campaign is aimed at destroying the climate that was created at the NATO session.

The spokesman added: The government, and particularly the foreign minister, have instructed all Greek ambassadors abroad to brief foreign governments on this issue. The Foreign Ministry has given similar instructions to Greek delegates in Brussels to brief the NATO and EEC headquarters on the recent propaganda activities by Ankara.

PAPANDREOU FIRES DEPUTY FOREIGN MINISTER FOTILAS

DEFENSE COUNCIL APPOINTS NEW MILITARY CHIEFS

[Text] The Supreme National Defense Council held a meeting this morning under the chairmanship of Prime Minister and National Defense Minister Papandreou. The council selected Vice Adm Theodhoros Deyiannis, chief of the fleet, as chief of the National Defense General Staff and promoted him to admiral. The council held another meeting attended by the new chief of staff and made the following decisions:

Lt Gen Dhimitrios Panagopoulos, commander of the 3d Corps, to be chief of the Army General Staff. Rear Adm Odhisseas Kapetos, commander of naval training, to be chief of the Navy General Staff and promoted to vice admiral. Air Force Lt Gen Nikolaos Kouris, first deputy chief of the General Staff, to be chief of the Air Force General Staff.

Furthermore, at their own request the chiefs of the general staffs have been retired. The council has awarded them the following: General Gratsios, chief of the General Staff, the title of honorary chief of staff; Lieutenant General Karayiannis, chief of the Army General Staff, the rank of retired general and the title of honorary chief of the Army General Staff; Vice Admiral Konofaos, chief of the Navy General Staff, the rank of retired admiral and the title of honorary chief of the Navy General Staff; Air Force Lt Gen Papayeoryiou, chief of the Air Force General Staff, the rank of retired air force general and the title of honorary chief of the Air Force General Staff.

The installation of the new National Defense chief of staff will take place today. Prime Minister Papandreou will receive the new chief and the new chiefs of the three military branches this evening at Kastri.

TURKMEN: NO ASIA DEFENSE ARC AGAINST USSR LIKELY

NC041431 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 29 Dec 81 pp 1, 13

[Report on interview with Foreign Minister Turkmen by correspondent Nur Batur in Ankara -- date not given]

[Text] In reporting to TERCUMAN on his visit to the People's Republic of China, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen stated that China attaches great importance to Turkey and wishes to establish closer relations with it. Turkmen said China's desire to establish closer relations with Turkey stems from the fact that it attaches great importance to the world strategic balance. "China," he said, "desires the preservation of the present military and political equilibrium between East and West."

Stating that immense possibilities exist in developing economic, cultural, and technical relations between the two countries, Turkmen summed up the present state of relations with China as follows: "China, which has recently begun to pursue an active policy in the international arena, is a supporter of the Third World. Events in Afghanistan and Kampuchea concern China very much. When it looks at matters from a global view, China attaches great importance to Turkey. One of China's international objectives is preservation of the present political and military equilibrium between the East and West. China does not desire to see its security impaired as a result of an imbalance in these relations."

When we asked Turkmen whether he thought future relations between Turkey and China could develop into relations of solidarity in the international arena, he said: "If you mean by solidarity an organic arrangement, such a thing should not be thought of. As a matter of fact, we do not think the emergence of a new organization in addition to the existing ones can serve any useful purpose. As you know, we do not favor organic ties in the Middle East."

When we asked him, "What should the Asian countries do against the Soviet threat?" Turkmen replied: "After the events in Afghanistan, the open Soviet threat to Southwest Asia has manifested itself in greater dimensions in the Iranian-Iraqi conflict. And yet there are no signs in Southwest Asia of an organization opposing this threat. Undoubtedly the countries in the region should increase their own security. Several states are doing this. What is more, they are cooperating with countries outside their area for their defense. The measure to be taken against this threat should materialize through the desire and the initiative of the states in the area."

When we asked him whether a new defensive arc, starting from Asia, was being contemplated to oppose the Soviet expansionist policy, Turkmen replied: Such an arc cannot materialize. It would be incorrect to attempt such a thing. We have seen that pacts like CENTO and SEATO served absolutely no useful purpose. As a matter of fact, solidarity has already emerged among states opposing this threat. A natural harmony materializes in the policies of all the states that cherish the same view in confronting the same threat."

Responding to a question as to whether "a tie is being contemplated among some of the countries you have so far visited and those which head of state Evren intends to visit in the near future, since some of these countries too are under the Soviet threat," the foreign minister said: "It is not correct to form a link among all these visits. The honorable head of state's visit to Pakistan was above all inspired by the traditional friendship between Turkey and Pakistan, while his visits to Bulgaria, Romania and Yugoslavia are concerned with our neighbors in the Balkan region. It is incorrect to try to form a link among these visits."

Turkmen continued: "Turkish foreign policy is based on extremely frank and complementary elements. The trouble is that some individuals or circles are trying hard to attach a label to Turkish foreign policy. We do not pursue a foreign policy which would be explained through labels or slogans. Our foreign policy enjoys flexibility in the assessment of world and regional issues. We show similar flexibility in our fundamental preferences. A foreign policy that is not based on some form of flexibility is the worst foreign policy.

"Turkey's importance is stressed not so much because of the active role it can play in the Middle East but because of its presence in the area as a strong and stable state.

"It would serve no useful purpose if Turkey came forward at this time and said: 'I will play a role.' One of the main prerequisites of a wise foreign policy is to avoid 'excessive zeal.' There are many states which have suffered setbacks because of unnecessary activity. As a regional state, Turkey has to exercise meticulous care in all its dealings and refrain from getting involved in acts likely to impair its policy of impartiality."

SPOKESMAN DENIES RUMORS OF ANTI-IRAN ARMY IN EAST

[Text] Ankara, 5 Jan (A.A.) -- It was announced that rumors appearing in certain foreign news media, attributed to the British papers SUNDAY TIMES and DAILY TELEGRAPH concerning the formation of an army in eastern Anatolia were totally false. They alleged that certain people opposed to the Iranian revolution were intending to occupy Iran and reestablish monarchy in the country.

The spokesman for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ambassador Nazmi Akiman, in answer to a question about the rumors said: "Such claims that aim solely to cast a shadow over the friendly and good neighbourly relations between Turkey and Iran are pure fabrication and totally unfounded."

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

MINISTERS URGE LIFTING MARTIAL LAW IN POLAND

[Text] Brussels, 4 Jan (AFP) -- Foreign ministers of the 10-nation European Economic Community (EEC) called here today on Polish authorities to lift martial law, free those in custody, and restore "genuine dialogue" with the church and the independent trade union federation Solidarity "as quickly as possible."

In a joint statement, the ministers criticized "the grave external pressures and the campaign conducted by the Soviet Union and the other East European countries against the effort of renewal in Poland."

The statement said the EEC is ready to continue its humanitarian aid to Poland and took note of the economic sanctions against the Soviet Union decided by Washington.

The statement said the EEC will consult the United States and other Western nations to determine what decisions would best serve their common objective and to avoid anything that might compromise their respective actions.

(The talks took place as Polish leader Wojciech Jaruzelski summoned all EEC country ambassadors in Warsaw for discussions on the crisis. Also, North Atlantic Treaty Organization foreign ministers were to hold an emergency meeting in Brussels next Monday.)

The statement said that recent events in Poland were a serious violation of the Final Act of Helsinki and that the Madrid follow-up Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe should debate the issue as soon as possible at ministerial level.

EEC nations were considering other measures, including those affecting credit and economic aid to Poland, as well as trade with the Soviet Union, the statement said.

The ministers were unable to agree on sending an EEC emissary to Warsaw. West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher had suggested this should be Belgian Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans, current chairman of the EEC Council of Ministers. But reporters were told after the meeting that France and Greece opposed such a mission, doubting that it would enable contacts with all those involved in the Polish situation and that it might in any case be rejected by the Polish authorities. The foreign ministers will discuss the question at their next meeting here, on January 14 and 15.

EVEN SOVIET INTERVENTION MUST NOT STOP INF TALKS

[A. Salomonson report]

[Excerpt] The Hague, 24 Dec -- "Ending the dangerously escalating arms race by the end of the eighties is of such supreme importance that even as serious a matter as an intervention in Poland should not be allowed to lead to a suspension of the negotiations," Netherlands Foreign Minister van der Stoel said in a reaction to the announcement by President Reagan's disarmament adviser Eugene Rostow that the U.S. President is considering a suspension of the Russian-U.S. nuclear arms talks in Geneva in protest to the events in Poland.

"In fact we would be damaging our own interests," Van der Stoel said, "for it is also of fundamental importance for West Europe that security and stability be increased."

BALSEMAO COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH CALVO-SOTELO

LD042220 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 4 Jan 82

On arrival at Lisbon airport, the prime minister summing up the Madrid meeting between the two heads of government said:

[Begin recording] Spain reiterated its intention not to cause any problem over its entry into NATO, insofar as the possibility of there being a unified command on the peninsula. In other words, the Spanish feel, as the Portuguese do, that there will not be any reason for such a unifed command to be on the Iberian Peninsula within the NATO structure.

Another important aspect of our talks was the reaffirmation that regarding our two countries' application for Common Market membership, this issue should not be considered together. We are two different countries with different entry processes and Portugal sought EEC membership before Spain. This will not, as is obvious, prevent us from continuing to exchange information on this and other subjects. On the basis of an information exchange, I expect Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo to visit Portugal within the next 6 months so that we can keep up a regular pace of contacts which we began in 1981.

With regard to bilateral relations, we broached various matters ranging from the nuclear stations issue -- more specifically the Sayago station issue which I feel will be resolved with an understanding on both sides -- to specific road communications issues such as those connected with the bridges at Vila Real de Santo Antonio, Monfortinho and Valenca. The Monfortinho bridge project is already going ahead with both countries' political will to see that it soon materializes. The same will be the case with the bridge at Vila Real de Santo Antonio. With regard to the Valenca-Tuy bridge, in the north, we have yet to study its location, we hope to do so in the near future.

We also broached other bilateral matters, for example, the worsening deficit in the balance of trade. I expect Garcia Dia Spanish deputy minister for economic affairs to visit Portugal soon, I expect that the visit will result in the adoption of some practical measures so that this deficit does not continue worsening but, in fact, diminishes. [end recording]

GENSCHER ON BRUSSELS TALKS, POLAND, U.S. VISIT

DW051145 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2000 GMT 4 Jan 82

["Excerpts" from reporter Gustav Trampe interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Brussels -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Reading the international press one is under the impression that the Federal Government is very much isolated in Europe with regard to its approach to Poland. Was that confirmed here in today's talks?

[Answer] Not at all, on the contrary. The position of the Federal Government found broad support together with our clear and firm aims to contribute to the lifting of martial law in Poland, to the release of the arrested and the resumption of the dialogue between the Polish leadership, the "Solidarity" trade union and the church. We would have welcomed it if this clear European position had been maintained in December. I hope that understanding will be achieved permitting Belgian Foreign Minister Tindemans, the president of the Council of Ministers, to go to Warsaw and Moscow in the near future.

[Question] The European Community communique holds Moscow responsible for the situation and the suppression in Poland. So far the Federal Government considered it a purely domestic political event. Was it hard for you to agree?

[Answer] No, the Federal Government has never doubted that the Soviet Union was responsible for the situation and developments in the People's Republic of Poland. This can be derived from the fact that the federal chancellor was so far the only government chief of the European Community addressing a letter not only to the Polish leadership but also to General Secretary Brezhnev. Others had to adopt our position and not vice versa.

[Question] But I remember statements of Government Spokesman Becker who said that it was believed -- contrary to the United States -- that Jaruzelski was acting on his own responsibility.

[Answer] It was a question of whether or not instigation was involved. These statements have been misinterpreted.

[Question] Do you believe that there really will be an earlier meeting of CSCE foreign ministers? Will Moscow agree to that?

[Answer] We would very much welcome it because the CSCE process also served in dealing with European developments. Adherance to the Helsinki Final Act is involved here indeed.

[Question] There is still a clear difference between the approach to the Europeans and that of the United States. Will the talks between the federal chancellor and President Reagan be difficult?

[Answer] We will hold these talks with the intention to create close ties between the Europeans and the United States and to eliminate every illusion that somebody could put his foot in the door.

SPD SPOKESMAN APPROVES EEC STATEMENT ON POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 5 Jan (DPA) -- In contrast to the opinion of the CDU/CSU opposition, the spokesman for the SPD Executive, Wolfgang Clement, described the decisions of the EEC foreign ministers on Poland as reasonable.

They left no doubt about the condemnation of the events for which the military government was responsible while at the same time not refusing the Polish people the assistance which they needed at the present time. Here the Federal Government had rendered considerable service. This was anything but the "pro-Soviet line" claimed by CDU Deputy Stauffenberg, Clement stressed, but rather a "specific policy which acted and did not simply pass resolutions."

FDP Approves

[Text] Bonn, 5 Jan (DPA) -- The FDP Bundestag parliamentary group today welcomed the resolution of the EEC foreign ministers on Poland issued after their conference in Brussels. Kurt Jung, European policy spokesman of the FDP, said that the outcome had confirmed the correctness of the view taken by the FDP and the Federal Government that, in spite of the imposition of martial law, food aid for the Polish people should be continued and that economic sanctions did not come under consideration at the present time. The FDP politician saw it as particularly important that Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (FDP) had succeeded in achieving a joint European stand on the basis of the Bundestag resolution supported by all the parliamentary groups.

Jung called the demand currently being raised by opposition politicians to pursue a policy of rejection not only toward Poland and the Soviet Union, but also toward the GDR and the CSSR as incomprehensible. The implementation of such demands would lead to the isolation of the FRG on a European level. Also, CDU politician Norbert Bluem's idea that the West should, if necessary, threaten to break off the Geneva disarmament talks was to be rejected.

On the other hand, the deputy chairman of the CDU/CSU group in the Bundestag committee for foreign affairs, Count Franz Ludwig Stauffenberg, described the EEC foreign ministers meeting as a black day for Europe. In its efforts to draw the other Europeans onto its "pro-Soviet course," the Federal Government had unfortunately gained a partial victory.

Opposition Disappointed

[Text] Bonn, 5 Jan (DPA) -- The CDU/CSU has expressed disappointment in the EEC foreign ministers, its deputy parliamentary group chairman, Manfred Woerner, said today in Bonn. Woerner said that the EEC statement did not meet expectations and came too late to have any appreciable effect. The joint demand for an end to martial law, release of prisoners and continuation of the dialogue with the church and the trade union Solidarity was indeed welcome, yet this resolution was no substitute for measures which go further, "above all, European participation in economic sanctions against the Soviet Union."

Woerner expressed the hope that in Chancellor Schmidt's talks in Washington differences could be bridged in such a way that further rifts in the Atlantic alliance and German-U.S. relations would not emerge. An agreement with the United States on which sanctions offered the best chances of success seemed absolutely necessary. Increasingly in the course of the last few weeks the Federal Government had been open to the accusation of political accomodation to the Soviet Union, Woerner said.

SCHMIDT, GENSCHER HOLD TALKS IN WASHINGTON

[Excerpt] Washington, 5 Jan (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher continued their discussion in Washington on Tuesday. Schmidt breakfasted with leading U.S. congressmen, while Genscher met his U.S. colleague Alexander Haig. Both are expected later (1600 GMT) for talks with President Ronald Reagan at the White House.

Genscher Sees Agreement

[Text] Stuttgart, 6 Jan (DPA) -- The latest talks between the Federal Government and the U.S. leadership have led to broad agreement in their attitude on Poland. This was underlined by Federal Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher on his return to Stuttgart airport today from Washington. Genscher said: "I cannot possibly imagine a greater convergence." The United States has "taken full note" of the substance of the European Community's statement on Poland, Genscher continued. It has been shown that both sides are proceeding "from the same analysis" and have the same aims. During the talks in Washington there was agreement to call for the lifting of martial law in Poland, the release of prisoners and resumption of talks with the "Solidarity" trade union.

BANKS RECEIVE INTEREST PAYMENTS FROM POLAND

[Text] Frankfurt, 5 Jan (DPA) -- Poland has now paid interest arrears to some Western banks on a $550 million loan taken out in 1979. Frankfurt banking circles reported today that the Luxembourg subsidiary of the Bank fuer Gemeinwirtschaft is one of them and has recieved around DM1 million from Poland. The Bank fuer Gemeinwirtschaft was the only German bank in the consortium that granted this loan and which was headed by the Bank of America.

Frankfurt banking circles stressed that these interest payments were not connected with the still outstanding $350 million interest due for the last quarter of 1981, about which the Poles have been negotiating with 460 [figure as received] Western creditor banks for weeks. Frankfurt and London bank officials confirmed today that this interest is still outstanding. The Western banks have stated that payment of this remains the precondition for the rescheduling of Polish credits of $2.4 billion which became due in 1981.

BONN'S POLICY TOWARD POLAND ANALYZED BY PAPER

DW051255 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 5 Jan 82 p 4

[Commentary signed JR.: "Waiting for Polish Signals"]

[Text] Almost at the same time as the European Community foreign ministers assembled in Brussels to coordinate their Polish policy, General Jaruzelski recieved the ambassadors of the 10 countries in Warsaw. The administrator of martial law in Poland obviously did not arrange the meeting to create an opportunity to pass good news to the European Community's foreign ministers; it was too late for that. It is hard to explain why Jaruzelski still made this dubious gesture which was no substitute for the expected "signal" of a milder martial law. Maybe Warsaw and Moscow consider Western disagreement in the assessment to Polish developments as so grave that a small game of confusion would suffice to obscure connections.

The European Community's foreign ministers have indeed not decided anything in Brussels that could create new problems for the Polish administrators of martial law; not to torpedo Washington's sanctions imposed against Poland and the Soviet Union and not to apply any means of pressure themselves -- that is the hard-fought compromise achieved between two camps of the European Community, with one of them demanding more visible action than the other. It was a poor idea, however, to dispatch Belgian Foreign Minister Tindemans as a European Community emissary to Warsaw and Moscow. In doing this, the community maneuvered itself in the unworthy position of a suppliant -- a role that should rather be played by the other side.

The decision of the European Community can be useful for Chancellor Schmidt's and Foreign Minister Genscher's talks with President Reagan because it does not handicap Bonn's policy of waiting for good "signals" from the East. It is obvious, however, that Jaruzelski cannot give such signs and that Bonn will find it more and more difficult to convince others to follow its lead.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE VIEWS POLISH REGIME

[Commentary signed HR.: "Object Poland"]

[Text] History has taught the Poles often enough that their national problem will not be "solved" by them but by others. Even if the Poles fought for their cause themselves in their country or abroad, their action became a political football of others or an object of exchange. That was the case in the Italian campaign under Napoleon, when the Polish national anthem was created, as well as in the battles of World War II where Polish soldiers fought in foreign armies for the rebirth of free Poland.

Today the fate of Poland is being negotiated in many foreign places. With the suggestion of the unparalleled collective conference of West European ambassadors, General Jaruzelski on his own has made developments in Poland a collective European event. The foreign ministers of the European Community met in Brussels to discuss Poland, the President and the federal chancellor will discuss Poland in Washington this Tuesday and a NATO foreign ministers conference is in the offing. But the Poles cannot expect much help to come from these busy activities -- at least not the suppressed. The suggestion to hold another Helsinki conference with numerous participating states, seems much rather to be aimed at gaining time until matters have somehow settled down in Poland, until the interest has ebbed so that our statesmen can return undisturbed and with new strength to the really important matters having much to do with policy and little with people.

Since resistance has been paralyzed in Poland, the military council is becoming more and more active. The rigorous price increases are supposed to offset wage increases granted in past years and let the workers pay for the catastrophic economic policy of the party chief who was loyally served by Jaruzelski in the Politburo. Such an economic punishment has become more and more inevitable every year, but the harshness of the action is surprising now. It is also a political hint indicating that the powerful military persons of the party intend to stay in power for some time, because only with brutal force can a price policy of this kind be maintained. Who would or could force them to retreat to the barracks? Us?

KIEL-USSR FERRY LINK -- The Soviet Union wants Kiel to be the German port in a planned rail-ferry link between the two countries. This decision of the Soviet Ministry of the Merchant Marine was announced in Kiel today by Hans Michael Moll, head of the Kiel economics department, following a talk with Soviet representatives. The cities of Luebeck, Flensburg, Hamburg and Bremen had also been interested in the project. According to Moll, the Soviet shipping experts had decided on Kiel because the Kiel fjord had the most suitable shipping channel of the Baltic ports and the port area had favorable traffic connections. Also, there were apparently no environment problems. Kiel now intends to enter into negotiations with the Land and Federal Governments and with interested shipping companies. TEXT OF MARCHAIS LETTER TO JARUZELSKI REPORTED

[Excerpt] We are publishing below the text of the letter sent by Georges Marchais, on behalf of the PCF Politburo to Wojciech Jaruzelski, prime minister of the Polish People's Republic. This letter was handed to the Polish ambassador to France early yesterday afternoon (23 December):

Mr Prime Minister, dear comrade,

In view of the very serious situation in your country I would like to convey to you, on behalf of our party's Politburo, the emotion felt by the French communists and the millions of sincere friends which socialist Poland has in France. The present eventa are affecting us deeply. It is up to the working class, the Polish people, to solve Poland's difficult and complex problems. Far be it from us to aspire to tell you what to do or to set ourselves up as advisers! We are refraining from any interference in the solution of problems which concern the Polish nation alone. But it now strikes us as useful to write to you.

For more than a year we have followed with interest the efforts being made in your country to overcome the serious faults and grave mistakes which have damaged socialism and which are the cause of the present crisis and to move toward the reforms necessary to the development of the Polish socialist society. Unfortunately, difficulties and extremism resulted in a situation which led you to decree a state of emergency. We love freedom and think that the growth of democracy is fundamental in a socialist society: Therefore, although the Polish Constitution makes provision for this state of emergency in cases of extreme emergency, we regret, in all respects, the fact that you were led to take that step and are pained by the suspension of public freedom and the arrests and internments it involves.

From the start, although we found it very difficult, we refused to add our voice to the imprecations and demands of those people in France who wanted to increase anger and hatred, push your fellow citizens toward a bloody adventure and succeed in internationalizing the Polish problem. On the contrary we felt that every effort should be made to prevent the worst from happening -- civil war, foreign intervention -- and to make every effort to implement the vital reforms in order to solve the economic, social and democratic problems in Poland.

We know by experience the price the workers and people had to pay to win each right, freedom and step forward. For example, your country was all too frequently a battlefield. It experienced centuries of division and oppression and even vanished as a state. After the martyrdom inflicted by Hitler's Germany, it regained independence and unity inside definitive borders; it rose from its ashes and launched a vast socialist transformation which had its ups and downs. We reject the idea that Polish blood might be shed in the tragedy of a civil war, because the lives of millions of workers, millions of your fellow citizens are at stake and because we feel too many people have already been injured and killed. We think that a socialist society should succeed in solving conflicts, however acute they may be, other than by confrontation and the outbreak of violence. That was the first thought which guided us.

We are also inspired by the friendship, dating back over several centuries, which brings our two peoples together. Special ties have been woven between our two homelands for a long time.

That friendship is partly the result of our two nations' awareness of their solidarity: Whatever Europe's upheavals our two peoples have never fought; they were often allies, and when they were not they paid the price for it. For many workers and for communists that friendship was enriched by an ardent revolutionary fraternity. Because the Polish nation's vital interests and the future and growth of socialism in Poland are at stake and because France and its workers now stand to gain greatly from the existence of a strong socialist Poland, we hope that the possibilities for rallying all the national forces will be preserved in your country so that the Poles themselves can solve the problems of their socialist development. That is our second reason.

Finally, we are inspired by the concern for peace, security and disarmament in Europe and in the world. And we are inspired by oncern for the cooperation from which our two countries stand to gain by maintaining it in all spheres. Since it is these requirements of our age, common to our two nations and to all men, women and young people in all countries which are at stake, we think it is vital to prevent a hotbed of tensions and conflicts being created in Central Europe. We are particularly concerned about that since our objective is the simultaneous dissolution of the military blocs. Safeguarding international peace as well as civilian peace: that is the third reason for our stance.

The vast majority of French workers have not given way to the attempts in our country to revive a crusading, cold war spirit. They have succeeded in showing their deep friendship for Poland and its workers by demonstrating that sense of responsibility which, in the gravest circumstances, reflects real solidarity. Now that there seem to be signs of possibilities of moving toward a peaceful solution, it is easy to imagine how ardently we hope for the implementation of the ideas and fundamental pledges contained in your message to the Polish nation 13 December and in the other statements which you have made subsequently, because we think that those ideas and pledges correspond to the wishes of the French manual and intellectual workers who feel concerned for socialism in Poland or simply for Poland's future. They correspond to values and principles to which we, for our part, are deeply attached.

I have just recalled our attachment to freedom, whose consolidation and extension in our view are part of the very essence of socialism. We have noted the fact that you affirmed the emergency and temporary nature of the measures taken since 13 December and that you say you reject the establishment of a military dictatorship, indicating that "no Polish problem can be solved by violence in the future." We hope that you will be able to revoke all the emergency measures as soon as possible, restore freedoms and guarantee their extension in the framework of a strong democratic state.

I have told you how much importance we attach to the implementation of a series of measures combining economic efficiency, social progress and the far-reaching exercise of democracy in all spheres for the strengthening and development of the socialist society. We have noted your statements in which you say that there is no question of your country returning to the practices used before August 1980 and that you intend to do all you can to defend and implement as quickly as possible "the fundamental content of the socialist renewal." We hope that that process will progress, gain strength and succeed.

I have noted the importance we attach to the rallying of all possible forces for building and developing the socialist society. We noted that you reaffirmed the need for a broad national accord, based on your country's traditions and situation and including diverse components: the party, which, you said, must return to its ideal and eliminate "mistakes and distortions," the majority of the people and young people; "the healthy workers' group within Solidarity" which you said "will eliminate the advocates of confrontation by its own efforts and in its own interest," the church, whose "patriotic positions" you valued. We hope that you succeed in doing that.

Finally, you know how strongly we are attached to our own country's independence and sovereignty. Therefore we understand that, like us, other people want to ensure their independence and national sovereignty, while respecting alliances concluded and affirming international solidarity.

We note that you expressed that aspiration, adding to it Poland's duty to defuse the crisis and eliminate the danger by its own means. We set the greatest store by preventing the internationalization of the Polish problem and by the possibility of thus preserving peace and international cooperation. I am sure that you will understand the meaning of this letter.

We are convinced that there is no model for socialism. We ourselves are struggling for an original, democratic self-managing socialist society which will attain justice, freedom and fraternity while developing the French national personality. We are fully aware of the immense efforts involved in the recovery through which Poland will be able to heal its wounds and ensure progress for its socialist society by fully exploiting its resources, satisfying its people's vital interests and ensuring that its workers' capabilities are developed in freedom. We hope that the workers, the Polish people and the Polish nation will succeed in that. That is the wish I was anxious to convey to you. Mr Prime Minister, dear comrade, please accept my fraternal wishes.

CHEYSSON ANNOUNCES RECOGNITION OF NAMIBIA'S SWAPO

EA051154 Addis Ababa Voice of Namibia in English 1900 GMT 4 Jan 82

[Text] Addis Ababa -- The foreign minister of France, Cheysson, has said that the Socialist government of the Republic of France recognizes the South-West African Peoples' Organization, SWAPO of Namibia, as the sole and legitimate representative of the people of Namibia and maintains that Namibia must achieve independence in 1982, in accordance with UN General Assembly Resolution 435.

REAGAN MAKES 'COLD WAR' DECISIONS ON POLAND

[Yves Moreau editorial: "Humanist or Hypocrite?"]

[Text] The U.S. President's generosity and humanism are unbounded. Mr Reagan, righter of wrongs and valiant leader of the free world, always sides with the victims of injustice. The dictators of Pakistan or Chile can bear witness to that. Thanks to Mr Reagan the Congress in Washington has just lifted an embargo which had once prevented them from receiving U.S. arms. And thanks to Mr Reagan the Pentagon will benevolently provide the Salvadoran military junta cadres with the training and resources they lack for defeating the guerrillas.

Mr Reagan, mankind's benefactor, goes so far as to welcome, under Florida's sun, the Haitians fleeing from Duvalier's terror. It is true that they are welcomed in internment camps but nobody dreamed that those people, who preferred Miami to the "tontons macoutes," would be housed in palaces. Nonetheless it is undoubtedly with regard to Poland that Mr Reagan has recently been making selfless efforts. For instance, as soon as the state of emergency was declared he did not hesitate in ordering a halt on all U.S. food supplies to Poland. Were the inhabitants of that country not complaining of some shortages? Then let their supplies be cut off! That is undoubtedly the best way of getting them used to their situation as quickly as possible.

But that was not enough. That is why a "crisis team" gathered in the White House has just drawn up a whole series of other measures. Mr Reagan listed them as follows in California yesterday evening: suspension of sales of equipment for the construction of the gas pipeline which is to supply West Europe with Soviet natural gas, suspension of sales to the USSR of all high technology equipment, especially computers, suspension of landing rights in the United States for Aeroflot, the Soviet airline, suspension of Soviet ships' right of access to U.S. ports, suspension of all licenses for the export of electronic equipment and advanced technology, closure of the Soviet purchasing offices in the United States, the U.S.-Soviet trade agreements which will shortly expire, including agreements on energy, science and technology, will not be renewed.

The United States, Mr Reagan also stated, will also make a "complete reexamination" of all the other agreements existing between it and the Soviet Union.

Surely this is a considerable step toward the internationalization of the Polish crisis for which Lecanuet, Bigeard, Francois-Poncet and their friends are praying.

It is such a marked internationalization that none of the measures announced concerns Poland. This time it is the USSR which is the target.

What if it is said that these are measures of economic warfare decided unilaterally in violation of all the international rules? The Reagan administration had drawn up its reply to such criticism even before the recent events in Poland. For instance, in a speech delivered in London on 30 November Mr Eugene Rostow, director of the Arms Control Agency had no hesitation in proclaiming: "A decade which opened under the sign of hope and detente has become the harshest cold war period."

This is what West Europe refuses to accept. "Detente still survives there as a dangerous illusion," the New York TIMES complains. That is what Mr Reagan is fighting.

And since charity begins at home the first measure he is planning to decree is intended not so much to punish the USSR as France and the FRG and to serve the interests of the U.S. monopolies. Indeed the aim is to thwart the implementation of the agreements under which West Europe would be supplied with Soviet natural gas.

That prospect has offended Washington for years and years.

The agreements reached are to provide work for thousands and thousands of French and West German workers for a long time. They open up the possibility of future contracts which could also help to reduce unemployment. They guarantee France a diversification of its energy imports.

But it is precisely that new guarantee of independence with annoys the United States. Hence the many pressures it exerted to prevent the French-Soviet negotiations from reaching a successful conclusion on this issue.

As far as Mr Reagan is concerned the Polish crisis is really just a pretext for raising this affair once again and trying to reaffirm his leadership over his allies.

It is also a pretext for justifying his arms race and the resulting antisocial policy in the United States.

As can be seen Mr Reagan's humanism needs international tension.

Humanism? How can people talk of humanism when he merely invokes the Polish crisis to disguise the real motives for his cold war decisions?

COLOMBO QUESTIONED ON EEC DECISION ON POLAND

[Text] The European Ten measured up to the Polish events. At their meeting in Brussels yesterday the foreign ministers reiterated their condemnation of the military coup but postponed their decision concerning the economic sanctions the United States has adopted and would like the allies to adopt as well. It is really a double confrontation: between Europe and Poland and between Europe and the United States. Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo was interviewed by Francesco Mattioli at the end of the Brussels meeting. Colombo spoke of the substantial agreement:

[Begin recording] [Colombo] Faced with the substance of problems under discussion -- and which we discussed today -- one can see that in reality the views cannot be very different. According to its position, each country is sensitive to its responsibilities and relations, but there is a basic agreement on the evaluation of the Polish situation and on European and Western reaction to it. As regards the means of reacting, apart from the declarations of a political nature it seems to me that there is also an identity of positions. This includes the need for harmony with the United States, so that we have the same stance as the United States -- that is, at least coordinated -- so that the Western world has a unified stand on this big event.

[Question] For example, Chancellor Schmidt spoke of Yalta. It seemed a reply by Chancellor Schmidt, that is, his way of saying that realpolitik cannot arrive at a point of interpreting Yalta as authorization of repression.

[Answer] I do not believe that Chancellor Schmidt, by speaking of Yalta, wanted to say that this was authorization for repression. However, I consider that it is necessary to remember that although Yalta is represented a division of zones of influence, as far as Poland is concerned it also envisaged free elections. Therefore we cannot consider -- in the name of Yalta -- that repression is something we can accept. We do not accept it politically and we do not accept it otherwise. Reality is what it is, and we will continue to protest against this reality and to use the means at our disposal to change this situation.

[Question] The EEC meeting reiterated the European message to Poland: end martial law, free the prisoners and reopen the dialogue. Is there any response?

[Answer] There are three requests -- withdraw the martial law, release the prisoners and reopen the dialogue. We are all agreed on this. Today we repeated them formally at the level of the Ten. We await a reply. What General Jaruzelski communicated this morning to the ten ambassadors of the community's countries is not a reply. It is still very interlocutory. I would say that it falls considerably short of our requests. We hope the situation will develop more positively in the future.

SPADOLINI DISCUSSES DOMESTIC PROBLEMS, POLAND

PM051131 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 30 Dec 81 p 3

[Giorgio Rossi report on Prime Minister Spadolini's 29 December press conference in Rome]

[Excerpts] [Question] Liberal Party Secretary Zanone has confirmed in an interview that differing assessments of the government's economic policy exist. Does this mean there is a stalemate on important issues?

[Amswer] I do not deny that differences exist: We have a broad and composite political majority, which ranges from the Liberals to the Socialists. It is not surprising if there are some differences of assessment. What is important is that the decisions taken by the cabinet be observed and implemented. The problem is how to bring about fair political syntheses and make less use of interviews.

[Question] The political majority, which you describe as broad and composite, is preparing for a "new phase" which could lead to an early election. Do you believe your government is the last ditch in the defense of this legislative term?

[Answer] It is a prime minister's duty to combat the possibility of an early election. The government I lead was formed precisely as a final attempt to prevent the fourth premature dissolution of Parliament in 10 years. Obviously there could be a subsequent phase. But my duty is to bring to completion the program approved by Parliament, and this is the best remedy against the threat of an early election. I believe it is necessary to ensure that the government can implement its own program before introducing other programs, which could not be carried out in an atmosphere of suspicion, irritation, polemics and difficulties.

[Question] Let us talk about the Siberian gas pipeline. Germany and other European countries need it. Can Italy do without it, or is the breaking of the contract with the USSR a propaganda ruse?

[Answer] The reaction to the atrocious events in Poland, to which Parliament has reacted in a resolutely and dignified way, must not be mistaken for manipulation. The pipeline issue did not originate yesterday. It is true that at the latest cabinet meeting the inclination merged to pause for reflection, strictly with regard to gas supplies. There are other parts of that agreement, involving Italian companies, that are moving ahead. In any case it is up to the government to reach a final decision. The government will take into account national interests and the stance adopted by our allies.

[Question] Can Italy play a role of its own with respect to the Polish crisis?

[Answer] I should have visited Poland in the past few weeks. I believe Italy's role is to carry out action aimed at restoring a dialogue between Solidarity, the Catholic Church and the military regime with a view to restoring the now-curtailed legal and civil rights of a regime that was moving toward pluralism. I also believe we must make our voice heard in the Soviet Union, which seems to have inspired the coup d'etat in Warsaw. Whether what has happened may be a lesser evil is another matter.

[Question] It seems there have been conflicts within the majority and even within the Atlantic alliance with regard to what stance to adopt toward Poland and the USSR.

[Answer] There is a shared desire to suspend financial aid and to step up food aid, as long as its destination is assured. As far as an initiative toward the USSR is concerned, that is up to the joint body of the Ten.

[Question] Are polemics and internal struggles starting again in the secret services' leadership?

[Answer] Following some polemics in the press regarding the armed forces' I provided certain elucidations, invoking the conformity that must exist between the civilian and military authorities and the need for discretion, moderation and restraint in this regard. As far as the secret services were concerned, it was a matter of normalizing them. This was done, and a more relaxed and calm atmosphere was immediately created around them. I would like to confirm, in response to certain slanderous rumors, that there is no corruption in those services, no monitoring of politicians and no tapping of their telephones. I will continue to carry out this supervision.

[Answer] I have neither requested nor received any favors from the PCI. I have merely tried to maintain correct relations with the opposition.

Is it not obvious that in order to beat inflation you need a broader consensus than that of the majority alone? And can you discriminate against some people's votes when it comes to the antiterrorist struggle? And is Piccoli not addressing himself to the communists too on the issue of institutional reforms? I would like this cooperation to exist in connection with the law on repentant terrorists too.

PERTINI REITERATES FULL SUPPORT FOR SPADOLINI

[Excerpts] Rome, 5 Jan (ANSA) -- Head of state Sandro Pertini strode into the political debate surrounding insistent rumors that Premier Giovanni Spadolini's government is close to collapse with the flat statement that "Spadolini is all right; there will be no (government) crisis" splashed across today's front pages.

Pertini made his remarks on the future of the five-party coalition to the Genoa daily IL LAVORO at the end of his holiday stay in Nice. The president told the paper he managed twenty years ago [as received] that anyone pushing for the ouster of Spadolini's coalition of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals and the premier's Republican Party "will have to account to me."

The coalition took office last June after Spadolini was named as Italy's first non-Christian Democrat premier since just after World War Two and, according to political observers, some idea of a date for a crisis might be available when the government majority meets, at the urging of the Socialists, Social Democrats and Liberals, to "check out" the application of the agreements signed when the government was formed.

The strong statement by the head of state reported in today's editions of the nation's dailies was a reiteration of his well-known position against a government crisis, the dissolution of Parliament and early general elections.

After his return to the capital Monday, the president met with Spadolini for what was described as "a wide-ranging discussion of international and domestic developments in which the points of view of the two were perfectly in line."

FOREIGN MINISTRY CONDEMNS GOLAN ANNEXATION

[Text] Rome, 5 Jan (ANSA) -- Italy's and the EEC Ten's condemnation of the Tel Aviv government's annexation of the Syrian Golan Heights as contrary to international law was reiterated by the Foreign Ministry here today on the eve of the resumption of the U.N. Security Council's debate on the move. The ministerial communique released here recalled that Italian diplomatic chief Emilio Colombo laid down the Italian position in his reply, sent via diplomatic channels, to a letter he received from Israeli Foreign Minister Shamir.

Colombo's message stated Italian and EEC "firm deploration" of Tel Aviv's "unexpected" decision, which was described as "contrary to international law and, therefore, without validity." Other grounds for rejecting the Israeli decision were cited as being: That it prejudices the possible application of the Security Council's Resolution 242 on the Mideast crisis. That Israel's policy of the fait accompli does not (?seem) to be one which will "guarantee security and peace in the Middle East."

REAGAN ONLY DEFENDER OF OPPRESSED POLISH MAJORITY

PM051031 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 29 Dec 81 p 5

[Editorial: "A Voice Without Response"]

[Text] The economic measures announced by President Reagan to express his condemnation of General Jaruzelski's government will have few repercussions on the already prostrate Polish economy. As a whole, they will represent no more than $50 million divided up among the credits which might have come from the United States over the next few weeks, the suspension of fishing activities in U.S. territorial waters, the interruption of Polish [as published] flights to the United States and the blocking of official aid in the form of food.

But nor was it Reagan's intention to change the course of events in Poland with sanctions which could be offset perfectly well with an increase in aid from other Western countries which have been unable or unwilling to respond with specific measures to a state of martial law whose aim is to eliminate the freedom movement which had been flourishing too successfully in Poland since 30 August 1980.

In contrast to 1939, the West is in no position to go to war over the Polish issue. Nor is the United States. What the U.S. President wished to demonstrate is that it is not sufficient to make more or less forceful statements about a repression which is affecting directly or indirectly the lives of millions of Poles. Reagan, who based his election campaign and the first few months of his administration on a vociferous denunciation of Soviet expansionism, could not stand by idly while Moscow instigated the Polish Government to do the "dirty work" or reducing Solidarity to a leaderless and impotent movement.

The international situation is sufficiently delicate not to add further contributions to a direct confrontation with Moscow and to the suspension of the disarmament process which is underway in Geneva between the United States and the Soviet Union. The economic sanctions announced by Reagan, accompanied by potential threats also directed against Moscow, are an indication that the United States will not passively watch any kind of brutality exercise against the Polish people.

Following the experience of Afghanistan, President Reagan knows that he cannot rely on the unanimous support of the European allies, whose silence and vacillations over the Polish crisis are creating some unease in the United States. The round of consultations for undertaking a joint strategy has already taken place. It does not seem that Reagan has found a response in Bonn, Paris, London and Rome.

Despite this, he is prepared to talk and act clearly, becoming ironically, the only Western statesman who is attempting to defend the majority of a people oppressed by a minority.

Nevertheless, the FRG chancellor is expected in Washington at the beginning of January to examine Western opinions and stances. Brezhnev's reply -- which, it is already known, proposes continuing the policy of detente and envisages the holding of a summit between the two superpowers' heads of state -- will also undoubtedly be studied.

It is the course of events which will determine the adoption of U.S. measures. And the suspension or confirmation of the meeting envisaged in Geneva between the two foreign ministers -- Haig and Gromyko -- will indicate the degree of cooling of relations between Washington and Moscow, as well as the prospects for finding a solution to the grave crisis created by the communist repression of Poland.

PAPER VIEWS POLAND'S MEANING FOR EUROCOMMUNISM

PM060933 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 25-31 Dec 81 p 4

[Editorial: "Test of Freedom and Peace"]

[Text] It has recently been said in some news media that the events in Poland would be a test of fire for Eurocommunism. In its history -- which it already has -- Eurocommunism has been marked from the beginning by its effort to achieve a reduction of international tension and to open up paths toward disarmament and detente. Today that effort is indeed confronted by a severe test, in which converge, together with the dramatic events in Poland, Israel's provocative and adventurous coup concerning the Golan Heights, attempting to legitimate military actions, as well as the plans against the peoples of Central America displayed again by President Reagan. And together with these instances -- each of them current -- previous hotbeds of tension persist. South Africa, Korea and Angola are places where U.S. imperialism's policy has been conflicting with the various peoples.

The real test today -- not only for Eurocommunism but for all the progressive and conscious forces inside and outside our country -- is to curb a dynamic of confrontation which, taken to its conclusion, would end not with victory for this or that country but with the extermination of mankind.

There is no lack -- and we find them in our own country -- of those who do not see in Poland the situation in itself, with all the gravity and dramatic significance which the intervention of troops against the workers in that People's Republic could have. There are those who see an opportunity, if they manipulate information and the news media sufficiently, for conducting a global campaign against the workers' and socialist forces, reviving anticommunist outlooks of other eras. They are making the mistake of those who have sought to resolve problems by crushing them, or those who wish to win in a race which nobody can win. There are also those who believe that, between the two blocs, one military intervention may be reprehensible while another may not be.

However, nobody can place himself above the facts: the peace which is threatened every day is essential and vital for everybody, for every rational political blueprint, and obviously for a socialist strategy which cannot have a nuclear catastrophe, whatever the theater in which it takes place, as its starting point.

The statement of the PCE -- a Eurocommunist party -- condemning the military coup in Poland stems from its previously expressed stances concerning the value and significance of freedoms and democracy, but the constant Eurocommunist effort against the increase in international tension, to curb the arms race, and for peace. The test of Eurocommunism, and in this specific instance, does not simply entail, as some observers may have believed, the adoption of a certain stance consistent with its strategy and with the already developed principles of its policy. The test confronting PCE members today is precisely to turn that stance, that policy, into a joint effort for freedom and peace with all the progressive forces.

PREMIER-DESIGNATE SEES SHAKY GOVERNMENT

[Lisbeth Knudsen report]

[Text] Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen today admitted to BERLINGSKE TIDENDE that it is hazardous for the Social Democratic Party to form a new government around the new year without a political safety net in the Folketing.

The partners in cooperation with the new government pointed to by Anker Jorgensen are parties which during the formation negotiations have pointed to the Social Democrats as the next government. They are the Radical Liberals, the Socialist People's Party [SF] and the Left Socialists. If the Social Democrats are to adhere to their own economic policy goals, this will, however, mean increased taxation and an incomes policy in the new year, and such policies are unlikely to remain intact with such an uncertain majority in the Folketing.

All political parties are now anxiously waiting for Anker Jorgensen's 12 January inaugural declaration in the Folketing. The nonsocialist parties, which could turn out to be Anker Jorgensen's only chance of survival, are trying to hold together in opposition until the new government has passed its first tests in the Folketing. Like many Social Democrats, they expect Anker Jorgensen's new year government to have only a short life.

The Social Democratic Party chairm n [Anker Jorgensen] writes in BERLINGSKE TIDENDE today of the possibilities of governing. "If it turned out to be impossible to persuade the SF to enter into practical political cooperation in which they could agree with the Radical Liberals, a Social Democratic government could only survive if we leaned even further toward the center -- if it were possible at all to win some response from the nonsocialist parties." He continues that the negotiations between the Social Democrats, the Radical Liberals and the SF showed that it was impossible to create a firm pattern of cooperation. "In this situation it is of course hazardous to continue with a Social Democratic government which has no safety net. I hope that we will succeed. But this depends to a very large extent on whether the parties which have pointed to the Social Democrats as a government will be realistic enough to give decisive support to the policies contained in the Social Democratic Party program," Anker Jorgensen writes.

Government Sworn In

[Lisbeth Knudsen report]

[Excerpt] "The new government has not been formed with the intention of resigning quickly. However, if the government does find itself in a minority in the near future, we have no intention of calling an election." Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen made this announcement yesterday in connection with the formation of the new government. This also means that he admitted that the new Social Democratic minority government is without any form of political safety net in the Folketing.

"I hope that we will not only survive as a government but will also be able to achieve a thing or two," Jorgensen said. However, at yesterday's swearing-in he was unwilling to give any details of what concrete initiatives the government will take in the Folketing.

It was Anker Jorgensen's view that in the next few days the government must consider the political situation and put forward its policies in its 12 January inaugural declaration in the Folketing. However, both the Social Democratic Folketing group and the Social Democratic Party National Executive have called on the new government to implement the Social Democratic plan of action. The prime minister does not yet want to say anything about the priorities which will be given to the individual proposals in the plan of action. Nor is he willing to comment on the issue of with which parties the government is planning to work to carry out its proposals.

PAPER CALLS FOR WESTERN UNITY ON POLAND

[Editorial: "The U.S. Sanctions"]

[Text] President Reagan's broad program of sanctions against the Soviet Union has not been received unexpectedly with reservations by the governments in West Europe. The reaction contains reminders of the situation 2 years ago, when President Carter responded to the invasion of Afghanistan with an abruptly implemented set of sanctions against the Soviet Union. But there are also differences.

At that time President Carter on his own initiative undertook a complete turnaround in the Western policy toward the Soviet Union without having made sure of his allies' positive support in advance. This time President Reagan is undertaking a sharp adjustment of the U.S. policy after informing his European partners in detail of his intentions in advance. This sharpening of the U.S. attitude is in line with the critical and cautious line on the Soviet Union he has been following from the very start. And if U.S. policy over the Polish crisis in the last few weeks has erred in any direction it has been rather in the direction of caution and restraint than of brutal simplicity.

For this reason the European governments, when their foreign ministers meet in Brussels Monday, could still well afford to go some way toward meeting their U.S. allies. There are two primary disagreements between the European and U.S. standpoints -- there is a divergent view of the effectiveness of sanctions as a political weapon, and there is disagreement in the assessment of the Soviet Union's direct role in the Polish military coup. While the U.S. administration's view is that that Moscow has moved its Polish military pawns forward, the West European view is that the coup was planned and carried out from within Poland. On the basis of this disparity there arise two differing political methods of promoting constructive developments in Poland -- the U.S. policy which through applying pressure on the Soviet Union seeks to restrain Moscow from moving any more dangerous pieces into the game, and the European policy which through a helpful dialogue with General Jaruzelski seeks to bring about the return of more civilized conditions with the resumption of the policy of reforms as its goal.

But these two political lines are not irreconcilable, and it must be the task of the foreign ministers to bring them together, so that the Western alliance can go forward with a two-pronged policy, which on the one hand puts pressure on the Soviet Union by clearly demonstrating agreement on much more wide-reaching sanctions in the event of a direct intervention, and which on the other hand reinforces efforts to give support to the positive elements in the program of those in power in Poland. In any event it would be pointless and damaging if the Polish crisis were allowed to bring about new antagonisms with the Western alliance.

OFFICIAL DEPARTS FOR ECONOMIC TALKS IN MOSCOW

The 2-day visit takes place at the invitation of the commission's Soviet chairman, Foreign Trade Minister Nikolay Patolichev. The talks in Moscow will deal with the development of economic cooperation between our countries, including the increase of imports from the Soviet Union and the safeguarding of a balance in trade. There will also be discussions on new joint building projects, such as the building of the Tallinn port and a railway wagon depot near Leningrad. On the Finnish side the topical projects include joint projects in the power industry and water supply, for instance the progress of the 1,000 megawatt nuclear power station project. Foreign Trade Minister Patolichev has particularly emphasized the development of the continental shelf in the northern sea areas of the Soviet Union.

GOVERNMENT MAY IMPOSE SANCTIONS ON WARSAW

PM051549 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 31 Dec 81 p 8

[Excerpt] "There is broad agreement between the United States and the NATO allies in Europe in their assessments of the situation which has arisen in Poland and which has given rise to the U.S. sanctions," Foreign Ministry Under Secretary Eivinn Berg said.

"Norway carries out constant evaluations of our economic and commercial ties with Poland," Berg stressed.

It is also possible that Norwegian measures could be adopted, but it is hardly likely that a decision will be made before next week, after the matter has been discussed with NATO and the results of the EEC's assessments are ready.

"So far we have not considered it useful to impose restrictions on Norway's economic ties with Poland. At the same time Norway has given its support to the full implementation of humanitarian aid program activities, on the condition that the aid gets into the right hands."

"A possible boycott and sanctions will be assessed on the basis of whether they would help to bring back the reform process, which has the support of the Polish people," Under Secretary Berg said.

He stressed that the Soviet Union bears particular responsibility for developments in Poland. Norway deeply regrets the Soviet pressure exerted on Poland and the bahavior of the military council since the state of martial law has been in force, which has entailed the violation of human rights.

USSR BARENTS SEA PLAN TERMED 'UNACCEPTABLE'

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA report]

[Text] The government has rejected a proposal from the Soviet Government that restraint be shown in the exploitation of the oil and gas resources in an area straddling the sector line in the Barents Sea. The area proposed stretches as far west as the sector line and is bounded in the east by the 34 degrees east line of longtitude.

According to information received by NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA the Soviet proposal was aimed at establishing the sector line as the point of departure for the negotiations on the demarcation line for the continental shelf in the Barents Sea. The Russians used the same tactic when a start was made on the negotiations for the so-called gray zone agreements, which cover the regulation of fishing in a 65,000 square kilometer area north and east of North Cape. This gray zone area is part of the 155,000 square km disputed area between the sector line and the median line, which Norway wants to use as the basis for a demarcation line.

One of the reasons for rejecting the Soviet proposals was because the area of mutual restraint would comprise less than one-sixth of the disputed area, that is, around 25,000 square km. Moreover, undisputed Norwegian continental shelf west of the sector line would fall within the area.

It is the view of the Norwegian Government that mutual restraint in exploring the resources on the continental shelf must cover the whole of the disputed area between the median line and the sector line, as long as an agreement on the demarcation line has not been reached.

As far as undisputed Norwegian continental shelf areas are concerned there is no reason for restraint. Here the Norwegian Government will always adopt the measures it considers necessary in connection with the exploration and exploitation of resources.

The Soviet proposal was put forward during the demarcation line negotiations in Oslo 7-11 December. The Soviet Government was informed 23 December that the proposal is unacceptable.

AFTENPOSTEN URGES EUROPEAN SUPPORT FOR SANCTIONS

[Editorial]

[Excerpt] President Ronald Reagan has decided to act for the good of the Polish nation. His behavior is not drastic or a challenge. The immediate economic sanctions he has introduced against the Soviet Union are moderate. As a political tool they are significant first and foremost as a warning to the rulers in the Kremlin that the United States will no longer tolerate the repression of the freedom of a people, as we are witnessing in Poland. This U.S. signal to Moscow is clear enough to sharpen relations between the two superpowers. This is a development everyone regrets. A world in which the two giants are on a collision course is not a pleasant place to be. But is only right and reasonable that one of them should react when the other pursues a policy which endangers world peace.

President Reagan's decision will have a mixed reception from U.S. allies in Europe. It is possible that it will lead to unwelcome unrest within the Western defense alliance. Reagan is aware that he is running this risk. And a divided Europe would be a welcome gift to the Soviet Union. It would be a tragedy for us who live in this part of the world if we were unable to gather in a joint front behind President Reagan.

Poland's fate is a regional problem. It is right outside our front door. The Europeans were lukewarm in their reaction to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan 2 years ago. For many of us it was a country lying so far from our own latitudes that it would have to look after itself. Poland is a part of Europe. It is our duty to show our solidarity with the freedom-fighting Polish Europeans in a somewhat more concrete fashion than mere rhetorical declarations of sympathy.

Let us celebrate the new year with Lech Walesa and those who stand at his side very much in our thoughts.

PAPER VIEWS 'WEAK AND TRIVIAL PUNISHMENTS'

PM060947 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 27 Dec 81 p 2

[Editorial: "Poland in Darkness"]

[Excerpt] The U.S. President used strong words when he delivered a warning to those in power in Poland and the leaders in the Kremlin just before Christmas. But his punishments were weak and trivial.

Halting export credits worth $25 million, denying the Polish airline permission to fly to the United States and expelling the Polish fishing fleet from U.S. waters are hardly reprisals able to help to make life easier for the millions being repressed and the thousands sitting in prisons and internment camps.

Addressing both the Polish generals and those who have aided them, Reagan said that "their crimes will cost them dearly when in the future they have to deal with the United States and free peoples everywhere." The fact that the President and his staff after 3 days of intensive planning ignored demands made from various quarters for tougher reprisals shows two things: that the U.S. administration is not interested in bringing about a crisis with the Soviet Union and that he is aware that he would not have the support of West Europe for any further sanctions.

The day before Reagan's speech several West European governments announced that they considered that decisions to impose sanctions would only tend to weaken the cause of Poland. This is a situation reminiscent of the reaction 2 years ago after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, when West Europe was opposed to powerful reprisals and Jimmy Carter's "punishment" -- apart from the Olympic boycott -- was limited to reducing Soviet fishing rights in U.S. waters and canceling grain deliveries to the Soviet Union.

In the present situation Reagan still has a card to play. He could cancel the planned meeting between Secretary of State Haig and Foreign Minister Gromyko, but the question is whether even the threat of canceling talks on strategic arms is at present more serious than what Moscow runs the risk of losing in Poland.

TURKISH TROOPS REINFORCED BY EXTRA DIVISION

NC051202 Nicosia O KIRIKAS in Greek 5 Jan 82 pp 1, 7

[Excerpts] According to reliable information, a few days ago the Turkish side actually did make a threat to conduct a new military operation in Cyprus. The intimidating warning by Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas the other day about a "preemptive military operation" was not irrelevant to the above threat. Also within this same framework are orchestrated efforts by the Turkish and Turkish Cypriot press to present the Greek Cypriot side as allegedly reinforcing its defense shield, whereas it is well known that Turkey is feverishly reinforcing its forces in Cyprus with additional troops, helicopters and all types of arms.

Reliable information from cross-checked sources and foreign diplomatic missions say:

-- The Turkish occupation forces have recently been reinforced by a whole division (13,000 men), which has been deployed in the Tymbou airport area.

-- The Attila forces in Cyprus have recently been reinforced with huge new helicopters which can each carry 50 men with full combat gear.

-- According to appraisals by military circles, in the event of a military operation these helicopters could be used to transport forces to the rear of the National Guard defense lines.

According to the same information, both the Turkish Cypriot leaders and Evren's junta in Ankara have leaked the above information to diplomatic representatives of Western governments in an obvious attempt to exercise indirect pressure on the new Greek Government of Mr Papandreou. Diplomatic circles have observed that the Turkish threat may be the result of U.S. inspiration in order to diminish the weight and negotiating strength of Mr Papandreou at the forthcoming negotiations for the U.S. bases in Greece. The same circles have added that the scenario may be aimed at a diplomatic and military defeat in Cyprus, which will weaken and undermine Mr Papandreou's determination on Greek national issues.

Nevertheless, we are informed that for the time being the Turkish threat has fallen flat because it has been confronted with resoluteness by both the Greek Government and the National Guard, which are in a position successfully to face any such Turkish threat.

U.S. RESPONSIBLE FOR ANY TURKISH ACTION

["My Opinion" column by "Observer": "The Americans equally responsible if the Turks create undesirable situations"]

[Text] We will hold the Americans equally responsible and consider them as moral perpetrators in the event the Turks start realizing their threats and create any new fait accompli in Cyprus.

It would be naive for any Greek Cypriot to believe that Ankara can proceed with any dynamic action here in Cyprus without having ensured U.S. consent and approval of its actions.

Whatever Ankara may do, it will be with Washington's approval. Consequently, at this early stage this newspaper (and we believe that on this point we are also expressing the feeling of all of Cypriot Hellenism) warns the Americans that they and the Turks bear equal responsibility if the latter push things to the extreme and want to create undesirable situations.

Everybody knows that Turkey's military regime constitutes a faithful satellite of Washington and that the present Turkish dictators are puppets of the Americans. Moreover, everybody knows that the Turkish junta is absolutely dependent on the United States and every move or activity by the junta is directed by its masters in Washington.

Consequently and naturally:

If Ankara decides to proceed with the creation of a hot crisis here in Cyprus or with the creation of new faits accomplis, for instance the declaration of a separate Turkish Cypriot state, in essence the decisions will be emanating from Washington. [last five words published in boldface type]

Virtually, the actions of the Turks will bear the U.S. seal of endorsement, will have been encouraged by the United States and will be the result of a prior Washington-Ankara agreement. So, let certain people not try to present, in a naive manner, the American element as an "innocent dove" in the whole situation which has been created by the Turkish provocations and threats. And, moreover, let them not try to present the Americans to us as "saviors" because the Americans will suddenly appear as the "deus ex machina" to save us from a new Turkish advance or avert the declaration of a separate state.

These are all idle tales.

Because logic says this Turkish propaganda of lies about the Greek Cypriots being armed, allegations about the transfer of missiles and aircraft, all the threats against Greece and Cyprus, the entire effort by the Turks to create an artificial crisis, may even constitute a U.S. inspiration or U.S. invention to blackmail the Greek Government against severing its relations with NATO and carrying out its plans for the U.S. bases in Greece.

Thus the United States cannot pose as an innocent dove and savior when one of its obedient subordinates does as he does, or threatens to do, against Cyprus and Greece. We consider that the United States is responsible for the escalated Turkish provocations and threats. The United States ought to intervene from the first moment and call on their puppets in Ankara to show logic and wisdom. Moreover, we will consider the Americans as equally responsible and as the moral perpetrators in the event the Turks realize their threats. Because it is the Americans who pull the strings and program the Turkish brains in Ankara....

U.S. REPORT ON CYPRUS HARMFUL TO SETTLEMENT

NC052040 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 5 Jan 82 p 5

[From the "ELEVTHEROTIPIA Positions" column: "The Same Tactics?"]

[Text] If what the Turkish paper HURRIYET has published about the contents of the report by U.S. State Department adviser Dillery on the Cyprus issue is true, then the only thing that can be said is that the position the U.S. adviser has outlined in the report is the result of expediency and is far from being even vaguely constructive or conducive to efforts toward finding a just solution to the Cyprus issue. What could be the meaning of Mr Dillery's statement that "withdrawal of the Turkish troops from Cyprus will have dangerous consequences"? We consider this excerpt from the U.S. adviser's report as evidence of recognition of the occupation fait accompli in Cyprus. And, naturally, we completely reject and strongly denounce this position.

The impression has been created recently that the United States intends to put more pressure on Ankara in connection with the Cyprus issue. We are waiting for some proof of this. On the contrary, however, we have the Dillery report which, if what HURRIYET has published is true, reveals a different spirit, another approach. We are pointing out this fact, which for us is indicative, and noting that if this tactic continues it will only cause additional rifts in Cyprus-U.S. relations and, naturally, additional traumas for the Cypriot people, who are hoping that some day the strong nations will face their problem with more decency.

ATHENS 'NOT BOUND' TO EEC COMMUNIQUE ON POLAND

BRANDT REJECTS MEDIATOR ROLE IN CYPRUS QUESTION

[Text] Athens, 5 Jan (DPA) -- The SPD chairman, Willy Brandt, said in Athens Tuesday that he could not undertake the task of being a mediator in the Cyprus problem. Brandt arrived in Athens after a 2-day stay in Cyprus and will have talks with the Greek prime minister, Andreas Papandreou, before he flies on to a session of the North-South commission in Kuwait. Brandt said he was a friend of Cyprus and could, in the view of Cyprus President Spiros Kiprianou, possibly help smooth the way to a solution; yet in doing this he would not undertake the role of a mediator. Brandt said of his impressions in Cyprus that he was not very optimistic with regard to the forthcoming new round of talks between the communities. Nevertheless this new round of talks had to be held in order to bring the Cyprus question after this to an international forum.

Brandt Concludes Visit

[Text] Mr Brandt left Athens at 1700 today. He was seen off at the airport by Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos. In a statement, he said that during his talks with the prime minister he conveyed his impressions from his contacts in Cyprus. He said: (?I believe) that during the intercommunal talks both sides will do everything they can by discussing the issues one by one. I think the international community and the EEC must pay greater attention to the Cyprus problem than they have been paying so far, and particularly not (?solely to Cyprus) but also to the entire region [passage indistinct].

OPPOSITION, COMMUNISTS REACT TO ECONOMIC MEASURES

[Excerpts] There has been both positive and negative reaction by the productive classes and political parties to the second batch of economic measures announced last Sunday evening by Prime Minister Papandreou for the recovery of our economy.

A statement issued by the New Democracy party says the second batch of measures, announced without prior consultation with those concerned and despite the preelection promises, are more disappointing than the first batch. Specifically, the statement stresses:

-- The announced measures will increase stagflation and economic uncertainty. This uncertainty is caused by measures threatening and discouraging private initiative, such as the suspension of law No 1116/81 until a new one is enacted, the imposition of taxes on shares and immovable property, the establishment of state intervention organizations, and the overall expansion of policing.

-- Concerning the supervisory council for enterprises, which falls within the policy of socialization, it would be useful if it were made clear that this does not constitute the beginning of nationalization.

-- The second batch introduces policing in the state system (a fact which constitutes regression) and in the functioning of prices (which will intensify profiteering).

--The measures the government announced it will implement for tax evasion have been in force for the past 3 years. The government, however, is silent about the manner in which it will combat overpricing and underpricing.

--Conflicting targets and contradictions are established. Thus on one hand construction activity is encouraged, while on the other there are threats of taxation on immovable property and control of prices of building materials. He is overconcerned about monopolies and he is establishing a gigantic insurance unit by unifying all the banks' insurance companies. He talks about economizing in investments and he is establishing a national pharmaceutical industry, whereas he could use the existing industries without risking huge investment capital.

The press office of the KKE Central Committee has also issued a statement stressing:

--With the measures it announced yesterday, the government basically assigns the stimulation of the economy to the so-called private initiative of monopolies, keeps the "incentives," and downgrades the primary role of public investments.

--The government has not announced any nationalizations; it leaves untouched the property of the big monopolistic enterprises. The so-called "supervisory council for enterprise" leads to covering up and enhancing the domination of monopolies.

--The announced measures do not provide for confronting the immunity of foreign monopolies or for a revision of the gangster agreements.

--Through these measures, the government does not take a stand on the vital issue of [EEC] intergation.

The executive office of the KKE-Interior describes the measures as an attempt to pacify the uneasiness of the so-called "private initiative" -- namely, of big capital. A statement issued in this connection notes that there is some reneging on the income policy and, particularly, on the point concerning increases in low income following pressures exerted by the employers organizations. The statement also stresses that recovery in 1982 is assigned to private initiative; there are no plans for any direct socialization in 1982 within the concept of change in the relations of ownership -- that is, nationalization. The measures for controlling prices appear to be extremely weak and will only slightly disturb the profiteering activities.

As a whole, the KKE-Interior statement concludes, the measures constitute backward steps on certain criticial points as compared with the first batch. Nevertheless, these measures create considerable room for intervention by the labor movement.

GENERAL STAFF DECIDES PROMOTIONS, RETIREMENTS

[Text] The council of chiefs of the General Staff held two meetings today, in the morning and in the afternoon, and decided on the following:

The following major generals are promoted to the rank of lieutenant general: Karavanidhis, Soundhias, Papanikolaou, Kasapidhis and Panouryias.

The following lieutenant generals are retired: Lambridhis, Katsadhimas, Seretis and Dhikaiakos.

The following major generals are also retired: Karousos, Zaganas, Zervas, Malamas, Rossis, Kefalas, Ailianos, Polizos, Polimeropoulos and Yiannakopoulos.

Navy: Rear Admiral Rombotis is promoted to the rank of vice admiral. Commodores Malliaris, Pappas and Giokezas are promoted to rear admiral. Rear Admirals Paizis and Manioudhakis and Commodore Tapinis are retired.

Air Force: Lieutenant Generals Khatziris and Trakakis are promoted to the rank of air force general. Lieutenant Generals Thomopoulos and Soukoulos are retired.

The Supreme National Defense Council met later and approved the following postings of lieutenant generals, vice admirals and air force generals:

ANKARA WORKING TOWARD FULL MEMBERSHIP IN EEC

[Text] Ankara, 5 Jan (AA) -- Commerce Minister Kemal Canturk said his government was taking the relevant steps to enable Turkey to join the EEC as a full member according to the rules set by the community. He made the comment at his press conference Tuesday while introducing the 1982 import regime. Turkey-EEC association council in order to ensure that political considerations are not allowed to affect economic relations, the minister said. [sentence as received]

Canturk did not have any hesitations about how the 1982 import target of $10 billion would be financed, listing the following estimated sources: $5.6 billion of exports, $2.8 billion in remittances by Turkish workers abroad and related sources, plus $825 million of program credits. Turkey had not stopped bilateral trade with Poland, Canturk said. He added, "If Poland wants to buy from Turkey, we shall export to Poland." In 1981, Canturk said, capital imports by the private sector totaled [word indistinct] while total imports by the public sector reached $244 million.

GREECE STRENGTHENING GREEK CYPRIOT ARMED FORCES

[Nilufer Yalcin report from Ankara]

[Excerpts] Information obtained so far regarding the efforts of the Greek Cypriot administration to increase its military strength with Greece's help indicates that the Greeks are engaged in some long-term calculations on the island. According to the assessment by strategy experts in Ankara, most of the arms and equipment built up in Cyprus recently is intended more for aggressive than defensive purposes. The number of Greek personnel in the Greek Cypriot National Guard has been increased to 2,600, while the Greek contingent on the island far exceeds the 950 men which the treaty of guarantees stipulates. The vast majority of company commanders in the Greek Cypriot National Guard are Greek officers from Greece.

Apart from these facts, the following have been ascertained in connection with the armament activities in the Greek Cypriot sector:

1. The Greek Cypriots are constructing a new airfield at Yeroskipos. This airfield is to provide a base for an air force for the Greek Cypriot National Guard. It has been learned that as soon as this airfield is completed Greece is planning to give the Greek Cypriots 32 F-84 fighter planes.

2. The Greek Cypriot National Guard has obtained U.S. "Chaparral" antiaircraft missiles. These surface-to-air missiles can be mounted on and fired from tracked vehicles. It is believed these missiles come from Greece.

3. Greece has transferred 25 armored personnel carriers to the Greek Cypriot administration.

It has been ascertained that ferryboats serving Pireaus-Rhodes-Limassol carry TIR (International Highway Transport) trucks loaded with large quantities of arms and ammunition. These activities are reported to have been intensified in recent weeks.

Representations made by the TFSC to the United Nations are based on this information.

IRANIAN FOREIGN MINISTER ON RELATIONS WITH TURKEY

TA021532 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1500 GMT 2 Jan 82

[Text] Iranian Foreign Minister Ali Akbar Velayati has said that Iran wants friendly relations with Turkey to continue through mutual understanding. In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy airport on his way home after concluding an official visit to Syria, Velayati noted that there are no problems between Turkey and Iran that need to be solved.

He also held a short meeting with Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal at the airport. In a statement after the meeting, Ozal said he will make an official visit to Iran in the coming days in a bid to develop trade relations between the two countries. He added that his short meeting with Velayati was beneficial from the viewpoint of his forthcoming visit.

ISTANBUL PUBLICATION BANNED IN ADANA AREA

[Statement by the press and public relations department of the 6th Corps and Adana, Icel, Kahramanmaras, Gaziantep, Adiyaman and Hatay Martial Law Command]

[Text] It has been determined that the daily YENI NESIL [NEW GENERATION] [words indistinct] has been publishing articles that exploit the religious beliefs of the people, violate the principle of secularism, disrupt tranquillity and are politically motivated, secessionist and provocative. Therefore the possession, sale or distribution of the daily, which is published in Istanbul, in the area under the jurisdiction of this martial law command has been banned as of 6 January until further notice.

Militants Arrested in Trabzon

[Summary] A statement by the Martial Law Command of Trabzon, Erzincan and 10 other provinces in the vicinity says that Ali Kemal Celik, formerly a teacher of physics in the Trabzon high school, has been arrested for conducting propaganda in a bid to revive the Revolutionary Path [Dev-Yol] organization by having pamphlets distributed in his school and by other means. Sixteen persons accused of collaborating with him have also been detained. Three officials of the Education Ministry department in Trabzon have been taken into custody by the security forces for failing to report the incident on time.

Five high-ranking members of the local Dev-Yol organization were arrested in Erzincan by the security forces. They are being accused of murder, of being active in an illegal organization and of committing other crimes.

As a result of operations conducted by the 3d Army security forces in their area of responsibility, 52 persons belonging to extremist leftist organizations and 5 others belonging to extremist rightist organizations were arrested. The following weapons were seized during the operations: 480 pistols, 6 submachineguns, 20 rifles, 2 bombs, 3,697 rounds of ammunition, 10 dynamite sticks and 255 magazines. Some of the weapons had been buried in the fields.

TA311552 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 31 Dec 81

[Text] Ankara, 31 Dec (AA) -- Seventy militants of two illegal leftist groups calling themselves "Young Pioneers" and "Socialist Youth Association" were apprehended in Ankara. Police sources said the militants had been placed under detention by martial law authorities and were being charged with several cases of unlawful demonstration, bombings and for extracting funds from citizens by force. Six pistols and bullets were also seized during operations.

[Summary] Following operations in Gaziantep's Araban district since 15 November, security forces have captured 13 militants belonging to an illegal separatist organization, together with 2 pistols, 1 Kalashnikov rifle and 45 rounds of ammunition. The militants are wanted for murder and martial law violations.

[Summary] The trial of 43 members of the illegal Turkish People's Liberation Party Front-Unity of Action organization suspected of attempting to overthrow the constitutional order by force has begun in the 1st Military Court of the Istanbul Martial Law Command. Death penalties are being sought for 14 of the suspects. The indictment, which was read today, stated that the suspects were responsible for numerous incidents of armed assault, armed robbery and bombing, the murder of two prison wardens, one gendarme private and a state monopoly store warehouse manager and arms smuggling.

Mr Gunes, who was accused of attempting to prevent the reading of the charges, was expelled from the court along with a second lawyer, Turgut Kazan, who had also attempted to be given the floor. The expulsions prompted twenty-three other lawyers present in the courtroom to walk out, protesting that they could not provide an adequate defense for their clients under such conditions.

Despite the absence of the lawyers, the prosecuting attorney continued reading the charges, stopping at page 111 of the 870-page document and adjourning the trial until January 6.

The 52 defendants belong to the 800,000 strong Confederation of Progressive Turkish Trade Unions (DISK), which was banned after the military takeover in Turkey 15 months ago. They are accused, among other things, of organizing strikes "in rehearsal for a general strike."

OFFICIAL PROTESTS JAMMING OF BBC TRANSMISSIONS

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Britain has protested to Poland over the jamming of the BBC's Polish services.

Lord Trefgarne, a junior Foreign Office minister, summoned the Polish ambassador, Mr Stefan Staniszewski, yesterday after the BBC announcement in a statement that all its Polish services were being jammed.

BBC engineers, the statement said, confirmed that the jamming had been traced to two small towns in the Soviet Union, Smolensk and Kaliningrad.

Officials indicated that it was likely the Soviet ambassador, Mr Viktor Popov, would also be summoned to be told that the government condemned such action.

Lord Trefgarne told the Polish ambassador that jamming was contrary to the Helsinki agreement signed by powers from East and West, including Poland, which sought to improve contacts across international frontiers.

The Foreign Office confirmed that Lord Trefgarne also raised with the ambassador the restrictions imposed by the Polish Government on British diplomats and journalists confined to Warsaw.

It was learned yesterday that Lord Carrington unsuccessfully sought an agreement at the meeting of Common Market foreign ministers in Brussels on Monday to impose similar restrictions on Polish diplomats in foreign capitals.

Britain is free to act on its own, but officials said no action was likely, at least until after the meeting of foreign ministers of the North Atlantic alliance in Brussels next week.

The BBC said jamming began exactly a fortnight after the BBC increased its output in Poland from seven to eight transmissions a day and up to a total of 26 hours of programmes a week.

Earlier jamming of the BBC's Polish service ceased in 1963.

SCHMIDT: 'NO DIFFICULTIES' IN TALKS WITH REAGAN

DW061319 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2135 GMT 5 Jan 82

[Interview by reporter Friedrich Nowottny with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Washington -- recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] President Reagan gave you a book about Afghanistan. Is that a broad hint that the reactions of the Federal Republic to developments in Poland should be as strong as they were when the Soviets invaded Afghanistan?

[Answer] No, that is not true; we discussed Afghanistan and the constant military invasion and interference by the Soviet Union. We also discussed the suggestion of Professor Ehmke to establish Afghanistan day, an intention that was accepted by the U.S. side.

[Answer] I would not say that. The lasting Soviet intervention in Afghanistan has a deep meaning and it is a violation of international law. I have not changed my opinion on that, an opinion I clearly outlined in the Kremlin a year and a half ago.

[Question] As regards Poland, does the United States, the President and his advisers -- expect sharper reactions of the Federal Republic to developments in Poland, more in line with U.S. reactions?

[Answer] No, I do not think so. We adopted a common press statement at breakfast after we had finished our talks. We had no difficulties at all agreeing on the texts. The Federal Government formulated its policy regarding Poland 5 days after the Warsaw events.

[Answer] You are quite right, it has not been noticed here correctly, namely my Bundestag speech on Friday, 18 December, the debate and the almost unanimous Bundestag decision at the end of the debate. In addition we agreed that closer consultations are necessary on measures to be taken, consultations which have not taken place on a high level.

[Question] So the action of the United States was not coordinated with the Federal Government, which felt surprised?

[Answer] Neither have we been consulted nor other governments. I have said it clearly here. But the consultations are supposed to take place next week in the Council of Ministers of the North Atlantic alliance. Moreover both of us tend very much to want to reopen the Helsinki followup conference in Madrid, currently disrupted because of the Christmas holidays, with a special session on obviously grave violations in Poland with regard to the Helsinki Final Act. In other words, we agree very much on the direction of the influence we hope to exert. If I say hope to exert, I do not mean only the current military leadership in Poland but certainly also the Soviet leadership without whose pressure the Polish events would not have taken place.

[Question] But will you not always face the question of what practical steps you could take against the events in Poland? Was the problem of the natural gas and pipeline deal discussed?

[Answer] The natural gas and pipeline deal was not mentioned at all.

[Answer] This intention obviously does not exist here although we, who did not suggest it, pointed out after all that one cannot ignore grain if one wants to impose economic sanctions to severely hurt the Soviet Union. That is a really vulnerable point of the Soviet Union. No, the United States does not have this intention. The President made it clear on his own that he does not intend to disrupt or even discontinue the Geneva negotiations on medium-range missiles as a means of pressure against the Soviet Union. On the contrary, he made it very clear that it would serve our common Western interest if the negotiations were held most seriously.

[Question] How does one measure relations between two states? By the politicians' patting each other's shoulders, that is the patting of shoulders between you and the President, by public opinion, or maybe by both?

[Answer] By both, and in addition one must measure it by the achievements of both States to their mutual benefit. If one succeeds in addition in making public opinion of the two states, in this case the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany, realize that one has achieved something to their mutual benefit, one has established a good basis for lasting good relations. Relations between the United States and the Federal Republic have been very good for many years, for decades. We have also achieved very good relations between the public opinions of France and the public opinion of Germany.

[Question] And looking back over the past months you are not glossing anything over?

[Answer] No, not at all with regard to the past months, but also not with regard to the past days. I want to say it again: The German policy with regard to Poland was formulated and articulated by a Bundestag decision 5 days before the U.S. President gave his speech.

GENSCHER VIEWS POSSIBILITY OF AID TO POLAND

[Text] Stuttgart, 6 Jan (DPA) -- According to Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the Federal Republic, together with its Western partners, is prepared "to give a large amount of financial aid" to a Poland returning "to the path of reform." This was stressed by the FDP chairman today at the liberal's traditional Epiphany meeting in Stuttgart. Genscher made it clear that despite its policy of noninterference, the Federal Government is "on the side of the Polish citizens" who "through reform and renewal, want a little more freedom, a little more self-determination for themselves and their people." The Federal Republic will continue however, not to interfere in the internal affairs of the Polish People's Republic.

According to Genscher, no one has reason "to speculate about Western differences of opinion with regard to Poland." He made it clear that broad agreement existed during the German-U.S. talks in Washington on Tuesday on the situation in Poland. Genscher earlier stated right after arriving at Stuttgart airport from Washington that "I cannot possibly imagine a greater convergence."

The FDP politician urgently appealed to the Soviet Union to let the Polish people "determine their own fate." Poland is giving the Soviet Union an opportunity to prove its adherence to the Helsinki Final Act. He appealed to the leadership in Warsaw to lift martial law, release the prisoners and resume the dialogue with "Solidarity" and the church. Genscher gave his assurance that, despite martial law in Poland, the West will continue its efforts for disarmament and arms control. Anyone who calls for the disarmament negotiations to be broken off was "taught a lesson" by the German-U.S. statement on Tuesday.

With regard to the current disarmament talks in Geneva, Genscher called on the leadership in Moscow "to take seriously" the West's proposal for a "zero option" on medium-range missiles. The zero option would remove "a heavy burden" from Europe.

He added that with regard to security policy, Europe should not see itself as "living off U.S. security guarantees" as this would lead to a scarcely tolerable dependency. Anyone in Europe who "complains about dependence on the United States" must demand that Europeans "make their full contribution toward jointly securing peace and freedom."

In Genscher's view, the European Community is facing the question whether to have a fresh attempt at unity with a step toward European union or whether to return more or less to a "customs union." The EEC's foreign policy cooperation should also include more and more security policy issues; there is obviously a considerable need for action in this respect. The worldwide hopes placed in Europe are great. Genscher was critical about statements in the Federal Republic which viewed relations with the EEC in a "cost-benefit analysis." Europe should not end at the frontiers with the Warsaw Pact. The goal is to gradually develop a European peace order.

EEC, U.S. TALKS SEEN CONFIRMING BONN'S POLICY

[Text] Bonn, 6 Jan (DPA) -- The Federal Government today warmly welcomed the results of and statements emanating from the German-U.S. talks in Washington and the EEC foreign ministers' meeting in Brussels. Following a cabinet session chaired by Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD), Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl said the government sees these : clear confirmation of its policy and a consolidation of unity between allies on the "major issue of international relations that developments in Poland represent."

The three demands raised in Washington and Brussels -- lifting martial law in Poland, releasing internees and resuming the dialogue with trade unions and the church -- were described by Ruehl as a Federal Government and Bundestag contribution to Western policy on Poland. He stressed that there has been no reversal in the government's view regarding the Soviet Union's responsibility for the events in Poland. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker last week stressed that Bonn did not regard Moscow as the "instigator" of the measures in Poland whereas U.S. President Ronald Reagan and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt pointed to the USSR's responsibility in their statement.

Ruehl stated that the Federal Government had never overlooked Moscow's responsibility for the imposition of martial law, it had from the start assumed that "the Soviet and Polish Governments had worked together." Otherwise, Schmidt would have had no reason to broach the subject of the situation in Poland with Soviet party leader Leonid Brezhnev in his letter of 25 December.

The chairman of the CSU group in the Bundestag, Friedrich Zimmermann, called it a black day for the Western alliance when Schmidt and Reagan did not agree on joint measures against the martial law in Poland. In an interview for BILD-ZEITUNG (Thursday's edition), Zimmermann said the federal chancellor is unwilling and unable to act. It is time that the West awakens from its "blissful dreams of detente." "The United States already has, as have the French. Only the Federal Government still sleeps on."

SPD WELCOMES SCHMIDT-REAGAN STATEMENTS ON POLAND

[Text] Bonn, 6 Jan (DPA) -- The SPD Bundestag group welcomes the fact that Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and U.S. President Ronald Reagan have called on the Polish authorities again to lift martial law in Poland, release prisoners and resume dialogue with the church and "Solidarity," according to SPD Parliamentary Business Manager Gerhard Jahn. The parliamentary group shares the view that military intervention in Poland would have "very serious consequences" for international relations and would fundamentally change the whole world political situation, Jahn stressed in a statement published in Bonn today.

All those who during the past weeks and days have tried, like leading representatives of the CDU/CSU, to read deep-seated differences betwee the ruling Social Democratic government and its U.S. allies, must be taught a lesson, Jahn said. Relations between the Federal Republic and the USSR are "close and trusting and will continue to be so."

KOHL URGES REEXAMINATION OF ALLIANCE COOPERATION

[Text] Bonn, 6 Jan (DPA) -- Even after the conclusion of the German-U.S. talks in Washington, the process of political cooperation in the Western alliance is still in need of urgent reexamination, according to opposition leader Helmut Kohl. In a statement on the visit by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to U.S. President Ronald Reagan, Kohl stated in Bonn today that the joint communique clearly expressed U.S. concern that no decisions had yet been reached within the alliance which "best correspond with" the "common goals" of the alliance "to prevent anything which might undermine its respective action."

If the chancellor in Washington "suddenly for the first time remembered after 3 weeks" the joint Bundestag resolution and even boasted about it, then this was noted with satisfaction by the CDU/CSU, said Kohl. "After all," he said, "this resolution was adopted by the Budestag at our suggestion." The demands it made vis-a-vis Poland -- lifting martial law, release of prisoners and internees and continuation of the process of reform -- were indispensable for the opposition.

Kohl criticized the fact that the West had for too long "presented a picture of internal dispute and political helplessness" in the Polish crisis. It needed the summit meeting in Washington for "Federal Chancellor Schmidt to reach a common assessment of the situation and arrive at the view that the Soviet Union bears responsibility for the events in Poland." While the Europeans were still talking, the U.S. Government had already decided on the countermeasures. Through their attitude to these, the European partners head signaled the Western alliance's disunity, political weakness and an inability to act to the Soviet Union. This was an unworthy game which had put the West on the defensive and the Soviet Union on the offensive.

Kohl spoke of a growing alienation between Bonn and Washington, for which the federal chancellor and SPD bore considerable responsibility. They had, in a barely disguised manner been considerate of Moscow and at the same time openly criticized Washington. This must shake the Western alliance since the Federal Republic was the alliance's main pillar in Europe.

EUROPEAN POLITICIANS SUPPORT FRG-U.S. STATEMENT

[Text] Stuttgart, 6 Jan (DPA) -- After attending a working meeting of leading European liberal politicians, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher told journalists that the Polish leadership has so far not shown any of the signs awaited by the Federal Government indicating a lifting of martial law. He said: "Such signals do not exist as yet."

A declaration of the "Federation of Liberal and Democratic Parties of the Community" (FLDPC) says: "In the present circumstances" economic sanctions are not suitable means to "influence the situation in Poland in a fundamental and positive way." Rather, aid for the suffering population should be increased.

The politicians, among them FLDPC President Willy de Clercq, president of the European Paliament Simone Veil and President of the EEC Commission Gaston Thorn, noted their agreement with the most recent declaration of the European Community and with the results of the German-U.S. summit, which demanded the lifting of martial law, the release of those interned and the resumption of the dialogue between the Polish Government, Solidarity and the church.

SPOKESMAN WARNS AGAINST FORCED POLISH EMIGRATION

[Text] Bonn, 6 Jan (DPA) -- Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl confirmed today after the meeting of the federal cabinet that the Federal Government had no indications that Warsaw was planning to deport the internees. Neither has Bonn any knowledge so far that some internees want to emigrate.

Ruehl added that the Federal Government, on the basis of universal human rights, was in favor of everyone being able to freely decide whether he wanted to emigrate or remain in the country. Should the Polish leadership intend to force trade union leaders or other persons to leave Poland against their will "and thus exclude them from participating in and shaping Polish politics," Bonn would regard this as a further aggravation of the situation in Poland. Such action would run counter to the assurances by the Polish leadership to return to a policy of dialogue.

PRESS VIEWS OUTCOME OF SCHMIDT-REAGAN TALKS

DW061149 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 6 Jan 82

[From the press review]

[Excerpts] Today's main issue is the talk between Federal Chancellor Schmidt and U.S. President Reagan.

KOELNER STADT-ANZEIGER writes: As regards the White House, one can say: never trouble till trouble troubles you. The accompanying music of U.S. press commentators with regard to Ronald Reagan's talks with the chancellor is a bit too shrill to be considered a realistic expression of serious policy. A mood is being fanned here regardless for what reason. Freedom of opinion is no protection against foolishness. The President and particularly his secretary of state cannot and will not seriously doubt this chancellor's and his foreign minister's loyalty to the alliance. Schmidt and Genscher offer their experience and their ideas in a difficult international situation which concerns us particularly. That is a most natural thing for politicians for whom loyalty and responsibility regarding their office means something.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU writes: Federal Chancellor Schmidt and Foreign Minister Genscher pointed out to U.S. President Reagan on Tuesday that the Federal Republic does not endanger the cohesion of the Western alliance. The special Brussels session of the European Community's foreign ministers produced just in time the necessary clarification. Suddenly there was nobody among the 10 who dared suggest that one should immediately join the U.S. economic sanctions against Moscow, neither British Foreign Minister Lord Carrington, the Italian Emilio Colombo and least of all France's clumsily maneuvering Claude Cheysson. The opinion spread by certain Western media and politicians that all of West Europe would be prepared to establish a front against Moscow if the Germans were not so fearful with regard to their trade with the East. This opinion turned out to be pure nonsense. Besides this negative backing for Schmidt and Genscher in their Washington talks, the meeting of European Community ministers produced little. Hope for reestablishment of Polish liberties and resumption of the reform course is evaporating. That was the quotation from FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU.

LUEBECKER NACHRICHTEN comments: United in the idea to embark on different ways -- that is about all that can be seen behind the far-reaching agreement which was pointed out in Washington after the talks between Federal Chancellor Schmidt and President Reagan on Poland and the assessment of the situation. The following news comes over the Atlantic: The chancellor is also convinced that the Soviet Union is responsible for the oppression through the martial law regime in Poland. Here at least Helmut Schmidt agreed with Ronald Reagan. It seems that the transatlantic connection is considerably disturbed. Disturbances continues at any rate between Bonn and Washington.

DOZIER THOUGHT NOT KILLED; FACING 'QUESTIONING'

PA062318 Paris AFP in Spanish 2252 GMT 6 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 6 Jan (AFP) -- The questioning of General Dozier "continues" said communique No 3 of the Red Brigades, sent tonight to the editorial office of the Padua (Venice) morning newspaper, a member of the newspaper's staff told AGP. Therefore the four announcements of the general's execution sent tonight to several Italian newspapers, are false, the newsman said.

Communique No 3 is made up of 10 sheets, the report issued by the morning paper said. IL GIORNALE D'ITALIA also received a communique, but it is seven pages long and is dated 6 January. The report says the first five pages are dedicated to Red Brigades ideology and the others to the questioning of the hostage. According to the communique, Dozier is revealing information about the organization of NATO forces in Italy and is giving the names of Italians participating. Part of the questioning deals with the training of allied soldiers, the Vietnam war, where Dozier was first assigned, the reasons for the failure to overthrow the Castro regime during the Bay of Pigs operation and similar matters

Dozier 'Testimony'

[Text] Rome, 7 Jan (ANSA) -- The transcript of the alleged "testimony" given by kidnapped U.S. General James Dozier to his Red Brigades captors, who have subjected him to what they call a people's trial, turned up in Rome and Padua Wednesday night along with the terrorist organization's communique Number Three. It appeared that a photo of the general was included in the documents, found in Padua on the basis of a telephone tip.

Also yesterday evening, four separate Italian terrorist organizations claimed responsibility for the wounding in Rome Wednesday of Nicola Simone, deputy chief of Rome's police units handling anti-terrorist and political operations (Digos). A man claiming to speak for the Red Brigades telephoned a Rome daily to say that it was the "BR" that shot Simone and that next time they would not just wound him but finish him off. The caller also gave directions as to where communique Number Three and Dozier's alleged "testimony" could be found. A second anonymous call in Rome claimed that the attack on Simone was carried out by the extreme rightwing "New Order" group. In Milan, a caller claimed that "the Front Line Armed Nuclei" organization had shot the police official, who was seriously wounded in the attack. A fourth caller claimed that a group called "the Revolutionary Armed Nuclei" was responsible.

As to the transcript of Dozier's testimony, it appeared that in the twenty days of interrogation since his kidnapping in Verona on December 17, all his captors were able to obtain from their prisoner was an account of his career and several military assessments of past events. There was no classified information on NATO's strategic plans or material of a political nature. The tone of the hostage's testimony was said to be dignified and firm. As in the "people's trial" of kidnapped Italian statesman Aldo Moro in 1978, the interrogators seemed informed on international events but primarily concerned with exploiting for political purposes any phrase enunciated by their prisoner, observers said.

Dozier recounted his military career from the time of his entrance into the West Point Academy to the time he assumed his present post of vice commander of NATO's land forces in southern Europe. Asked for a judgment of the Soviet missile crisis in Cuba in 1962 and the Bay of Pigs fiasco, Dozier said that it had been absolutely necessary that the missiles be removed from Cuba. He also called the operative execution of the Bay of Pigs landing "a mistake."

Asked how NATO trains special anti-guerilla units, the general said that a school exists in the United States "to learn from our experience in Vietnam with regard to guerilla warfare." He said he did not have detailed information on such training in the other Atlantic alliance nations, however. Dozier also said that an Italian carabinieri captain in charge of security for the NATO command in Verona had warned of possible terrorist actions against American military personnel. This information most certainly came from the Italian secret services, the general said.

The Red Brigades communique Number Three was dated January 6, 1982 and contained the usual slogans plus a monotonous repetition of political analyses already contained in the previous BR documents.

In another development, a "BR" spokesman calling the Rome daily LA REPUBBLICA announced that Dozier had been killed and that his body would be found in a farmhouse in the Abruzzi mountain region some 50 kilometers from Pescara. The caller said the site lay between the villages of Popoli and Bussi. A careful search is being made of the zone, but police were skeptical. They thought it likely that the tip was another attempt to throw investigators off the trail. A similar ploy was used in the Moro kidnapping when the BR announced that the body of the Christian Democratic Party president had been dumped in a mountain lake (Duchessa) in the same Abruzzi region. This later proved only to be a diversionary tactic. Many weeks later Moro was killed by his Red Brigades captors (on May 9, 1978) and his body was found in a parked car in Rome.

Meanwhile the condition of Simone, who was struck in the jaw by two bullets, was said to be much improved after a two hour operation. It was learned that his assailants came to his home dressed as postmen. When Simone opened the door they started shooting at him, but as a precaution he had his own 38 Special in his hand and managed to get off a few shots at the terrorists as they fled. It was not known if he hit either of them.

In Verona, police issued three Identikits and two Photokits of the four-member team that nabbed Dozier. It was also learned that Premier Giovanni Spadolini has called a cabinet meeting for Friday to discuss the latest acts of terrorism.

GROUP CLAIMS ATTACK ON COUNTERTERROR OFFICIAL

[Text] Rome, 6 Jan (AFP) -- The assistant director of Italy's anti-terrorist police, the "Digos," was hit by three bullets in an attack at his home here today, but was reported out of danger after a two-hour operation. A group calling itself the Front Line Armed Nuclei (FLAN) claimed responsibility in Milan for the attack. Bullets hit Digos official Nicola Simone in the jaw, the cheeks and the tongue, doctors said.

Police said Mr Simone opened his door shortly after noon to a man disguised as a postman and that three other men and a woman were in the corridor. The group opened fire, but Mr Simone had a pistol in hand when he opened the door and fired back. A witness said one of the fleeing terrorists seemed to be wounded in the arm. Doctors said the Digos official would have to undergo another operation.

BOMB EXPLODES OPPOSITE U.S. ADMIRAL'S NAPLES HOME

[Text] Naples, 7 Jan (ANSA) -- A bomb exploded last night at a building site in Posillipo (Naples). The blast occurred opposite the villa where the U.S. admiral commanding the allied forces in southern Europe lives.

Police said that the bombing had to do with the local protection racket and was not aimed against the U.S. officer.

TWO ARRESTED IN ROME 4 JANUARY IDENTIFIED

The anti-terrorist investigators also maintained that the two may have been preparing another kidnapping, since chains, padlocks and adhesive tape of the kind used by the Red Brigades were found in their car, along with pistols, ammunition, and hand grenades. The two were arrested in Via Della Vite, a short distance from Rome's Spanish Steps, on Monday night, but another pair of young men aboard the car fled when police moved in and were not captured. Other material found in the car, including notebooks and documents, was not commented on by the police agents, who revealed only that the information they contained was "interesting." Police also established that the car had been rented in the north-west capital of Torino on December 30.

Concerning the suspected brigades member Petrella, anti-terrorism sources revealed that his brother and sister-in-law, Marina and Luigi Novelli, are also wanted by police on terrorist-connected charges. Stefano Petrella was arrested in 1979 and released after his preventive detention term ended before an indictment was formed. Together with his brother and sister-in-law, he was then confined to the central Italian Abruzzi area, from which all three later fled, prompting their search by police.

The two men arrested in Rome are suspected of being members of the Roman column of the Red Brigades, who were last heard from when they circulated copies of the leaflet put out by the Veneto column on the kidnapping of U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier in Verona on December 17. The copies of the leaflet turned up last week were wrapped like a Christmas present and hidden in the toilet of a central Rome bar.

3 JAN PRISON BREAK CLAIMED BY 'LEFTWING' GROUP

[Excerpt] Milan, 6 Jan (ANSA) -- A series of telephone calls to newspapers and news agency offices here have confirmed that the Sunday jail-break of four suspected "Front Line" terrorists from a prison in Rovigo is being claimed by the "Fighting Communist Nuclei," a subversive left-wing organization. Calls made on Tuesday evening to the Milan offices of ANSA and REPUBBLICA daily gave the message claiming the spectacular jail break as their own, and the caller who spoke to the REPUBBLICA also indicated where to find a flyer printed by the organization to vindicate their actions.

The flyer, found in a waste bin on a central street here, explained that the organization had acted "through a relationship of cooperation with a structure of 'communist organizations for proletarian liberation.'" Police here noted that this latter group is not known among the known list of left subversive organizations. After a review of the flyer, investigators here are beginning to give less credit to the idea that there is a connection between the jail break and the December 17 kidnapping of U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier from his Verona apartment. In fact, investigators noted, the flyer makes reference to "deep strategic differences" inside left subversive organizations, and no direct tie has ever been established between the group claiming the Rovigo prison escape and the Red Brigades.

OLESEN SEES 'GROSS VIOLATION' OF HELSINKI ACT

[Text] "The consequences for international detente of the Polish crisis will be much more serious if those in power in Poland do not attempt as soon as possible to replace the state of martial law with a dialogue," Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen said in a new year statement on the current situation in Poland. Kjeld Olesen went on:

"There have been many major problems attached to the Polish policy of renewal and reform, perhaps also because certain forces within Solidarity were not realistic enough in their demands. However, this cannot justify the policy of oppression in the wake of the state of martial law, from which the government must clearly dissociate itself. The loss of human life, several thousands of Poles arrested and the suppression of the rights of the trade unions are a gross violation of human rights and of the letter and spirit of Helsinki Final Act."

The foreign minister said further that he expects all countries which signed the Helsinki agreements to refrain from any form of interference in Polish affairs. "We must attach great importance to winning greater clarity concerning developments and avoid doing anything which could render more difficult a return to the policy of renewal in Poland," Kjeld Olesen said. He ended his statement with warm thanks to the organizations and the many individuals who have contributed to the humanitarian aid to Poland.

CPSU APPEALS TO SKP CHAIRMAN TO NOT RESIGN

[Text] The CPSU hopes that Aarne Saarinen will continue as chairman of the Finnish Communist Communist Party [SKP]. A serious appeal for Saarinen to continue was made by chief of the CPSU West Europe department Vitaliy Shaposhnikov in Moscow today. Saarinen threatened to resign from the SKP leadership in the course of the coming spring. Saarinen took part in the talks of the Finnish-Soviet Economic Commission in Moscow.

KARJALAINEN COMMENTS ON ECONOMIC TALKS WITH USSR

[Answer] "In my opinion a very important result was the fact that certain concrete matters were advanced which were unclear, such as concrete economic cooperation projects." The possibilities of implementing the Rautaruukki railway car plant project previously seemed poor, but now we obtained positive Soviet participation, and it seems it can be implemented relatively rapidly. It is a very good thing for employment in northern Finland, and so is the Rautaruukki coking plant project. Other matters relating to both exports and imports were discussed with the aim of looking after the growth of trade in future years.

[Question] The trip was also viewed in Finland as a political trip, but you said that only economic policy was discussed here. Have you met any Soviet political leaders other than Patolichev?

[Answer] I (?had talks) with Patolichev about matters related to economic relations. "Of course in the Soviet Union the leaders are quite political anyway, but other topics were not discussed in this context."

[Question] For the Finns perhaps the most significant promise is that the USSR will join the Rautaruukki railway car project.

[Answer] Although matters raised here were not new they mean much for Finland's industry. Another project discussed was the Rautaruukki coking plant project for Rahe with Soviet participation. There are also plans to start timber cutting on the other side of the border, perhaps next autumn. The Finns would be working on the Soviet side and the timber would be imported to Finland. The atomic icebreaker issue was again discussed. By present indications Waertsilae may receive an order next year for one or even two atomic icebreakers. Food deliveries to the USSR were also discussed, as was joint production of paper machinery. Other topics included production of woodworking machinery for the USSR and of course building projects. Long-range building projects are being studied.

"The political result of the (?talks) in Moscow for 2 days was no doubt that it was denied that any politics took place, yet one might say that the promises brought back by the Finnish delegation led by Dr Ahti Karjalainen are also a kind of politics for the 1980's."

STRAY INTERVIEWED ON SIGNIFICANCE OF POLISH CRISIS

[Excerpts] Foreign Minister Svenn Stray, who is in Finland on a visit, had talks today with Premier Mauno Koivisto and Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen about the effects of the events in Poland on the international situation. This is the first visit to Finland by the foreign minister of the Norwegian Conservative government which came into power last autumn. Foreign Minister Stray this afternoon reported on his country's foreign policy views at a press conference in Helsinki.

The talks between Foreign Minister Stray and Finnish political leaders examined among other things the effects of the events in Poland on the international situation. According to Stray, the proclamation of martial law in Poland has a negative effect on the CSCE follow-up conference in Madrid, although in his opinion the conference should not be suspended for this reason. The foreign minister regards the differences of opinion between the United States and West Europe, caused by Poland, as having less consequences than what was generally written about them. When asked about Norway's attitude to the sanctions against Poland and the USSR which were decided by President Reagan, Stray said that Norway's stand was probably closer to that of the EEC countries than to the U.S. stand. But one must be very cautious when assessing the depth of the abyss which the Polish events are said to have caused within the Western alliance, the foreign minister added. Even though the sanctions caused dissension, the Western powers are unanimous about their aims on the Polish issue, according to Stray.

Asked about the effects of Poland and other events which kindled international tension on the mutual relations between Nordic countries regarding their different security political solutions, Foreign Minister Stray said that no change can be seen in them, namely the mutual relations between the Nordic countries. Naturally it is difficult to predict matters, but at least at present there is nothing to indicate any changes either in the mutual relations between Nordic countries or in the security political position of the individual Nordic states. Stray defended the arms storage decision in northern Norway by saying that it is designed to restore the strategic balance in the north after the USSR moved the political security center of gravity more to the north. On the talks between the USSR and Norway on the Barents Sea region, Foreign Minister Stray said that at present they are at a standstill.

DENKTAS SUSPICIOUS OF KIPRIANOU ASSURANCES

[Text] Commenting on Greek Cypriot leader Kiprianou's assurance to the Turkish Cypriots to the effect that they have no reason for concern, President Denktas has said that this was a reiteration of an old propaganda move. Replying to questions by correspondents this morning, Denktas said this assurance would be taken seriously were it not coming from a person who considered attacks on Turkish Cypriots from 1963 to 1974 a "national task" and was proud of it. Noting that Kiprianou's statement proved that recent Greek Cypriot declarations were in fact of a nature to arouse concern, Denktas said Kiprianou regards Greek Cypriot views as the only solution to the Cyprus problem. He added that Kiprianou was waiting for the proper occasion to bring the issue before the United Nations.

Recalling that Kiprianou favored a unitary Cyprus state, Denktas said the Greek Cypriot leader rejected the Turkish Cypriot side's rights to equal partnership in the foundation of the state. He invited Kiprianou to declare that he would abide by the principles of the agreement Denktas signed with Archbishop Makarios. Denktas continued: However, Kiprianou is inclined to disregard these principles and eliminate the grounds on which these principles were based. It is insolent and arrogant for Kiprianou to consider the Turkish Cypriot community, which is a founding and equal partner in the independence and sovereignty of the Cyprus state, a minority like the Armenians and the Maronites. As long as Kiprianou continues to hold this stand, the Turkish Cypriot community's worries will only increase and it will have to care more for security measures and national guarantees in the future.

IOANNIDHIS SAYS SUCCESS OF TALKS UP TO TURKS

[Text] In the context of the resumption of the intercommunal talks tomorrow, Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot side's representative at the talks, has stated that the new phase of the intercommunal dialogue undoubtedly will be of determinative significance, because it will become clear in the next few months whether any prospects for progress will exist or whether the dialogue will be led to failure. Our own position, Ioannidhis added, supports the conduct of a substantive and constructive dialogue, on the basis of the UN resolutions and the two summit agreements, which will lead to a just and viable solution of the Cyprus problem.

If, he stressed, the Turkish Cypriot side changes its tactics and policy, which thus far have aimed at a divisive solution, and seeks, as we do, a federal solution, then the road will open to a peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem. However, he concluded, if the Turkish Cypriot side continues the same policy, then prospects will be inauspicious.

Rolandhis on Dialogue

[Excerpts] Asked by our paper how he sees the prospects of the intercommunal talks in view of the new provocations by the Turkish side, Foreign Minister Rolandhis said: "It is sad because Turkey and the Turkish Cypriot side have deemed it expedient to obscure the opening of the dialogue with statements and positions that cause tension. If the other side, and particularly, Ankara, which virtually determines the fate of the Cyprus issue, continues to disregard both principles and justice, then we will make a recourse to the international community, which is always by our side."

MINISTER CLARIFIES EEC POLAND COMMUNIQUE STANCE

[Text] Because certain viewpoints were expressed in Brussels by diplomatic circles in connection with the Greek Government's position on the EEC foreign ministers' announcement on Poland, Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos made the following statement this evening:

No vagueness exists in the Greek Government's position and stance in connection with the Polish issue. Greece participated both in the formulation of the first joint statement by the Ten and in the second statement that was made in the name of the Ten by the British ambassador in Poland. In addition, on 18 December the Greek Government issued a statement clearly expressing Greece's position. When the Greek Government accepted the convening of the special meeting of the EEC foreign ministers in Brussels on 4 January, it gave explicit instructions to its representative, former Deputy Foreign Minister Fotilas, based on two drafts for a common communique that had been received by it up to and including 3 January, one by Belgium, which presided over the council, and one by the FRG.

The government's instructions to Fotilas, continued Kharalambopoulos, were to accept in general lines the contents of these two drafts, which accorded with Greece's positions, and to propose only certain amendments that more fully concerned Greece's viewpoints. Furthermore, explicit instructions had been given to Fotilas to communicate with Athens in case the joint communique was to have been formulated within a framework different from that which reflected Athens' viewpoints. However, Fotilas, although the joint communique was intended to include positions that were entirely different from those of Athens, as in paragraphs 4 and 7, did not communicate with Athens and thus agreed to positions that were entirely outside his instructions. Consequently, the foreign minister concluded, the Greek Government believes that certain points of paragraphs 4 and 7 of the Brussels communique do not express its position.

FISHERMAN KILLED BY SHOTS FROM TURKISH TROOPS

[Text] A fisherman was killed today at the Maritsa River by Turkish soldiers in an incident that is still shrouded by much mystery. Specifically, at 0800 fisherman Yeoryios Kapoutsis, 46, of Serrai, hunting in a boat for ducks with his friend Paraskevas Dhalatis, 51, was shot from the Turkish bank and killed. Kapoutsis was hit by bullets, two in the legs and one in the back, which penetrated his heart.

The incident took place on the Greek side of the Maritsa River delta. Dhalatis, who was quick enough to fall inside the boat and escape unhurt, stated that an exchange of fire took place.

Kapoutsis' body was transported to Serrai, where his funeral will be held tomorrow. According to our correspondent in Alexandhropoulis, an investigation is being held.

PAPER GIVES DETAILS OF U.S. 'SECRET' CYPRUS REPORT

NC070847 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 29 Dec 81 pp 1, 13

[Ziya Akcapar report]

[Text] Nicosia -- We are divulging the secret report prepared by the U.S. State Department and submitted to President Reagan. This report, which was drafted on the basis of impressions formed by Edward Dillery, director of the South East European desk of the U.S. State Department, who visited Athens, Nicosia and Ankara a short time ago, also carried the signature of Edwin Meese, President Reagan's foreign affairs advisor. The report stated that the withdrawal of the Turkish peace force from Cyprus would lead to dangerous consequences.

This report suggested the adoption of serious measures toward calming down Turkish-Greek relations, and points out that the "view regarding the demilitarization of the island," which is expounded by Greece and which enjoys the support of the nonaligned countries and the Eastern bloc, is gradually gaining momentum. The British bases on the island and their contribution to U.S. defense has been examined, and the "continuation" of the presence of the Turkish troops has been deemed advisable. The report further noted that after examining the political, social and economic structures of the Turkish and Greek Cypriot sectors, it was established that as a result of the "representations made to Ankara by the United States and the NATO countries and of the opposition expressed by the UN secretary general, the declaration of an independent Turkish Cypriot state is at the moment out of the question."

The report stresses that the Greek Cypriot communist party AKEL has increased its strength considerably and adds that the Papandreou Government is not bluffing when it says it will "provide more energetic support for Cyprus." It also stated in the report that Papandreou's efforts to again give Greece the status of "a guarantor state" has had a stimulating effect on the morale of the Greek Cypriots.

The report puts forward a 4-point plan for a settlement which "a large number of Cypriots expect the United States to bring about in a short time." These points are:

1. Freedom of movement and settlement and "readjustment of the borders" in a way as to enable a portion of the refugees to return to their homes; return of Varosha, which the Turkish Cypriots are holding as a trump card for bargaining purposes. This may form a first positive step.

2. The United States must counter any mutual threat which could lead to a conflict in eastern Mediterranean.

3. In view of the fact that the Turkish Cypriots are acting within the framework of Turkey's policy, the United States must concentrate all its efforts on Ankara.

4. If the United States fails to use its influence and if the Cyprus issue remains in abeyance, in addition to other dangers, the undesirable forces will increase their influence on the island.

TURKISH-SOVIET TRADE TALKS BEGIN IN ANKARA

[Text] Turkish and Soviet delegations have begun talks in Ankara on the trade protocol which will determine the scope of trade between the two countries in 1982. Dincer Atena, Trade Ministry Agreements Department director general, heads the Turkish delegation at the talks, while the Soviet delegation is headed by Kuznetsov, a Ministry of Foreign Trade director. The two delegations will determine the quota of goods to be imported and exported between the two countries this year.

CHEYSSON MEETS PLO'S QADDUMI AT FORMAL LUNCHEON

[Text] Paris, 6 Jan (AFP) -- French External Affairs Minister Claude Cheysson was meeting the number two of the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO), Faruq Qaddumi, at a formal lunch here today, it was announced here. The two men had meet several times over the past few months. Ibrahim Suss, PLO representative to France, said the lunch was "being held within the framework of good relations" between the PLO and France.

Mr Suss, who was to attend the lunch, said the PLO was delighted when French President Francois Mitterrand six months ago spoke for the first time about an independent Palestine. PLO leaders would like to know more precise details, he said.

PRIME MINISTER LEAVES FOR BRUSSELS, LONDON

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo, set off this morning on an official 2-day trip to two European capitals, first Brussels and then London. In the capital of Belgium, which currently holds the EEC presidency, the prime minister will endeavor to obtain some commitment to advancing the increasingly hard and slow negotiations for Spain's entry into the European Community. But the most difficult part of the trip will be in London, here Calvo-Sotelo will not only speak about Spain's entry into the community. In his meeting with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, he will try also to unblock the dispute over Gibraltar. To this end the prime minister, as an expression of goodwill, will reportedly offer to open the border with Gibraltar.

WHITEHALL REBUKES USSR ENVOY OVER BBC JAMMING

[By Tom McMullan, diplomatic correspondent]

[Excerpts] Britain today carpeted the Soviet ambassador, Mr Viktor Popov, for the jamming of the BBC's Polish-language broadcasts. The ambassador was summoned to the Foreign Office by Lord Trefgarne, a junior minister. He was told that the British Government "strongly deplores" the jamming of these broadcasts. Lord Trefgarne, according to a Foreign Office statement, made it clear that the Russians are responsible for the jamming. The BBC announced yesterday that all its Polish transmissions were now being jammed. Engineers had traced the jamming to two small Soviet towns, Smolensk and Kaliningrad.

According to a Foreign Office statement, Lord Trefgarne said that the Soviet action ran counter to the letter and spirit of the Helsinki Final Act which was signed by countries in both East and West with the objective of improving contacts across international frontiers. The statement said: "The ambassador was asked to convey to his authorities the extreme gravity with which Her Majesty's Government views this matter expectation that the jamming will be lifted forthwith." The Foreign Office said the ambassador's response to this protest was regarded as "totally unsatisfactory." It appears that Mr Popov denied knowledge and responsiblity for the jamming.

The BBC said jamming began a fortnight after it increased its output in Polish from seven to eight transmissions a day and up to a total of 26 hours of programmes a week. Earlier jamming of the BBC's Polish service ended in 1963.

KREISKY OFFERS ASYLUM FOR SOLIDARITY LEADERS

AU071528 Vienna KRONEN-ZEITUNG in German 6 Jan 82 pp 2-3

[Kurt Seinitz report on Chancellor Bruno Kreisky interview in Bad Gastein -- date not given]

[Excerpts] Bad Gastein/Brussels/Warsaw -- Yesterday, indications in Europe increased that the Polish regime is toying with the idea of deporting the interned Solidarity leaders to a Western place of exile. Commenting on the speculations about a potential forced exile for the Solidarity leaders, Chancellor Kreisky declared in a talk with KRONEN-ZEITUNG that the Austrian Government would remain faithful to its traditional policy regarding the question of exile, according to which everyone who wants to can come to Austria. Kreisky added, however, that this applied only if these people were coming voluntarily. Should the Polish Government want to forcibly deport these people, then Austria could not and certainly would not reject them on that account, but Austria would certainly not hold any previous negotiations with Warsaw or conclude any agreement on this issue, Kreisky said.

Kreisky went on to say that he wanted to expressly warn the Polish leadership against the false conclusion that it could dodge the demanded negotiations with church and trade union leaders by throwing the Solidarity leaders out of Poland. He added that the idea of solving the "problem" of interned Solidarity leaders in the same manner as that being done by the CSSR and the USSR with their dissidents was certainly tempting for Warsaw, but such a measure would certainly not contribute toward a satisfactory solution in Poland at present.

As far as the 10 European Community foreign ministers' proposal for a special CSCE conference on Poland is concerned, Kreisky said that Austria would certainly not say no to such a conference, but it would require intensive preparations, because if the Soviet Union were simply not to attend it, there would be little point to the whole thing.

LANC REJECTS JEWISH AGENCY CHARGES ON EMIGRES

[Text] The Israeli immigration authorities charge Austria with having violated an agreement on the transit of Jewish emigres from the Soviet Union. The Jewish agency, which controls the immigration of Jews to Israel, charges the Vienna Interior Ministry with encouraging refugee organizations to take Jews to other Western countries rather than to Israel. Interior Minister Lanc has rejected these charges and has invited representatives of the Jewish agency for a talk today.

Explains Position

[Telephone interview with Interior Minister Erwin Lanc -- presumably live]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister, why did Austria put up the notice [referring to other Jewish organizations] at the refugee home at all?

[Answer] We have been in charge of this transit task for more than 10 years. We have incurred security risks on that account, and since 1974 there has been an agreement between the Jewish agency and the Lower Austrian organization of the Austrian Red Cross about the running of this transit station.

In this agreement, it was stipulated that all those wanting to proceed to Israel should go through the transit station, while the others should be accommodated elsewhere by some other aid organization. That was valid until mid-1980. And some 1 and 1/2 years ago the Jewish agency expressed the wish -- because the number of Soviet emigres declined -- to take care of everything at the Vienna-Simmering station; in other words, also of those emigres not going to Israel or to the United States through HIAS [Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society] and we regarded this as economically reasonable and consented to it.

Thereby, however, the processing of those who do not want to go to Israel has been transferred to the transit station, so to speak [passage indistinct]. If people come to this station who do not want to go to Israel, we must give them an opportunity to read somewhere who they can contact. And that is the purpose of the notice board you asked about. It informs people that they may enter the Red Cross room and telephone the organization concerned and make further arrangements. Why do we insist on that?

We are spending almost 12 million schillings of Austrian taxpayers' money annually on security alone for the transit camp. And I fail to see any sense in protecting Jewish emigres in Austria while, on the other hand, putting those who do not want to go to Israel out into the street, outside of the guarded camp, and leave them unprotected. And that is the reason that we have suggested this settlement. After a long exchange, and since the agency did not consent to our porposal, we introduced this arrangement as of 1 January for the agency was not ready to postpone the matter even for 2 weeks, until after the talks scheduled for today, which we also offered to them. And we cannot allow a policy of coercion to be pursued behind our back or, what is even worse, behind the back of the Soviet emigres.

We, like Israel, are members of the UN human rights conventions, and they include the freedom of immigration also for Soviet emigres, and that is what we have to look after, and that is also laid down in the agreement between the Red Cross and the Jewish agency.

[Question] In other words, if I understood you correctly, an attempt was made to reach agreement between Austrian authorities and the Jewish agency?

[Answer] Of course. We are in constant contact, and since the wish was expressed for a talk with me, I have consented to such a talk at the earliest possible time after my return to Vienna -- and 1 day before that date, the charge was made in Jerusalem, or in Tel Aviv; well, here the intention is quite obvious.

[Question] You assume that the Jewish agency on its part would not have appropirately informed, or would not inform, the Jewish emigres not wanting to go to Israel or to the United States?

[Answer] We must ensure that this does not depend on the Jewish agency.

[Question] But this camp is being run by the Jewish agency?

[Answer] No, it is not being run by the Jewish agency but by the Lower Austrian organization of the Austrian Red Cross, and the actual expenses incurred, depending on the number of people going through the transit camp, are then refunded to the Red Cross. For example, the entire security expenditures -- 12 million schillings annually -- are paid by the Republic of Austria. But above all, the Republic of Austria bears the legal responsibility for the freedom of migration of the Soviet emigres. And that is an incontestable fact.

[Answer] The talk has certainly not been made easier, or will not be easier, since the charge was launched 1 day before the talk, although it was very well-known that this talk had been scheduled for days.

We will not allow ourselves to be blackmailed -- especially when basic principles of human rights are involved.

[Answer] I am not going to say what we will put up with or will not put up with -- that is a question for the whole cabinet to think over and ultimately to decide. I will attempt, as always in the past, to find a solution, but under pressure from outside no solutions are possible here.

[Reporter] Thank you, Mr Minister.

Chancellor Rejects 'Impudence'

AU071033 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0618 GMT 7 Jan 82

[Report on Franz Koessler telephone interview with Chancellor Bruno Kreisky in Bad Gastein "last night," 6 January, with recorded portion]

[Text] In reply to the question of how he assessed the reaction of the Jewish agency and the further development in this matter, Kreisky said:

[Begin recording] It must in principle be the right of every person entering Austrian soil to proceed to a destination of his own choice, to any place he wants to go and has an opportunity to go, and no organization can in the least be granted a monopoly that would enable it alone to determine where emigres arriving in Austria are to proceed from here.

[Question] To date -- is that not correct? -- the Jewish agency has been operating alone at this home for Jewish emigrees from the Soviet Union?

[Kreisky] That may be so, but we have again and again also allowed other agencies to contact the emigres. We have even made such contacts possible for them. That cannot be prevented at all. We are not an executive organ of any Israeli, of the Israeli Government, or of anyone else. That certainly does not interfere at all, and if the gentlemen do not like it, then they should do what they like, then they should see who will be ready to share with us the burden that we have carried for many years. We have been an immigration country, truly, for many years, and we have done everything we could, and we will not put up with impudence from anyone.

[Question] The Jewish agency statement says, among other things, that in December for example 343 Jews emigrated from the USSR but that only 99 proceeded to Israel, and the blame for that is more or less pinned on the Austrian Government...

[Kreisky interrupts] Yes -- they will certainly know why they did not proceed to that destination, they surely will know that themselves, won't they? It is not our task to force [forcieren] immigration to Israel. We have never undertaken this task. We have facilitated emigration from the Soviet Union, but it is not our task to organize immigration to Israel. [end recording]

Temporary Compromise

[Text] Vienna (AZ) -- In the conflict over the Jewish Soviet emigres a temporary agreement has been reached for 1 week, following talks between Interior Minister Lanc and representatives of the Jewish agency. A final settlement is to be reached in subsequent talks. The conflict developed because the Interior Ministry had informed the Soviet emigres by a notice displayed at a camp in Vienna-Simmering about conditions for emigrating to countries other than Israel.

That had become necessary because more and more Soviet Jews -- about 80 percent -- do not want to go to Israel although they obtained their USSR exit permit by means of an Israeli visa.

For 1 week the following arrangement will be observed: The Interior Ministry's notice will be removed and replaced by a Russian-language certificate to be signed personally by Israel-bound emigres before an Austrian civil servant certifying that they have been informed about opportunities to emigrate to other countries and that they are proceeding voluntarily to Israel.

In a talk with ARBEITER-ZEITUNG, Interior Minister Lanc outlined his negotiating position for the forthcoming talks. Austria will mainly insist on two points:

-- It must be ensured that refugees who do not want to go to Israel and who cannot emigrate to the United States because they have no relatives there, are informed about other opportunities.

-- It must be ensured that in the camp there also is an opportunity for contacts with organizations other than the Jewish agency.

KREISKY ANNOUNCES BUILDING OF UN CENTER

[Summary] In an interview with the Austrian Radio and Television Service, Chancellor Kreisky declared yesterday that at a time when Austria's building industry is in such a critical situation, a large project such as the UN Conference Center in Vienna could no longer be shelved, the more so as it was the only large building project in the Vienna area that could be immediately started. Kreisky added that the project would provide 4,000 jobs and declared that he felt in no way bound by the negative outcome of the People's Party-initiated Vienna referendum on this issue, because only a relatively small percentage of the population participated in this referendum and because the decision on such a project was a matter for the Federal Government.

Finance Minister Salcher declared that the financing of the project by foreign capital was virtually ensured.

Financing Details

[Kurt Seinitz report on interview with Chancellor Kreisky in Bad Gastein on 7 January]

[Text] Bad Gastein -- A new turn on the political party controversy over the Vienna UN conference project running into the billions of schillings, through the implementation of which Chancellor Kreisky wants to create or safeguard thousands of jobs: Yesterday the chancellor revealed to KRONEN-ZEITUNG his financing plan on which he had been working for months and which was also the main topic during Kreisky's recent trip to Arab countries.

And this is what Kreisky's scheme looks like, with the aid of which he wants to prevent both Austria's incurring huge additional debts and a new hole in the budget: The UN Conference Center will be built by an Arab finance holding company. Austrian firms will carry out the construction work. Austria will merely rent the completed conference center, but will have the full right of user. In addition to the annual rent, Austria is to buy the conference center over a period of between 20 and 30 years in annual installments from the Arab financing syndicate.

Kreisky comments on his financing plan: "The advantage is that the whole thing is costing the Austrian taxpayer only little at present, but it will immediately become fully effective for the employment situation. Thus the financing of the conference center is being approached from a completely new angle."

SPD'S WISCHNEWSKI COMMENTS ON GERMAN-U.S. TALKS

[Excerpt] Bonn, 7 Jan (DPA) -- Speaking to newsmen in Bonn today, SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski said that "Western unity" in the stand toward events in Poland had been established following the German-U.S. talks in Washington. However, he conceded that the talks between Helmut Schmidt and the U.S. leaders had brought "no agreement" in connection with the sanctions policy being followed by Washington against the Soviet Union and Poland. But there was agreement about the demands to the Polish leaders, in the assessment and condemnation of the events and on Moscow's joint responsibility with regard to developments in Poland.

On behalf of the SPD, Wischnewski especially welcomed the fact that President Ronald Reagan had promised the chancellor that the Geneva disarmament negotiations would not be included in the United States sanctions policy. This was a rebuff to relevant proposals from the CDU/CSU. Wischnewski stressed that disarmament negotiations were not a gift to the Soviet Union but were in the vital interests of both sides.

Pointing to the EEC's joint statement on Poland, Wischnewski said that Schmidt and Genscher had made a considerable contribution to Western unity. He reaffirmed the demands to the Polish leaders to lift martial law, release those imprisoned and interned and to resume the dialogue with the Solidarity trade union and the Catholic Church. Wischnewski again appealed, especially to the Soviet Union, to observe the Helsinki Final Act with its obligation of non-interference in the internal affairs of other states. He also reaffirmed the readiness of the European Community to provide extensive economic aid to Poland if the Polish leadership returned to the path of internal reforms and renewal.

SPOKESMAN REFUTES REPORT OF SCHMIDT, HAIG QUARREL

[Excerpt] Bonn, 8 Jan (DPA) -- Government Spokesman Kurt Becker strongly rejected reports of an alleged "quarrel" between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig at a press conference today in Bonn. Any speculation about a disagreement or even a quarrel is "nonsense," Becker said.

The Washington POST reported that there was a bitter quarrel at a breakfast between Schmidt and Haig on Wednesday [6 Jan] morning in Washington, after Haig complained about the German stance on Poland. The breakfast was prolonged by 1 hour and resulted in a delay in the chancellor's return flight.

Becker, who attended the breakfast, emphasized his personal impression of "great trust, great openness and abolutely similiar aims." The only true part of the paper's report is that the breakfast took place. The federal chancellor and Haig considered the main subject of possibilities of influencing Poland by the Western community as so important that they prolonged their meeting spontaneously.

BISHOPS DEMAND END TO POLISH MARTIAL LAW

[Text] Bonn, 7 Jan (DPA) -- The chairmen of the French and the German bishops' conferences, Bishop Jean Vilnet and Cardinal Joseph Hoeffner, have proclaimed their solidarity with the "persecuted and oppressed" in Poland in a joint statement.

The statement, published at the end of the fifth meeting of the two bishops conferences in Bonn today, says "We therefore most strongly demand the release of the internees and the lifting of martial law in Poland."

A communique stressed that it became clear at the meeting that both the French and the German bishops' conference would support the church in Poland "morally and materially in every possible way." Above all they will strive to see that "injustice and disregard for human rights are not accepted unchallenged." On the subjects of peace and disarmament; which were also dealt with the two bishops' conferences stressed that the search for peace must not be reduced to a discussion on disarmament and that a "profound theological understanding of peace" is necessary.

OFFICIAL REITERATES VIEW ON POLISH EMIGRES

[Excerpt] Bonn, 8 Jan (DPA) -- The Federal Government maintains its view that Polish head of state and party leader General Jaruzelski has spoken of an opportunity for trade unionists to emigrate, and not of a forced exile. Government Spokesman Lothar Ruehl said today at a press conference in Bonn that a renewed check with the FRG ambassador to Poland, and a recheck of all the pertinent documents shows that the ambassador's report, which formed the basis for the government statement on this issue, is "clearly correct." The Federal Government sees no reason to withdraw any sections of this statement.

NAZI PROPAGANDA, DETONATORS SEIZED IN BERLIN

[Excerpt] Berlin, 7 Jan (DPA) -- Neo-Nazi propaganda material and 26 detonators were seized today in house searches of 12 Berlin apartments. The police announced that the documents indicate that the mostly young inhabitants of the apartments belong to a group which has formed a regional Berlin group of the "People's Socialist Movement of Germany" [Volks-Sozialistische Bewegung Deutschlands]. This radical rightwing group became known nationwide following a shooting incident in Munich in October 1981. After a gun battle, during which two men died, the police seized handgrenades and guns from supporters of the organization.

PRESS SKEPTICAL ABOUT SCHMIDT'S U.S. TALKS

Schmidt Changed Positions

[Herbert Kremp commentary: "The Double Tinker"]

[Text] Federal Chancellor Schmidt looked a bit embarrassed and anxious in Washington. The German politician, who says about himself that he as one of the senior government chiefs in a world he can perceive must "educate" the quickly changing U.S. presidents, agreed with remarkable insight to Reagan's assessment of the Polish situation. What has changed about the situation?

The spokesman of the Federal Government said last week: "We do not share the opinion that the Soviet Union must be considered the instigator of martial law (in Poland)." But now the federal chancellor says that Moscow's direct responsibility for the current situation in Poland cannot be denied. That is the direct opposite, and all the world will ask itself why the Germans say the opposite, depending on where they are.

This question, regardless of how grave it may be, can be easily answered. The Federal Government is not free any more, not even free with regard to its thoughts. There could never have been any doubts that the Soviet Union was directly responsible for what is going on in Poland. It was decided in Bonn to ignore the simplest fact of Russian imperial execution because this fact is unpleasant, because it disproves the premise of a policy one has become accustomed to and because it means that as long as the Soviet Union exists, world politics will be full of tension.

Helmut Schmidt, who likes to tutor, has learned himself in Washington. He changed positions in the assessment of the situation in Washington. But unfortunately this does not make our federal chancellor more free. He would like to play the role of mediator between the powers (like Bismarck), if not at least interpreter (of other people's concepts) and if not that, as translator (of the world powers' semantics). But nothing of this remains, as Washington shows. What remains is a changing interpretation of roles. The federal chancellor is being mediated [vermittelt] and he remains interpretable. He speaks two languages -- as his split party does.

'Halfway Credible'

[Commentary signed RM]

[Text] Some people will ask themselves how it can happen that Bonn and Washington have most different opinions on Poland, and that Federal Chancellor Schmidt and President Reagan issued a statement after their meeting which was greedily lapped up by the readers. That cannot be due just to diplomatic customs. Unfortunately, however, there is a much more serious reason for it: the differences between the Federal Republic and the United States on important parts of the East-West conflict are so great that Schmidt and Reagan have no choice but to busily collect the things they still agree on.

Schmidt and Reagan agree at best in their judgment of existing facts. It was a decisive contribution in this respect that the Federal Government decided after much hesitation to hold the Soviet Union publicly responsible for the warlike situation in Poland. After this change, the sentence of the communique sounds halfway credible that the federal chancellor and the President agree in their analyses on Poland. But with regard to what should be done for Poland, the communique says virtually nothing substantive. The chancellor informed the President about Bonn and European documents which have been known for a long time in Washington. The chancellor announced that the West European governments will discuss with the U.S. Government which decisions would serve the common aims best -- what a quick and generous decision! One welcomes the decision to hold a special session of NATO foreign ministers. "Suitable" steps are suggested to be taken at the Madrid conference and in the United Nations. But the statement does not contain anything about sanctions against the Soviet Union.

It says after all that one wants to avoid undermining the other's steps. It means: If the Federal Republic is not prepared to impose sanctions, it does at least not want to undermine those of the United States. Bonn can be even proud of that -- who knows whether other European governments will go that far with their commitments. In Bonn and in Washington respectively a coordinator is supposed to look after German-U.S. relations in future. Not bad. More solidarity with regard to world political decisions would be better.

"Rather Successful"

[Werner Holzer editorial: "No Going to Canossa, D.C."]

[Text] Meetings on political summit heights seem to be more necessary than many people believed so far. In view of numerous noncommittal and empty statements on such occasions, the impression was often created that the results of such meetings were in no comparison with the time and money involved.

The recent meeting between U.S. President Reagan and the federal chancellor can teach some people a lesson. After several hours of political talks it became obvious that the allegedly abysmal differences of opinion between the ruling people in Washington and Bonn have sprung more from the fantasy (or wishful thinking) of some commentators in the United States and other Western countries than from political realities. Every sensible person could have realized before that this transatlantic debate does not deal with an aim, but with the best way to achieve the aim.

After the final statements of the chancellor and the President, both sides are relieved although differences exist as before on the most effective Western reaction to developments in Poland. Helmut Schmidt obviously succeeded in freeing his discussion partners from the gnawing doubt that Europe in general and the Federal Republic in particular are about to yield to Soviet threats. Ronald Reagan made it clear that he knows despite his liking for verbal acts of strength how complicated it is in our times not only to represent convictions, but to turn them into successful policy.

On the background of obvious hysteria gaining ground particularly in French papers, it is pleasant to see that the U.S. President was apparently not infected.

The final statement of Washington makes it clear that the Reagan administration is prepared in the meantime to accept the fact that despite common basic convictions between the United States and West Europe there is no total equality of interests. It was, therefore, not necessary for the chancellor to go to Canossa. He got much rather the pleasant opportunity to point out to the U.S. public -- which did not know it -- that the Federal Republic condemns martial law in Poland, the destruction of the independent trade union Solidarity, the wave of arrests in the country and the Soviet Union's pressure on Poland as sharply as President Reagan, and that it had done so even before him.

The WALL STREET JOURNAL did not want to know anything of such accord. It much rather stated shortly before the summit that the chancellor "has blinded himself regarding realities of the world situation." The commentator added gloomily that "a strange change was taken place in the German psyche."

It would be certainly interesting to ponder whether a changed psyche must be basically something devilish. Would it not be possible that such a change had something to do with the ability to learn and with development? Some of the writers who are so shocked about the Germans because these Germans allegedly do not put the barricades up quickly enough against Poland's martial law masters and their Soviet wire-pullers, seem to forget that we do not live in times any more where one can fight for the right cause with sword in hand. dignity, justice and freedom must be defended today as well -- but the means have changed.

Some people do not seem to be concerned about that. We experience much rather how some of the most foolish anti-German prejudices come up again. It takes place in the conservative WALL STREET JOURNAL -- which says that the approach of the chancellor indicates a "vision of a future Germany as a Finlandized industrial vassal of totalitarian imperialism" -- as well as in socialist French papers which pretend that one could solve the Polish crisis along the line of the three musketeers.

It is being simply ignored that the French Government did not show special activity in the cases of Afghanistan and Iran, or now in connection with Poland.

One should not foster illusions after the rather successful Washington summit meeting that all misunderstandings and differences of opinion are now eliminated. Even if that was true with regard to the government, the fact would remain that old fears and prejudices die slowly. That is as true in the United States and France as it is in our country. It is as before good to have a German scapegoat for the own helplessness or inactivity. That should not be a reason for the Federal Republic to feel insulted again, to lick its own wounds and complain about the injustice of the world. We have done that often enough, forgetting to pursue a realistic policy.

[From the press review]

STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN points out: It is always a mistake in politics to let one's sober assessment be influenced by cheap statements. That becomes evident in reviewing the chancellor's visit to the United States. Many commentators believed that the rifts in the Western alliance were nicely patched up, interpreting every statement of Schmidt and Reagan as showing great harmony. But what can be heard now from the United States about the final talk between the chancellor and the U.S. secretary of state makes one wonder.

AACHENER VOLKSZEITUNG writes: In the Bundestag debate on Schmidt's talks with Reagan the chancellor will have to face it that most critical commentaries of foreign papers will be quoted. Involved is the accusation that the Federal Government's action in matters of Poland is too lax. Fear can be noted particularly in the French press that the Federal Republic could in the long run slip from the Western community and come closer to Russia in some way. That may sound exaggerated to most Germans, but it would be absolutely wrong to disregard the concern of the neighbors by shrugging one's shoulders in a superior way. It could be that they ahve learned more from German history than we.

L'EXPRESS REPORTS SALE OF ARMS TO NICARAGUA

[Text] Paris, 7 Jan (AFP) -- The weekly L'EXPRESS today reported that Franch will sell arms to Nicaragua and pointed out that in this way the government is trying to keep that Central American country from being completely dependent on the USSR and Cuba. The weekly adds that the Sandinist regime will soon receive nonoffensive military equipment, with the specification that it cannot be reexported. According to the publication, the contract signed last December provides for the delivery of two patrol vessels, two Alouette-3 helicopters and several dozen trucks. The operation is for Fr 100 million ($20 million) and also entails French training of Nicaraguan sailors and airmen.

L'EXPRESS adds that the government has given Defense Minister Charles Hernu the mission of making the agreement known to the United States. The defense minister will visit the United States from 6 to 11 January. Regarding the main reasons which led the government of Premier Pierre Mauroy to sell arms to Nicaragua the weekly says: "The main idea is not to leave the Nicaraguans completely dependent on the USSR and Cuba.... The authorities realize that this is a gamble in some ways, because if we lose the bet, if Nicaragua keeps leaning towards Moscow, we will be annoyed but damage will have been limited. If, on the other hand, we win the bet, if Managua recenters itself, profits will be great, even for Washington."

After pointing out that Nicaragua currently has only 25 T-54 tanks, "paid for by the USSR and delivered by Algeria and Cuba, as well as East German trucks and some helicopters piloted by Soviets," the commentator from L'EXPRESS offers some political arguments. He explains that the operation could also benefit the United States and that the latter has been playing its cards so poorly that it is pushing "the (Nicaraguan) junta of the Government of National Reconstruction into Moscow's arms." The weekly is convinced that by this action, "France will put a daring policy into practice, something the United States should have tried 6 months ago. An African example: Thanks to the "blending" policy practiced by France, the Congo-Brazzaville is progressively liberating itself from Soviet-Cuban domination." L'EXPRESS ends by asking what the U.S. reaction to this French initiative might be. The weekly stresses that Paris hopes Washington's reaction will be [word indistinct] but emotional."

[Excerpt] Paris, 7 Jan (AFP) -- Foreign Ministry sources said the armaments to be delivered were "non-offensive" and that there was a "non-reexport" clause in the contract.

Observers here said the caluse was put in so that the United States could not accuse France of secretly supplying guerrillas in El Salvador. French Defense Minister Charles Hernu is currently on an official visit to the United States

The Foreign Ministry sources said the supply of arms to Nicaragua reflected the French Government's desire not to leave Third World countries too dependent on the Eastern bloc.

The signing of the contract comes within the framework of developing relations between France and Nicaragua, the sources said. France currently supplies food aid, and a financial protocol covering several industrial projects was signed recently by the two countries.

French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson went to Nicaragua last August after the preparatory conference for the Cancun North-South summit.

PFC'S MARCHAIS JUSTIFIES PARTY STANCE ON POLAND

PM071151 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 31 Dec 81 p 2

[Text] [PCF secretary general] Georges Marchais, who was the guest on the Television Channel [TF1] 1300 hours news program yesterday, was questioned exclusively on Poland. In reply to a question on the economic sanctions which Reagan has decided to take, he stated first that they are "useless and ineffective. But above all they are unjustified," the PCF secretary general continued. "The Soviet Union has not intervened in Poland. Consequently it bears no responsibility for the Polish situation. Second, this step is ineffective. Since 1917 the capitalist countries have frequently taken measures against the Soviet Union and, shortly afterward, against all the socialist countries. The latter have demonstrated that that did not prevent them from making progress."

French Workers' Interest

"But if we followed Mr Reagan, as he is asking, then that would ultimately rebound against the interests of France and French workers. Don't forget that hundreds of thousands of them work on exports to the socialist countries.

"Everybody admits that there has been no Soviet intervention. I am talking about honest people, and there are many of them. Many European governments and heads of state openly stated that the Soviet Union had not intervened in Poland."

Turning next to the PCF's stance, Georges Marchais expressed the view that it is reasonable. "Obviously," he added, "we regret that Poland has reached this point. We regret it all the more since for the past 18 months, without interfering in Poland's affairs, I have been saying that it was necessary for it to boldly take the course of economic, social and democratic reforms to steer the country out of its crisis. Efforts have been made recently, but extreme actions have led to a disastrous situation."

And George Marchais went on to explain that he was referring to Solidarity's extremes "which, moreover, were recognized by many noncommunist journalists like Serge Maffert and Bernard Margueritte from LE FIGARO, and Andre Fontaine from LE MONDE. Journalists have written and admitted that Solidarity had overstepped the mark, as they say. Moreover Solidarity was absent from the negotiating table when General Jaruzelski proposed national union, in other words the union of the party, Solidarity and the church in order to find an accord enabling the country to overcome the crisis. But what was the situation on 13 December? We were on the eve of civil war. Everybody admits that. There was chaos."

Civil War Situation

"I heard a Pole who emigrated to France and who works at the National Center for Scientific Research saying on television and radio: 'We have been rehearsing a general strike every day for the past 18 months.' Can a country live when it experiences 18 months of anarchy, chaos, strikes, stoppages and so forth? It was no secret for anybody that the strike which was planned was quite simply aimed at seizing power."

Asked whether he was convinced on that point, Georges Marchais stressed: "that is what was stated." "I heard the Europe 1 representative in Warsaw say that, in a discussion which he himself had with the Solidarity leaders in Warsaw, they had made no secret of the fact that their objective was indeed to seize power through the strike which was scheduled for that Thursday.

"Consequently we were in this civil war situation. So, what was our stance? It was reasonable and responsible!

People are talking of a military coup. I talk of a military coup when the military seize power and eliminate the civilians. There was undoubtedly a military coup in Chile. The army replaced Allende's government and he was murdered. In Poland things are different. "The head of government was called Jaruzelski. He acted on constitutional measures, rather like Article 16 of our own constitution which makes provision for emergency powers."

When the TF1 journalist pointed out to him that he does not like that Article 16 in France, Georges Marchais stated that he does not like it "either in our country or elsewhere." Then he continued: "On the eve of a civil war, in other words a bloodbath, Jaruzelski, the government chief, with the army's support took measures to restore order and prevent the bloodbath. Obviously we regret the fact that Poland should have reached that point, that militants have been arrested. We regret all that, it is just that when you are faced with such a situation, when there is the possibility of seeing Poland sink into anarchy, civil war -- a fratricidal war which would finally have undermined the chance which still exists, the policy of socialist renewal which Poland had launched -- well we thought that it was probably the best possible solution."

Pursuing the Renewal Policy

Yves Mourousi then asked Georges Marchais if he did not think that Solidarity's absence from the negotiations could also be explained by the intention to go back on part of the Gdansk agreements?

"Judging from the statements made by Prime Minister Jaruzelski," Georges Marchais replied, "and at present there is no reason for doubting them, he says: 'None of the decisions taken since 1980 will be called into question. We intend to pursue the socialist renewal policy.' And he even said: 'We want to pursue it with all the forces concerned.' He spoke of the party, young people and the church. Each will probably take part in its place, but he has asserted his intention to pursue that policy. That is the first reason. There are two others."

Before listing them, Georges Marchais stressed, in reply to a question, that he was not talking about the PS when he said that "we are not in favor of taking adventurist stances." He also stated that on TF on the evening of Saturday 19 December, on Joseph Poly's news program at 2330 hours," [Solidarity aide] Tadeusz Mazowiecki was buried although he is alive. That is pouring fat onto the fire. You interviewed [CFDT chairman] Edmond Maire who delivered the funeral address of a man who is alive. In Paris a living man was buried and a mass said for him. The same thing happened with [Polish film director] Wajda."

Then Georges Marchais continued: "We have adopted a responsible position to prevent a bloodbath in Poland, to preserve the possibility of seeing Poland resolutely take the path of the reforms which are necessary at the economic, social and democratic level. Second, everybody realizes that if there had been civil war in Poland an international hotbed of tension would have been created in Central Europe which could have jeopardized the peace to which French men and women are attached. That is the second reason.

The Right's Hopes

"The third reason is no less important. The French right and the pseudoleft, in other words LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR, LE MATIN and LE MONDE -- that pseudoleft which has been calling for the departure of the communist ministers since 13 December, it is obvious that the right which was defeated 10 May hopes to take its revenge by breaking the new majority which is running France's affairs and which comprises the Socialist and Communists, in order to implement the new policy which French men and women want [sentence as published]. Those are the three reasons which led us to this stance, one which we regard as responsible and, primarily, in keeping with the Polish people's interests."

Georges Marchais then stated that there is no problem at government level. "In the government the Communist ministers, like their colleagues, naturally take part in drawing up overall government policy.

Neither we nor the president nor the premier have any intention of questioning the Communists' participation in government. They intend to stay there and make their contribution to implementing the new policy."

Georges Marchais then stressed that there are "differences between the PS and PCF positions on the Polish question. We have adopted the responsible attitude which I have just mentioned. We now hope, and that was the meaning of the letter which I sent to General Jaruzelski on my party's behalf, that he will work to implement the measures which he mentioned in his first speech. Obviously the PS stance is different from ours. But it is clear that the fact that both parties are in government together does not mean that they have the same positions on all questions."

PCF-PS Relations

Georges Marchais finally recalled that he himself suggested a meeting to the PS some time ago to "discuss information and the role of the existing media in our country. At the time [PS First Secretary] Lionel Jospin replied that he did not think it was necessary to meet to discuss that question but that there could instead be a meeting to examine the French situation as a whole and the implementation of the new policy. We told him that we are prepared for such a meeting and it was here, in this studio, that I explained that a decision had been made to meet between 15 and 20 December. That did not happen because the PS informed us that it did not want the meeting to take place." "I am available," Georges Marchais concluded, "I am prepared to meet with L. Jospin at any time and, like him, I think we have many things to say to each other."

ELYSEE OFFICIAL CRITICAL OF U.S. AID TO MOROCCO

WA080920 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Dec 81 p 7

[Text] In a message sent to Mr Mohamed Abdelaziz, secretary general of the Polisario, the Elysee has just condemned implicitly the military and political aid given by the United States to the government in Rabat. "France," points out this text signed by Mr Jacques Fournier, assistant secretary general of the presidential office of the republic, "hopes that no external interference will delay the reestablishment of peace and make the region a stake of more far-reaching rivalries." The message reaffirms the support of Paris for the UN and OAU resolutions. "France," he adds, "thinks that the Sahraoui people should be able to reach a decision freely about their own destiny by means of a fair and regular referendum." Our correspondent in Algiers reports that this statement is likely to calm the Sahraoui leaders who ponder the French intentions. Mr Mohamed Sidati, a member of the Sahraoui government, receiving a group of French journalists recently at Hafed Bou Djemaa, the Tindouf headquarters, expressed his desire for a "bolder policy from Paris" and deplored the fact that the French are continuing weapons and munitions deliveries to Morocco. "A true neutrality," he said, "occurs through recognition of the two parties to the conflict and we hope that our representatives in Paris will be fully recognized by the French authorities and not merely tolerated." While relations seem to be improving with Paris, they are deteriorating once again with Madrid. A communique of the Sahraoui minister of information on 14 December denounced "the recent visit of a Spanish military delegation to Morocco" led by two officers who served in the Western Sahara at the time of colonization which, asserts the Polisario, "indicates the reprehensible involvement of Spain at the side of the Moroccan aggressor."

LE MONDE VIEWS EEC APPROACH TO POLAND SANCTIONS

[Editorial: "The Ten and Poland"]

[Text] "Words, words, words," said Shakespeare. Political action begins with words but it is futile if it goes no further. Let us admit that, as far as words go, the declaration made by the Ten on Monday 4 January has more muscle than expected. In the same way that President Mitterrand in his new year message denounced "the system that is oppressing the Poles," the Ten call into question the "incapacity [as published] of totalitarian systems" like those of East Europe to "satisfy the most legitimate aspirations."

"The external pressures and camapign waged by the USSR" against the "Polish process of renewal" are also expressly denounced, and any eventual "open interventicn by the Warsaw Pact" is the subject of a "solemn" warning.

Let us also note that the Western countries are discovering, better late than never, all the virtues of the UN Charter, the universal declaration of human rights and the Helsinki Act. They seem resolved no longer to tolerate that these diplomatic instruments be used in one direction only, whence stems the campaign initiated by the government to make the neutral and nonaligned countries, which are in the majority at the United Nations aware of the Polish affair.

But it is above all when action on the part of the Ten passes from words to concrete measures that it stops in its tracks, the economic weapon, the only one apart from political influence that the West can use, being double and even multiple-edged. There is a danger of its rebounding on the people of Poland whom the Ten mean to help and protect. Humanitarian aid from the European Community is to continue, but how is to be distinguished from "food aid" which the Europeans want to think about and even from credits to the Polish Government which they are reexamining?

As far as actual sanctions against the USSR are concerned, how are they to be prevented from also harming, and perhaps a great deal at that, Western economies? Their effectiveness depends in any case on the cohesion of Western policies both as regards the choice of products affected and the firmness of the embargo measures. To ban the export of goods that are widely available and which it is child's play to obtain by roundabout means is impracticable. Only drastic measures on a limited range of highly sophisticated material from clearly identifiable sources would be effective, and this would inevitably lead to some harsh bargaining among producer countries.

The show of skepticism made by the press and by West German political personalities is therefore all the more regrettable. It is the duty of governments to protect state economic interests and take them into account in their decisions. This does not however oblige them to make a display of their weakness as the Bonn spokesman did Monday when he proclaimed that the Federal Government attaches a great deal of importance to economic cooperation with the USSR. Everyone has his own role to play. Public opinion in every country will help its own government by proclaiming loud and clear where it refuses to go, and even in doing so with a certain amount of passion. The worst thing about the Munich capitulation was the cheering with which the signatories were greeted.

AMBASSADOR NAMED -- Paris, 6 Jan (AFP) -- France has named a woman ambassador to head the diplomatic mission in Kuala Lumpur, it was announced here today. Marie Therese de Corbie, 59, France's third woman ambassador, will replace Ambassador Andre Travert. Miss de Corbie was previously second counsellor in Peking and first counsellor in New Delhi. Other women ambassadors are Christiane Malitchenko in Oslo, and Jacqueline Baudrier at the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO) in Paris. In other appointments, Christian Dutheil, 48, was named as ambassador to Congo, Jean Pierre Chauvet, 51, to Belize and Hugues Homo, 59, to Benin. [Text] [Paris AFP in English 1548 GMT 6 Jan 82 NC]

POLICE VESSELS SEARCH VENICE WATERS FOR DOZIER

[Excerpt] Venice, 7 Jan (ANSA) -- About a dozen of the Italian police's high-speed launches closed off a good part of the Venetian lagoon this morning in the hope of finding a new lead in the Red Brigades kidnapping of U.S. Brigadier General James Lee Dozier. The launches, with about seventy men on board, were backed up by helicopters overhead. They made a careful search of the entrance to the port of Venice from the Adriatic Sea and also of the island of Tronchetto, where there are ferries between the lagoon city and the mainland.

Communique Thought Authentic

[Excerpts] Rome, 8 Jan (ANSA) -- Little doubt exists as to the authenticity of the third and latest communique left by the Red Brigades urban guerrilla group in Rome and Padua on Wednesday night together with a "transcript" of the group's interrogation of their kidnap victim, American Brigadier General James Lee Dozier, an official NATO spokesman has admitted. The spokesman, questioned by reporters at the NATO land forces in southern Europe headquarters in Verona, where Dozier, the ranking officer at the NATO division, was kidnapped from his home on December 17, noted that "certain details of the general's career (contained in the "transcript") were known only by him." "The only thing that I can say", the spokesman added in reference to commenting on the kidnapping, "is that we are probably facing a long wait."

Meanwhile, no leads have been found in the continuing investigation to locate Dozier and the Red Brigades hide-out despite scores of roadblocks, dragnets and searches yesterday in the Verona area, including a careful search of points in the Venetian lagoon, where police launches and helicopters blocked the entrance to the port of Venice on Thursday morning.

In another development, reliable prison sources said on Thursday night that (?a flyer) had been found in the cell of prisoners being held in connection with terrorist acts expressing approval for the Dozier kidnapping. (?The document), the sources said, is dated January 5, and defines the Atlantic alliance as "an enemy of the proletariat to be attacked with systematic operations of guerrilla warfare." The flyer, found in the cell of the maximum security prison of Palmi in Reggio Calabria, on the heel of Italy's boot also defined NATO as "an offensive and not a defensive organization, playing the game of the multinationals." The Palmi prison houses numerous suspected terrorists, including Renato Curcio, one of the so-called "historic heads" of the Red Brigade's organization.

On other recent attacks against prisons and police in Italy, investigations into the January 3 prison escape of four women allegedly belonging to the "Front Line" guerrilla group from a jail in Rovigo, near Verona, included massive house-to-house searches in many neighborhoods of the city, but police declined to say if any new elements had emerged in the case.

Concerning the wounding of the deputy chief of the Roman anti-terrorist police squad (Digos) yesterday, police also refused to comment on the investigation so far. Digos officers, however, did say that among the telephone calls from four different groups claiming the attack, they are inclined to believe that made to the office of a Rome daily by a caller who said he spoke for the Red Brigades. That caller claimed the attack against Simone for his organization, and also indicated where to find the third communique on the Dozier kidnapping placed in Rome. Simone's condition continued stable in the Rome hospital where he was brought after the shooting.

SPADOLINI-SHAMIR TALKS VIEW GOLAN, SINAI FORCE

[Excerpts] Rome, 8 Jan (ANSA) -- Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini reiterated the condemnation expressed by the European Economic Community (EEC) nations to the Israeli annexation of Syria's Golan Heights and confirmed the Italian commitment to participate in the Sinai multinational peacekeeping force during his discussions with Israeli Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir, according to a communique released here by the premier's office after the meeting. Spadolini, who met with the Israeli diplomatic chief on Thursday, confirmed "the commitment of Italy to participate, together with the other three community nations, in the multinational force and among the observers in the Sinai, as a concrete witness to its determination to promote and favor a global peace solution in the region which is durable and just for all," according to the communique.

The press release from Spadolini's office, headquartered here in Palazzo Chigi, added that the conversation between the Italian Government leader and Shamir resulted in an "effective exchange of evaluations of the major problems of present international political situations of joint interest, with particular reference to the Mediterranian and Mideast situations."

Talks With Pope

[Text] Rome, 8 Jan (ANSA) -- An improved climate between the Roman Catholic leadership in the Vatican and the state of Israel has been established and Israel's problems are now more comprehensible to the Holy See, the official spokesman for Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir declared here at the conclusion of discussions between the Israeli diplomatic chief and Pope John Paul II. In remarks made to ANSA at the conclusion of the 40 minute talks conducted mainly in the French language between Shamir and the pope yesterday, press spokesman Avi Pazner added that certain viewpoints remain, however, different, like that on the problem of Jerusalem.

"The pope received our minister in a very friendly manner, cordially," Pazner said, "and we have the impression that the Vatican understands us better now. We attribute much importance to relations with the Holy See and we hope for a continuation of the dialogue. The climate is now decidely better," Pazner affirmed. Referring to the conversation which took place between Shamir and Vatican Secretary of State Cardinal Casaroli, Pazner, who was present at the discussion, was also able to outline some of the major points discussed. Casaroli, he said, offered his opinion that "understanding (between Israel and the Vatican) would improve if relations were closer," even though the matter of establishing diplomatic relations was not brought up. The Vatican has never had official diplomatic dealings with the state of Israel. Pazner also said that no formal invitation was extended to the pope for a visit to the Holy Land, as some reports had hinted on the eve of Shamir's visit.

Concerning the question of Jerusalem, Pazner said that the Israeli diplomatic chief amply described both to the pope and Cararoli the Israeli position. Shamir, Pazner, said, noted that "conditions are better in Jerusalem now than ever before. The city is secure, peaceful, open to all religions, and hundreds and thousands of Christians and Muslims come there from every part of the world." On the Palestinian question, Pazner noted that, especially in the talks with Casaroli, the discussion centered around the need to bring about the Camp David agreements which forsee a progressive "autonomy" for the local population, and around the problems of security and terrorism. Shamir, Pazner affirmed, confirmed his determination to keep to the agreements made with former Egyptian President Anwar as-Sadat, two years ago even if they mean "hard sacrifices" for Israel. Shamir also told the pope and Casaroli, Pazner said, that this will be accomplished "confronting every difficulty in favor of peace" while guaranteeing "a secure situation."

COMMUNIST PARTY REJECTS IDEA OF EARLY ELECTIONS

[Excerpt] Rome, 7 Jan (ANSA) -- The Italian Communist Party (PCI) has reiterated its opposition to eventual early elections. This was the position to emerge from the party's leadership meeting yesterday. Early elections would only aggravate the country's economic and social situation, creating dangerous vacuums, according to Alfredo Reiclin, a member of the PCI leadership. He warned against taking risks at a time when terrorism was rampant, when investigations were underway into the P2 lodge scandal and when obscure but powerful groups were working against the democratic state. The PCI leadership approved a document on terrorism in which the challenge posed by terrorism was said to have reached alarming proportions.

Christian Democratic (DC) Secretary Flaminio Piccoli and Social Democratic (PSDI) Secretary Pietro Longo met Wednesday to discuss the political situation. Piccoli reportedly insisted that a government reshuffle would do nothing to solve the problems at hand. Longo, on the other hand, said that a mere review of the accords that gave birth to the current coalition government was not sufficient. What was needed, in his view, was a broader agreement among the partners.

SPADOLINI DEFENDS GOVERNMENT IN TV ADDRESS

[Excerpt] Rome, 6 Jan (ANSA) -- Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini came to the defense of his government in a television message transmitted over the state television network RAI, when he declared that the government has both the right and the duty to respond exclusively to the parliament for its actions. Defending his six-month old coalition from the recent rumored attacks of at least three of his government parties who are said to be plotting its downfall and firming up a new majority, Spadolini in the message Tuesday night added that every party in the present majority has the right to claim the executive position for itself. The Rome government leader did not rule out, however, that a projected confrontation between the coalition partners, including the Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals and Spadolini's own Republican Party, might "touch off a more solid equilibrium," even though he was firm in his insistance that the death blow to his executive must be given in its proper setting, the Parliament.

Spadolini told his TV audience that while he was willing to confront a meeting of the parties supporting his government, he would not attribute to this meeting the value of a "verification" of his actions and work, and said that he had nothing to chide himself for. Spadolini also defended his economic package during the TV appearance as the "lintel of the budget policies."

POPE APPEALS TO ROMANIA FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

[Excerpts] Vatican City, 6 Jan (ANSA) -- An appeal for full religious freedom in Romania, and particularly for the recognition of the right of existence for the Eastern Rite Romanian Catholic community disbanded by the authorities more than 30 years ago was launched here today by Pope John Paul II during an audience with a group of Romanian nationals resident in Rome.

"The Holy See," the Polish pope affirmed, "has followed and continues to follow with particular concern the conditions of the Catholic community of the Eastern Rite (in Romania) and the Roman [word indistinct], which is loved and very near to us in thoughts and prayers, in their joys and in their very sad trials (in that nation)." The pope also made mention of the letter he sent in September 1980 to Romanian Government leaders, reminding them, as a signatory nation of the Helsinki accord, of the "necessity to recognize the freedom to join the faith of their choice" for the Romanian people.

PCP'S CUNHAL ENDORSES POLISH MILITARY MEASURES

PM070915 Lisbon AVANTE in Portuguese 30 Dec 81 pp 5-6

[Speech 23 December by PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal at rally in Lisbon: "The more they seek to isolate the PCP, the more they isolate themselves and the more the PCP intensifies and broadens its influences and ties with the masses"]

[Excerpts] We are all witnessing the unleashing of another furious anticommunist campaign, now in connection with the evolution of the situation in Poland. That campaign is being launched for two basic reasons. The first is because the evolution of the situation in Poland itself is unfavorable to the counterrevolutionary forces, on which the Portuguese reactionaries and their allies pinned high hopes and which are now seeing their dreams of a victorious Polish counterreovlution collapse like a house of cards.

Reaction would like one of two things: either for counterrevolution to triumph in Poland, altering the world correlation of forces, or for the situation to develop in such a manner that the USSR and the Warsaw Pact countries intervene militarily. Everything indicates that they will achieve neither. Everything indicates that the Polish comrades are in the process of resolving the situation by checking the gradual deterioration of the economic, social and political situation and delivering Poland from economic catastrophe and the civil war, to whose brink it had been led by grave mistakes made by the party and by the government, imperialist interference and successive concessions and capitulations to counterrevolution.

We express satisfaction at the recent evolution of the situation and sincerely hope that the Polish comrades will succeed in surmounting successfully their great current difficulties, again taking the path of the victorious development of socialist society.

The second basic reason for the furious anticommunist campaign unleashed on the pretext of the evolution of the situation in Poland is the intention of diverting the Portuguese people's attention from their extremely grave problems and from the struggle they are waging. According to the Socialist Party [PS] newspaper, PORTUGAL HOJE, the minister of finance whispered to the foreign minister during the debate on the state budget: "What would fix things for us now, during the debate on the state budget, would be for Russia to invade Poland."

Reaction did not have the "Soviet invasion" that would fix things for it, but it latched on desperately to the declaration of the state of emergency in Poland, lying, distorting and slandering the emergency measures adopted by the Polish Government in accordance with the constitution and the laws. "Poland has been invaded from within," one rag yelled. "Soviet warships are now in Poland," PORTUGAL HOJE cried with respect to an ordinary photograph of a ship. "Soviet air force is in Warsaw now" reads the headline of another newspaper with respect to the report that, very normally and regularly, Soviet aircraft are landing in Warsaw with food.

With all this hubbub about Poland and the corresponding anti-PCP campaign, the "Democratic Alliance" and its allies wish to make people forget what is happening in Portugal. They want the Protuguese people to be distracted from the vitally important problems of the current Portuguese situation. They want no talk about the dismissal of the "Democratic Alliance" and the dangers of the revision of the constitution. They wish to check the development of the people's struggle by breaking the workers' unity and the masses' unity in the struggle against the "Democratic Alliance" government and its policy. They wish to check the dazzling rise of the PCP's activity and influence among the masses. And by all of them organizing joint demonstrations which they forecast would be exceptionally well attended they wished to make people forget the tremendous impact of the magnificent 12 December mass demonstrations.

They wanted a comparison; they received a comparison.

All the anticommunists joined forces. Communiques, motions, speeches, rallies and demonstrations multiplied. The "Democratic Alliance" naturally took the lead, organizing its own rally.

The General Workers Federation, which has never organized a demonstration of solidarity with the Portuguese workers -- the victims of exploitation and of the "Democratic Alliance" government's repressive actions -- organized a demonstration ostensibly of solidarity with the Polish workers. Mario Soares, who has organized no rally against the "Democratic Alliance" government and the reactionary forces, organized a rally against the Polish Government, against the PCP and against the Portuguese workers movement. Demonstrators were organized at the call of a mixture of parties and groups, and were also endorsed by some democrats who certainly did not gauge the significance of the gesture.

We regret, as regards the PS members, to have to mention their secretary general again when we attack the reactionary forces. But what is to be done if we are always confronted by the convergence of their activity?

In kicking up a fuss about the situation in Poland, both the reactionary forces and the PS/Mario Soares launched an attack in force against the PCP.

But, we might say, they were hoisted by their own petard.

Attacking the PCP, Mario Soares proclaims: "We believe in socialism. That is why we wish to change the backward structures of capitalist society. That is why we tell the workers that that party which defends privileges, which defends oppression abroad, cannot defend the workers' freedoms in our own land." So says Mario Soares.

Of course the reactionary newspapers and Portuguese Radio and Television gave great prominence to this anticommunist tirade by the PS secretary general.

Mario Soares deduces from parties' stances on foreign issues the nature of their stances on domestic issues. But for the Portuguese people, who know better what is happening in their own country than what is happening in other countries, it is easier to do the opposite; that is, to assess parties' stances on foreign issues in accordance with what they know about their stances on domestic issues -- on Portuguese issues.

We should therefore say three things in reply to the PS secretary general's slanderous tirade.

The first is that those in Portugal who ally themselves with the reactionary forces in the offensive against the gains of the revolution and against the workers' vital interests have no authority to assert (against the PCP) that they are defending the workers in another country.

The second is that those in Portugal who defend the continuation of the "democratic system" have no authority to assert (against the PCP) that they are defending freedoms in another country.

The third is that those who, when they were in power in Portugal, began, in alliance with the right, the offensive against the nationalization measures and the agrarian reform, and who are now concluding alliances with reaction to destroy our people's democratic gains, restore the power of the monopolies and the big landowners and prevent Portuguese democracy from continuing to head toward socialism, cannot now claim to defend socialism in other countries.

Instead of the announced "fall offensive" against the "Democratic Alliance" government, it is clear that Mario Soares is seeking to launch a winter offensive against the PCP. He is, therefore, receiving, of course, reaction's praise. But he is increasingly isolating himself from the workers, the people's masses and vast sectors of his own party.

As for the PCP, life is demonstrating that it is not the attacks by reaction and Mario Soares which can succeed in separating it from the masses. Our people's daily struggle and the magnificent 12 December demonstrations serve to demonstrate this.

When the alliance for the anticommunist demonstrations ever the situation in Poland, comprising the Social Democratic Center party, the Popular Democratic Party, the PS, the Popular Monarchist party, the Union of the Left for Socialist Democracy, the Communist Party (revamped), the Popular Unity Force, the Workers Socialist Unity Party, the Trotskiyite PSR and the Portuguese Marxist-Leninist Communist organization, was seen, then all the reactionary and opportunist commentators exclaimed that the PCP was isolated.

But who is increasingly isolated?

Is it the PCP which, always firmly supporting the workers and their class organizations, the people, freedoms, the gains of the revolution, the democratic system and the country's independence, takes part actively in demonstrations of hundreds and hundreds of thousands of Portuguese men and women, or is it those who, arm-in-arm with the "Democratic Alliance" and with capital, mobilizing their forces together, cannot achieve more than half a dozen ridiculous meetings?

The truth is that the more they seek to isolate the PCP, the more they isolate themselves and the more the PCP with its consistent policy and activity (always supporting the workers, the people, democracy, the April revolution and the country), the more the PCP intensifies its tie with the masses and the more it broadens its support and influence.

JUAN CARLOS ADDRESSES ARMED FORCES CHIEFS

[Speech by King Juan Carlos at meeting with armed forces chiefs and other officials in throne room of Madrid's royal palace on occasion of Pascua Militar annual military festival 6 January -- live]

[Text] There are occasions when events which have occurred or which are occurring seem to give a delicate and difficult edge to the atmosphere of a ceremony as traditional as the one we are celebrating today, a ceremony which ought to be marked only by the joy and pleasure which flows from finding ourselves gathered here with representatives of the armed forces, and the state security forces, continuing a custom rooted deeply in military tradition, at which your king offers greetings in a relaxed and comradely atmoshpere.

The fact is that indeed nothing can prevent me from feeling such joy and satisfaction, because I assure you that such feelings prevail now and will always prevail over any other kind of feelings, over any kind of anxiety or over any kind of situation which might be described as complicated.

But it may be that on this Pascua Militar you are expecting from me, apart from greetings, some more concrete utterances on matters which concern us, utterances made by me not only as king but also in the role of supreme chief of the armed forces which the constitution confers on me and which is such an honor for me, and I should not like to disappoint such expectations.

If courage can be demonstrated in many ways I should like to keep in mind today the definition which says that courage consists in seeking truth and stating it, because delicate and difficult matters become straightforward and are freed of inhibition and discomfort when one is resolute enough to think out loud, to feel deeply and to speak clearly about what one is thinking and feeling. It is in that way that I wish to address you today.

First, I wish to express my most sincere gratitude to the forces you represent, as a whole. I thank you for the loyalty with which you have behaved in decisive moments in the year which has just ended, and for the discipline with which you are witnessing the deep and necessary process of transformation in our society, in our system of political organization and in the general state system, a process in which those forces are included and to which they inevitably, have to accommodate themselves. I thank you also for your sacrifices and your serenity, for your have suffered criminal terrorism and at times have had to tolerate incomprehension, excessive attention or distortion for purposes of sensationalism of the reality of your situation.

It is no easy matter for anybody to assimilate changes, changes which can be obviously upsetting, in a state of affairs which is adapting to a new situation demanded by the times in which we are living and by the will of the Spanish people. But such difficulties in adapting apply not only to the armed forces or to the security forces but also to many other sectors of society, too, important sectors each with its own significant influence in the life of the country and which do not always know how to maintain balance and prudence and keep the exercise of freedom in proportion.

It is natural that at times the contrast between the past and the present should give rise to tensions, produce excesses or cause surprise, which it is to be hoped will be toned down and normalized with the passage of time. We place our hopes in such expectations. If this is to come about, every institution, every group and every sector must be treated appropriately, and each of them in their turn must learn likewise to grant the rest the kind of treatment they need and are entitled to.

If there arise moments of annoyance and despondency, burying one's head in the sand and trying to ignore what is happening is not the answer. On the contrary, one must look for the causes and find solutions. What one needs to do is examine historical antecedents, come to understand psychologies and penetrate feelings and ways of being. Our armed forces form a solid and unanimous group in their way of thinking about fundamental matters, even when there is room for differing shades of opinion as to the way such thoughts are expressed or the way other, secondary matters, are seen. Even if the armed forces can possess their own way of thinking, their will can be only that of the nation. And this is common to all, with no discernible division between the different ranks, the different generations or between those who have combat action on their service records and those whose dedication in action, whose sacrifice and whose courage can only be supposed though there are good grounds for such supposition. The veterans and the younger generation are united by a community of feelings and aspirations.

One should not lose sight of -- and I should like to say this clearly, even though it has been a long time since the contest which set two Spains against each other -- the antecedents and the consequences of that contest. In that tragic and painful but wholly real civil war, the armed forces -- who did not obtain notable benefits following victory -- served the fatherland with a spirit of sacrifice and with loyalty and discipline for many years.

It is certainly true that those armed forces had become accustomed to the greatest of respect, to being held in the highest esteem and to having their dignity protected by official and all other sectors of the nation. Essential freedom of expression, a certain vengefulness in passing judgment and expressing opinions, the changes which have perforce come about in the way military matters are dealt with in public, and the forced silencing -- to the extent of alienating those who fear being attached with the past -- of those who follow this honorable profession -- all of this inevitably must have caused great surprise and left a deep impression on the men comprising Spain's armed forces. And I speak not only of those who participated in the war but of subsequent generations who have joined their ranks. These men have the same ideals and the same certainty that they are becoming part of a great family that is respected by the fellow citizens whom it is their duty to serve, that is united in comradeship and cemented in discipline, and that has the lofty mission of defending the fatherland at the cost of the ultimate sacrifice if necessary.

We must all be proud of our armed forces -- the king, as their supreme chief, the government and the nation's other institutions which depend on them to defend the sovereignty and independence of Spain as well as its territorial integrity and constitutional arrangement, and the people, the source of the armed forces, with whom they are integrated and whom it is their duty to serve. The armed forces must always strive to be deserving of that national pride, while feeling pride in themselves at being at the service of a nation whose history represents an endless succession of glorious events.

But while we ask them to have loyal and disciplined dedication, we must continue to hold them in the esteem which is their due and we must respect the lofty mission which the constitution accords them. However, we must not make a particular point of energetically treating erroneous acts too energetically, of demeaning their actions or of meting out rapid sanctions which are not necessarily either more severe or exemplary. Discipline must be demanded all the more of those who have a greater obligation to observe and impose discipline, however, such demands must never lose sight of justice or of general standards of strictness and authority which must apply to the nation as a whole. The military forces in Spain, Spain's soldiers, continue to live up to the spirit of their predecessors who, as the poet said, "will suffer all when the battle's on but will not suffer being shouted down."

The armed forces are the institution on which the security of the nation ultimately rests. For this reason, in my role as arbitrator and regulator of the functioning of the institutions, I call first on the men of the three armed forces and the men of the security forces -- whom you who are gathered here today represent -- to be aware of the important mission accorded to you, to be aware of the need to become part of the political organization system which the Spanish people have chosen and which it is your specific duty to defend.

It has been said that the past is the best prophet in the world. Therefore, we have all respect for the past, which forms a part of our history and from which so much experience can be drawn, while being totally dedicated to the legality now in force and which is to be upheld. On the other hand, in accordance with the wording -- and especially with the spirit -- enshrined in Article 176 of the Royal Ordinances of the Armed Forces, the members of the armed forces must have legal protection against threats, violence, outrages or distortions stemming from their military status or activities. The state must be constantly vigilant where the interests of the armed forces and their prestige and reputation are concerned. This is because the armed forces are the institution which serves the state with absolute devotion and because there must be compensation for the legal restrictions on their own right to demand dedress.

Power is the ability to obtain obedience. However, obedience is not always obtained through power, but rather through authority. In the year just ended we have had instances of the use of force which I wish neither to avoid mentioning nor to recall at excessive length today since this could increase the existing anxieties which are already damaging. However, even though I might want to, I cannot disregard the campaigns that have been unleashed, the many pamphlets and leaflets that have been distributed among the military, and the devising of versions of events in order to mislead and unsettle the armed forces. These activities have a lie as their slogan, confusion as their method and affront as their objective. Nobody would hear me utter any word of protest nor would they discern even the slightest attempt for me to defend myself against slanders which deserve only the most thorough contempt. Nobody should doubt my calm and my prudence, because I have always thought and continue to think that I should not descend to rebuffing fabrication or to having to justify my behavior. However, on this day, as I am addressing my dear comrades-in-arms in tones of confidence and frankness, permit me to make a short but profound mention of both my pain at the deplorable procedures some individuals use and my gratitude toward those who have shown themselves capable of rejecting insidious and lying propaganda.

Once again I repeat my blind trust in the fact that truth will prevail over everything and will shine out in order to light up even the most deeply-hidden mysteries of events which so directly affected the life of Spain, specifically the armed forces, in 1981. I repeat that I have no wish to speak in detail about this subject because I believe that it has already been excessively discussed and that many things have already been aired in a way which cannot be either useful or fitting at a time when military justice is taking its course -- a justice in which we place our total confidence. What does seem to be necessary is to avoid obsessive harping on this subject and to avoid recalling and commenting on it repeatedly. We should get away from what appears to be the difficulty of freeing ourselves from the influence of an episode which, important and significant as it was, cannot be deemed to affect the armed forces as a whole in any way other than as it testifies to their overall loyalty. It should not be allowed to influence either our present or our future.

Once again this year I ask you to reflect and show sincerity and understanding. I ask you to always keep in mind that true discipline is not limited to outward gestures, to formal expressions or to attitudes of superficial obedience and respect. True discipline is not exemplified by a man who always remains silent even though he is never really persuaded; rather, it is exemplified by the man who remains inwardly persuaded that orders must be complied with even when they go against his own judgements.

Feelings and opinions must be displayed and given with respect and in accordance with regulations. This should be done resolutely and clearly. I believe that it is currently necessary for communication within the armed forces to be maintained constantly and more intensely than ever. This information process should operate in both directions between superiors and subordinates. It will enable the superiors to keep everyone informed, to provide clarifications and guidelines, to be supplied with suggestions and instructions and to a collection of opinions. It will enable the subordinates to express their anxieties, doubts and thoughts in a systemic and obedient way without the need to use behavior that conflicts with the regulations or to try to create the impression that one group feels inadequately represented and defended by the other.

This two-way passage must contribute to maintaining and strengthening links among all elements of the armed forces on the basis of mutual sincerity and with the exercise of the strictest discipline. At the same time, for the good of their institutions and ultimately of Spain the highest levels of command in the armed forces and security forces must use the utmost frankness in expressing their own feelings and the feelings of everyone under their command to the authorities in charge of military policy and the governing of the country. It is quite clear that it is those very state authorities who provide the political leadership which encompasses as one factor among amny -- but an important factor, of course -- the armed forces. Those authorities know that in order to make the appropriate and effective decisions concerning defense and military matters, there is nothing better than to seek the opinions and advice of those who because of their professions, their experience and the missions entrusted to them are best placed to provide the required information with loyalty and sincerity.

I would like us to face the new year with hope and free of misgivings, and resolute in our unity. Let us recognize the positive aspects to be found in resolving some of our national problems, for example terrorism, civilian insecurity, the question of autonomy arrangements and the whole spectrum of economic questions and social conflicts. Let us have confidence in the continual perfecting of the democratic system which the Spanish people have chosen for themselves and let us always observe the mandate of the majority, because respect for the other man's rights is the essence of peace. Let our military virtues always be filled with meaning and let honor, our word, the truth, comradeship, sacrifice, selflessness, dignity and love for the fatherland be not mere empty concepts; let them always be made manifest in everyone's actions.

Let patriotism not be claimed as the exclusive right of one group and let none claim to be the saviour of compatriots against their freely-expressed will. Patriotism is not born of self-love; rather, as Jovellanos said, it is the noble and generous feeling which prompts man to ardently desire and effectively seek good and happiness for his fatherland as he does for his own family. On many occasions this obliges him to sacrifice his own interests to the common interests. It brings him into close union with his compatriots, interests him in their well-being, causes him to feel grief and distress at public ills and fills him with pleasure at the happiness shared by all. I am sure of your patriotism, and I trust in it for the good of Spain. And now, on this day of the Pascua Militar, I pray to God that you and your families, you who are present here today and all who serve the fatherland throughout the length and breadth of Spain, may enjoy peace and happiness in the year that is now beginning. I wish this for you with all my heart. And now join me in a cheer of "Long live Spain!" [shouts of "Long live Spain!" and "Long live the king!"]

CALVO-SOTELO SEES NEW PHASE IN EEC COOPERATION

[Text] An important achievement of Calvo-Sotelo's trip to Brussels has been the offer for true and not merely rhetorical political cooperation with Spain from now on.

[Begin Calvo-Sotelo recording] It was suggested to us by the president of the EEC Council of Ministers that we should embark on a new stage in political cooperation. From now on, when the community foreign ministers meet to discuss political cooperation, the Spanish foreign minister will be invited to a meeting beforehand with the president of the Council of Ministers and to attend the dinner or luncheon which is usually held afterwards. I therefore think that 1982 may be and indeed should be a decisive year as regards advances in our membership negotiations. I believe that 1982, when Belgium holds the presidency for the first 6 months, may bring us definite solutions to some problems and may pave the way to definite solutions in the second 6 months to some more delicate issues. [end recording]

Calvo-Sotelo's trip also had an Atlantic angle, since he had a meeting with NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns at the residence of the Spanish ambassador.

OIL COMPANY TO INCREASE IMPORT OF SOVIET CRUDE

[Text] Neste OY [oil company] is increasing its import of crude oil from the Soviet Union. Neste and a Soviet oil-exporting company [identified in news headlines as Soyuzneft Eksport: All-Union Association for the Export and Import of Petroleum and Petroleum Products] today reached agreement on the import of crude oil this year from the Soviet Union. The quantity to be delivered ranges from 7.5 million to 8.2 million tons. The value of the deal is about 8.5-9 billion markkaa.

As an annual agreement, it is the biggest that Neste has so far concluded. When one takes into account Finland's reducing oil consumption the agreement means that the share of Soviet oil will be clearly underlined in Finland's oil supplies. Last year Finland imported 7.2 million tons of crude oil from the Soviet Union. The talks between Neste and the Soviets also examined the effect of the latest price decision by the oil-exporting countries' organization OPEC on the price of Soviet oil, and freight revisions have been made. The revisions in the price of crude oil do not affect the retail prices of oil products.

INDIAN PRIME MINISTER TO MAKE VISIT IN JUNE

PM071643 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 5 Jan 82 p 6

[Text] Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi will pay an official visit to Norway in mid-June, the prime minister's office has told ARBEIDERBLADET. Indira Gandhi's visit to Norway is part of a trip she will make through the Nordic countries. Gandhi has never been in Norway before as prime minister, but was here on a private visit a few years ago. Her father, former prime minsiter, Nehru, paid an official visit to Norway in 1954, while no Norwegian prime minister has visited India since Einar Gerhardsen's visit in 1958.

There have been several visits at the foreign minister level in recent years, the most recent being when Knut Frydenlund visited India a little over a year ago.

CP'S DOGMATISM VIEWED IN LIGHT OF POLAND STANCE

PM061501 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 31 Dec 81 p 6

[Jan Ove Ekebero article]

[Text] The most striking feature of the Norwegian Communist Party [NKP] continues to be its textbook response to political questions. For the uninitiated it seems as if the party is still living in the harsh reality of Norway in the twenties and thirties. Particularly striking is the party's dogmatic stance on the Soviet union. Because of this it came as no surprise that the NKP was the only party in Norway to defend the state of martial law in Poland -- a state of martial law in which the party's guiding lights in the Kremlin are deeply involved.

When the NKP held its national congress early in December the party was unable to elect a new chairman. The party's national congress -- only the Workers' Communist Party and the NKP hold their national congresses behind closed doors -- was faced with the choice of either reelecting Martin Gunnar Knutsen or electing Hans I. Kleven as the new chairman. It is difficult to see any political differences between these two candidates, but it is a tradition for the NKP to fight over theoretical subtleties in "the true faith."

This is probably what happened this time and will be elected at the National Executive meeting early in the new year. [sentence as published] An important consideration here is that Kleven is seen as the party's leading ideologist. But regardless of which of the two becomes the party chairman after the National Executive meeting in the new year, it is highly unlikely that this would mean any change of line for the party. There were also faint signs of internal conflict after the declaration of the state of martial law in Poland. There were "mumblings" in the party's youth organization that this was perhaps not such a good thing. The party newspaper FRIHETEN was quick to publish an interview with the Norwegian Communist Youth Association's chairman, who stated that it had in no way been way been the intention to condemn the state of martial law. Once again the NKP showed itself as one of the most closed and dogmatic communist parties in West Europe.

The majority of NKP members are older people who underwent their political apprenticeship before the war. This generation has now begun to die out and the NKP thus faces the danger of becoming an even smaller party. As long as the party continues to swim against the stream in Norwegian politics there is no one who expects the NKP to win increased support. There is nothing today to indicate that the party wants to abandon its line of loyalty to Moscow. It is therefore relatively certain that the NKP will continue to be a curiosity in Norwegian politics -- with 0.2 to 0.3 percent of the voters behind it -- in the coming years.

PAPER HITS PRAVDA ATTACK ON FINLAND'S KOIVISTO

[Editorial: "PRAVDA and the President"]

[Text] Without mentioning him by name, a new article in PRAVDA has attacked [Finnish] Social Democratic presidential candidate Mauno Koivisto in lightly veiled terms. This time it was the newspaper's new correspondent in the Nordic countries, Mikhayl Kostikov, who in a major article accused Finnish industrial and commercial interests of trying to prevent "the most consistent adherents of the Kekkonen line from being elected president." The last time PRAVDA spoke out was primarily to hold up -- once again in veiled terms -- Ahti Karjalainen's virtues and Johannes Virolainen's disadvantages as presidential candidates for the Center Party. As we all know, this helped Virolainen to win a landslide victory over his opponent.

It is presumably the outcome of the tug-of-war in the Center Party which caused PRAVDA's man to note how the anti-Kekkonen tide, which he seems to believe is sweeping over Finland, has even affected the Center Party. The Finnish Constitutional People's Party and the Rural Party -- the party of the Poujadist Vennamo -- have also been criticized in PRAVDA. The two parties, PRAVDA writes, have as a result of this "anti-Kekkonen tide been led into exceptional positions." Here PRAVDA is referring to the fact that these two parties have given their support to Social Democratic presidential candidate Mauno Koivisto.

For PRAVDA's man in Helsinki it is of course incomprehensible that presidential candidates can receive support from parties to which they do not belong and which they greatly dislike. Through the system of an electoral college, party political groupings are in effect not formed, but rather electors' associations supporting one candidate or another. The two parties named, which are among Kekkonen's toughest critics, have decided democratically to support Koivisto. The PRAVDA article ends with a eulogy on the Kekkonen era in Finnish politics. Part of this era is the time "when the bonds of friendship between the Soviet Union and Finland were tied." Support for the so-called Paasikivi-Kekkonen line is more or less totally dominant in political circles in Finland. Moscow should know this very well and without worrying or interfering look forward to the presidential election, which is nevertheless the concern of the Finnish people themselves. Moreover, PRAVDA's man in Helsinki should already have learned that the best way to promote one of the presidential candidates is to create the impression that he has Moscow's full disapproval.

GOBBI, INTERLOCUTORS COMMENT BEFORE 7 JAN TALKS

[Text] In a message to the two Cyprus communities, the new UN secretary general, Perez de Cuellar, reaffirms that he will exert every possible effort in the pursuit for a just solution of the Cyprus problem. The message also states that Perez de Cuellar supports the evaluation which has been accepted by both parties as a method for discussion and that he will follow this new and delicate stage of the intercommunal talks closely. The message was read to the press by the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Gobbi, before the new meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks which was held this evening at the Ledra Palace. A UN announcement on the meeting states that all four issues on the agenda were discussed again in rotation, as had been agreed on 19 August. Specifically, points were discussed in connection with the Cyprus problem's constitutional aspect, on which a coincidence of views was ascertained. The next meeting will be held next Wednesday afternoon.

In reply to questions by the press before the meeting, Gobbi mentioned that the new UN secretary general favors the acceleration of the talks. However, he made it clear that thus far he has not raised the issue to the two communities' representatives. First, he added, a general review and exchange of views will be made and, when we have a clearer picture of the situation, we shall be able to proceed with this new procedure. In reply to a question of whether he confronts the new phase of the talks with greater pessimism than in the past, Gobbi said he thinks there are positive elements, and it is significant that both sides have submitted proposals on all the issues. I cannot be pessimistic, he said.

Gobbi replied affirmatively to a question whether he expected substantive progress in the new phase of the talks. He also said that, having worked for almost 2 years as the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, he is in possession of some facts which allow him to make certain assessments and to believe that some progress will be achieved. In reply to a question on the possibility of recourse to the UN General Assembly by the Cyprus Government in case no progress is achieved within a reasonable time, Gobbi said this is a possibility for the Greek Cypriots. This is their privilege, he observed. They will make their assessments. Finally, Gobbi said that for the time being the issue does not arise of a visit to Cyprus by Perez de Cuellar.

The Greek Cypriot side's representative to the intercommunal talks, Ioannidhis, expressed the hope that the current phase of the talks will lead to results. The Greek Cypriot side, he said, has a strong desire to achieve progress in the talks. I expect the other side will also contribute toward this. In reply to questions by the press, Ioannidhis said the Greek Cypriot side will ask for acceleration of the talks through the holding of additional meetings. The goal of the talks, he said, is a peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem through establishment of a federation on the basis of the summit agreements and the relevant UN resolutions.

The representative of the Turkish Cypriot side, Onan, said he believes it has been agreed that the evaluation document by former Secretary General Waldheim, which currently constitutes the UN evaluation, will be the basis for the talks. The procedure, he added, was agreed on by both parties. In reply to a question, Onan said the fact that Perez de Cuellar knows both sides well is very salutary for the talks. Onan also stated that his side will study any proposal for the acceleration of the talks if, and provided, it is raised. In reply to whether a study will be made of the two sides' proposals on the Waldheim evaluation, Onan said: Yes, I suppose something of the kind will be made. The meeting was attended by the advisers at the talks, Triandafillidhis and Mrs Souliotis.

TURKMEN HOPES GREECE WILL HELP REDUCE TENSIONS

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that Turkey is exerting every possible effort to eliminate the tension with Greece and noted: I would like to be optimistic about Greece adopting an attitude conducive to eliminating the tension in our relations. In a statement to ANKARA NEWS AGENCY, Turkmen said that in order to eliminate the tension between the two countries, Greece must refrain from exacerbating existing problems and adopt an attitude conducive to the perpetuation of the process of negotiations. Turkmen said: We exerted every possible effort to eliminate the tension between the two countries. The rest is up to the Greek Government. This tension will be eliminated if the Greek Government refrains from actions adding to existing problems and adopts an attitude enabling the continuation of the process of negotiations.

Referring to reports that Greece has amassed weapons and landed troops in Cyprus, Turkmen said there is no situation in the island to justify such actions. Pointing out that an atmosphere of complete peace has prevailed in the island since 1974, Turkmen said a renewed effort to bring arms into the Greek sector of Cyprus would only create a new factor for tension.

The foreign minister also noted that the concern about Turkey by the Council of Europe should have been completely eliminated following the announcement of the schedule for the return to parliamentary democracy. Noting that it is impossible to guess in advance the decision to be made regarding Turkey's continued membership in the Council of Europe, Turkmen said: If the council again makes a negative recommendation concerning Turkey's membership, I believe it would create a situation in which the council would not be accepted as a serious body.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE DELEGATION MEETS WITH TURKMEN

LOAN AGREEMENT WITH U.S. SIGNED IN ANKARA

[Excerpt] An agreement for a loan of $200 million to Turkey by the United States within the framework of the OECD special aid fund was signed in Ankara today. The agreement was signed by Finance Minister Kaya Erdem and U.S. Ambassador Robert Strausz-Hupe. Part of the loan, amounting to $100 million, is a grant in aid. The rest will be paid in 20 years with no repayments the first 5 years. The loan and the grant will be used to improve Turkey's foreign debt deficit.

In a statement at the signing ceremony, Erdem said various economic measures taken by the government would continue to be implemented in the future. Erdem said the goal is to create an economy that could cope with the competitive foreign markets. Erdem expressed his conviction that all necessary conditions and potential for development exist in Turkey and that only time is needed to reap the positive results of these measures.

ARAB LEAGUE OFFICIAL HOLDS ANKARA NEWS CONFERENCE

[Text] The secretary general of the Arab League, Chedli Klibi, has said that Turkey constitutes a bridge between the Middle East and Europe and plays an important role within this framework. In a news conference in Ankara today after his concluding his contacts, Klibi said the Arab League respects and supports Turkey's efforts for economic development. Klibi said that through its progress in industry, Turkey will occupy an important place within the Arab World.

Klibi noted that all subjects of common interests were discussed during the talks in Ankara. In reply to a question, he said the Arab League condemns the attacks directed against Turkish missions abroad and does not accept justifications for these actions. He said: There is nothing more important for us than Turkey's internal and external security. Recalling that Israel is continuing its attacks against the Arab countries, the Arab League secretary general stated that Turkey is adopting a correct and just stance toward the common Arab cause. Pointing out that he is in favor of a peaceful conclusion to the Arab-Israel conflict, Klibi noted that the Iran-Iraq war must also be terminated as soon as possible through a just peace. He recalled that this war closely concerns all the countries in the region and expressed the wish that Turkey play an important role in the efforts exerted to end the war.

Klibi also noted that the dialogue between the Arab countries and the European countries is very important for the Arab World and that efforts are being exerted to secure the continuation of this dialogue despite certain difficulties. He said that he is holding contacts to organize a meeting at the foreign ministers level in the near future between Arab and European countries.

TRIAL OF 8 SAID SPYING FOR BULGARIA CONTINUES

KIRKUK PIPELINE EXPLODES IN MARDIN PROVINCE

[Text] Idil (Mardin), 7 Jan (AA) -- An explosion was reported in the Iraq-Iskenderun pipeline which carries crude oil from Kirkuk to the Mediterranean terminal of Yumurtalik. The explosion occurred 7 km from Idil, a town in Mardin Province, and teams were investigating the cause, the governor of Mardin said. Oil was leaking out of the damaged section of the pipeline, officials said.

U.S. PRESSURING GOVERNMENT ON POLAND STAND

[Station commentary: "NATO, Poland and Turkey"]

[Text] Two opposing attitudes in the Western world today determine the polarization among the political forces. One of them views the East-West dialogue realistically and correctly assesses the developments in Poland, while the other supports U.S. imperialism's efforts to interfere grossly in Poland's and the Soviet Union's internal affairs, to upset the military balance and incite tension in Europe.

Those two attitudes will face each other once again during the NATO foreign ministers meeting in Brussels on 11 January. The Reagan administration has recently intensified its pressures on the other NATO allies. It wants all the NATO countries to support its economic sanctions against the Soviet Union and Poland. This was brought out in the open clearly during the meetings between Reagan and FRG Chancellor Schmidt. Although Schmidt announced that the FRG would not support Reagan's Polish policy, it was observed that these two NATO bosses were united regarding interference in a sovereign country. The statement issued at the end of the meetings confirmed that the disagreement was only over the style of the interference. That is, the FRG and certain other Western countries want to interfere in Poland's internal affairs in more insidious ways. They (?suggest) that the counterrevolutionary plans of Solidarity, the antisocialist organization, be left alone. The Reagan administration, however, follows a coarser path. It interferes in the Soviet Union's and Poland's internal affairs by using economic relations as political tools.

On the other hand, these two NATO bosses are afraid that the Polish issue will further deepen the conflicts within NATO. In order to prevent this, they insist on having a joint decision reached at the NATO meeting of 11 January. However, Reagan's policies against Poland and the Soviet Union have caused intensive reactions in several NATO countries. Canadian Premier Trudeau announced that his government would oppose Reagan's policy of economic sanctions during the NATO meeting. Trudeau described Washington's policy as a dangerous adventure to change the military balance in Europe to its own favor. He said: Canada will never be a tool of such an adventure. The government of our neighbor Greece also announced that it would not agree to any decision that might be reached at the NATO meeting against Poland and the Soviet Union. The government spokesman pointed out that the policy of interfering in sovereign countries' internal affairs contradicts the Papandreou government's program, adding that Greece pursues a policy favoring not the incitement of tension in Europe but the continuation of detente.

Foreign Minister Turkmen will participate in the NATO meeting of 11 January. What kind of attitude will the junta adopt at this meeting? In a speech to the Consultative Assembly, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu described the developments in Poland as an internal affair of that country. He uttered remarks which meant that the internal affairs of that nation should not be interfered with. The point is that the U.S. administration wants the NATO meeting to reach a decision which will support the adventurist policy it has been pursuing. It is exerting pressure and making threats to this end. Will Turkey submit to these pressures and take part in U.S. imperialism's and the NATO bosses' antipeace and antisocialist policies? Will the junta become a tension in the region? Or will it adopt a predetente attitude like the Greek Government? Will the junta approve the U.S. administration's adventurist Polish policy, as in the case of the latest joint defense group agreement — which envisages the expansion of the U.S. bases in Turkey -- and thus take another dangerous step in favor of U.S. imperialism?

The NATO meeting, which is a new test for the junta's foreign policy, will supply the answers to these questions. As for us communists, our attitude is clear and definite. We are in favor of peace, detente and friendship among peoples. The communists are the constant defenders of our national security and national interests. Turkey's national interests, our working class' and working people's interests make it necessary for us to be on the side of the Polish working class, which is struggling against the adventures of U.S. imperialism and against antisocialist forces.

KREISKY VIEWS EUROPEAN ENERGY PROBLEM, POLAND

AU081400 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 8 Jan 82 pp 3, 5

[Chief editor Manfred Scheuch interview with Chancellor Kreisky -- date and place not given]

[Excerpts] AZ: Your view that additional debts should be incurred if necessary to preserve jobs immediately evoked criticism, especially on the part of the manufacturers association and newspapers close to it. They have demanded investment stimulations instead. Does one exclude the other?

Kreisky: No, on the contrary. It is a fact that large investments by Finance Minister Salcher were at the very top of our package of measures. Thus it is utterly wrong to say that we do not attach appropriate importance to investments.

As far as my theory is concerned, let me say the following: Assuming we had unemployment of the same magnitude as Belgium's -- about 300,000 out of work -- then this unemployment would cost us at least 20 billion schillings annually. In other words, we do not really have any alternative to using additional funds for providing jobs, because if we do not use these billions for that we will need them to finance unemployment subsidies. And again I must present the old calculation: An unemployed person gets what he needs for subsistence, and consumes it. He pays no taxes, cannot pay any social insurance dues and cannot produce anything, but merely draws the dole. On the other hand, if we use money to provide jobs, we keep people employed. They can pay their taxes and their contributions and at the same time produce concrete assets that are important either for the economy or for the state. That is why I profess my adherence to this policy even now.

AZ: You yourself have mentioned Austria's dependence on energy imports. On the other hand, in a recent French television interview you warned emphatically against the Europeans' letting themselves be induced somehow or another by the United States to abandon the natural gas deal with the Soviet Union. Does this not amount to a contradiction in a way?

Kreisky: But we don't have any choice. There are certain energy resources. These include Arab oil, Polish coal, and they also include Soviet natural gas. And it is sheer madness to believe that one can renounce cooperation regarding these energy resources for political reasons. Especially if no alternatives are offered. To this day the U.S. Government has failed to come up with a bold coal policy that would enable Europe to reckon with energy resources other than those we know today. To this day the United States has not come up with an answer to the problem of nuclear waste storage, despite vague promises. What I mean is that one cannot on one hand tell the Europeans not to let themselves be made dependent, and on the other hand fail to tell them where they are to get their alternative energy supplies. Moreover, it is not as if energy dependence were unilateral. The other side also needs the goods supplied in payment for these energy deliveries. Thus, it too is dependent.

AZ: In connection with Poland, a situation has developed where there are different views even within the Social Democratic camp. Thus Mitterrand declared recently that everything is good that leads us to overcoming Yalta, while Chancellor Schmidt declared that Yalta could be overcome only through a war. To what an extent is Yalta binding for us?

Kreisky: It is unrealistic to believe in a revision of Yalta. The democracies simply could not afford such a high blood toll as the Soviet Union, and they have paid for that with land -- land that was not theirs.

That is a shocking fact, and Mitterrand is right when he says it was unjust. But you cannot argue with fate in history.

AZ: Does this mean you do not see any hope for a change of conditions for the Poles?

Kreisky: No, I am not so pessimistic. I believe things have not yet been decided finally in Poland. For the time being the military regime has seized power. Whenever such a seizure of power has not been accompanied by a simultaneous mass movement -- in other words, a revolution -- such military regimes have always asserted themselves. We have experienced that even in Austria, in 1934. Moreover a military regime is nothing new in Poland. It has had such a regime before.

And at this point I believe the military regime very soon will find itself confronted with the question of how things are to go on. For there can hardly be any doubt about the fact that there no longer exists a Polish communist party or whatever went by that name. What then will the political structures look like in Poland? Will they develop anew? How will they develop? How much will the scope for freedom be that the regime will be compelled to concede? Will the army hand over power, and to whom? These are still many unresolved and unanswered questions.

Hence, especially as far as the Polish development is concerned, despite all solidarity with the struggling workers, that must be beyond any doubt, one should not yet give up everything as lost. I simply believe a return to the pre-Solidarity Poland is not easily possible. However, should this internal development not take place and should there be intervention from outside, then things will take a disastrous course. Then there will be a new division of Poland. There will be inconceivable consequences. No matter how much we are opposed to Jaruzelski's system, we cannot completely forego the utilizing of potential chances of development.

AZ: Is that opposed to the attitude of the Americans?

Kreisky: There have been repeated differences of opinion with the U.S. administration at this stage. In my opinion these differences of opinion are actually superfluous because they could have been avoided through prior consultations. It is certainly not in the interest of a powerful policy if one pursues a course marked by spontaneity, where one does not know whether the proposed measures are actually expedient. After all, there have been enough fiascos in the past and one could actually avoid additional ones now.

AZ: Do you mean specifically the sanctions against the Poles and against the Soviet Union?

Kreisky: Yes, that also applies to these sanctions. Either we have international organizations were we adopt such sanctions, or every one of us does what he wants In that case, though, one should not be astonished if the whole thing becomes highly inconsistent and thus ineffective. After all, people who are doing some thinking do also exist in other places.

REFUGEE STATISTICS -- According to statistics published by the Austrian Ministry of Interior, 34,457 refugees came to Austria in 1981, including 29,059 Poles. Thus the number of people asking for asylum was four times higher than in 1980. In December 1981, 2,794 people asked for asylum; 2,573 of them were Polish refugees. The majority of the Polish refugees, 1,539 Poles, came to Austria before the introduction of visas for Poles on 8 December. [Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 5 Jan 82 p 2 AU]

FOREIGN MINISTER VIEWS ISSUES AT INF TALKS

[A. Salomonson interview with Netherlands Foreign Minister Max van der Stoel -- date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] At the INF talks between the USSR and the United States agreement will first have to be reached about figures. Does this not immediately mean stagnation -- just as at the MBFR negotiations in Vienna?

[Answer] Geneva must not be seen in terms of weeks or months. It would not be such a bad thing if the International Institute for Strategic Studies figures were used as a guideline. If it suits them, the Russians often quote the figures as authoritative. However, they conflict with their own assertion that there is parity. The International Institute for Strategic Studies reaches the conclusion that, as far as medium-range nuclear arms are concerned, the Soviet side has an advantage.

[Question] Is comparing different classes of weapons not unlike weighing apples against pears? Strategic arms can also be used as medium-range weapons, while the Soviets view the Pershing II missiles, for example, as a "first strike" weapon.

[Answer] It all depends on how you assess them. At least the Western proposal has the advantage of simplicity. Medium-range missiles which could reach the Soviet Union from West Europe would not be deployed if the Soviet Union removed its medium-range missiles trained on West European targets from Soviet territory. Or in other words, modernization will not take place in exchange for the dismantling of the SS-20's and the withdrawal from service of the SS-4's and SS-5's -- with, in addition, a willingness to include other systems on both sides in a second phase of negotiations.

[Answer] If by that they mean to say that the Soviet Union began modernizing its medium-range missiles earlier than the West, they are right. However, it is another matter whether you should award a bonus in the negotiations to the side which was first to begin the modernization process. I would rather accept the principle of equality mentioned repeatedly by Brezhnev. If both sides scrap their plans we are back in the pre-1977 situation.

[Question] According to the Soviets, since then there has been no change in parity. At the same rate as they have deployed new SS-20 missiles, they have removed old SS-4 and SS-5 missiles, and although the new missiles have three warheads, their explosive force is not greater than before, the Russians say.

[Answer] When they say that they do not take account of the much greater accuracy of those three warheads. With the SS-20 Moscow has taken a considerable qualitative step forward.

[Question] President Reagan's adviser Rostow wants to make the INF talks a part of SALT as soon as possible, as he explained during his visit to the Netherlands. Are you in favor of this?

[Answer] From the technical negotiating standpoint there are advantages in chosing two forums. On the other hand they are highly interdependent processes which affect each other.

I can imagine Rostow's thinking on this point. However, if this were to lead to delay, I would have reservations. It is necessary that START (the new name for SALT) should begin as soon as possible. I am sorry that SALT II was not completed. I also hope that as many old elements from SALT II as possible will be included in START.

[Question] It has often been pointed out in NRC HANDELSBLAD that there is a risk that if the Western zero option were realized, there would be a less of a link between Europe and the United States.

[Answer] In the nuclear field the zero option would be a clear return to an old situation [stap terug]. The link could then be more modest. The submarines with their Polaris missiles, which play a role for West Europe with their deterrent function, cannot be looked at independently of this link. Also, although these missiles are not physically present on the European continent and although they do not have the same tangible effect politically and psychologically, they are of significance. If we succeed in achieving a breakthrough with zero option, with the concomitant relaxation in East-West relations, I would not find a lesser link an important problem.

[Question] The Soviet Union absolutely rejects the West's zero option. It wants to negotiate about the whole range of medium-range missiles -- and this therefore includes the "forward based systems" and the French and British nuclear arms.

[Answer] It would not be the first time that the Soviet Union's initial offer looked a little different from the offer on the table after some time spent in negotiations. If they are interested in serious negotiations, let them make a counteroffer. I am not going to weaken the Western position by adding marginal notes in public. The most recent NATO communique expressly stated that constructive proposals from the other side would be looked at seriously.

[Answer] I would like to see a more detailed explanation. Behind the moratorium there is a darkness which the Netherlands parliamentary delegation was unable to penetrate during its visit to Moscow. What does "hundreds of missiles" mean? If it refers chiefly to the very old SS-4 and SS-5 missiles and a few SS-20's, it is of little interest. However, if they are prepared to dismantle a large number of SS-20's as well, it is a different prospect altogether. There must first be light in the darkness.

[Question] Public opinion wants to see swift results from the INF talks. Is the zero option, which it is clear is hardly attainable, there so opportune?

[Answer] I think it is important that the West has said to Moscow that is is prepared to abandon modernization if the Soviet Union is prepared to do likewise. Originally the United States was not prepared to discuss the total abandonment of modernization. Now the readiness is there. I consider this to be a gain.

[Question] For the Soviet Union closer involvement of France in the INF talks seems to be of crucial importance. Is there anything in that?

[Answer] I do not believe that France is prepared to take part. The Soviet Union can do two things -- demand that France and Britain take part in Geneva, or have their nuclear potential taken into account in some way.

[Question] Would the West be prepared to accept the latter?

[Answer] The U.S. offer has now been made. I do not say that it satisfies our views 100 percent, but it satisfied them to a large extent. I do not want to anticipate our position in case the Soviet Union makes a constructive counterproposal.

[Question] Although you are known as a confirmed Atlanticist you have recently been advocating a clear European voice in the security debate. Have you changed your mind?

[Answer] I remain an Atlanticist. I consider genuine cooperation between Europe and the United States to be of the utmost importance for stable conditions in Europe. On the other hand there is a new generation slowly coming to the fore in the United States which is less well-informed about what concerns Europe. I am not saying that there is a total lack of information -- just think of Haig and Eagleburger, who know Europe -- but nevertheless....

In this situation the voice of Europe must be heard clearly and early in Washington. This would strengthen the transatlantic dialogue, not weaken it. I am not thinking in terms of two autonomous dicisionmaking centers in the alliance -- that would not be desirable. That would drive Europe and the United States apart, I fear. I am saying that something, if Europe has specific interests to defend in Washington, individual steps from individual European nations achieve less than collective steps.

This is something which would not be that simple or quick to bring about, but it should not be written off without being given a chance. Take 1981 -- I think that the hammering away by various countries in Washington on the theme of the resumption of arms reduction talks was important for the adjustment of the U.S. position.

If the foreign ministers of the ten EEC countries were able to discuss the central questions affecting European security and relations with the United States and could defend certain interests in Washington, I would find this extremely important. I support the principle. However, in practice I think that it will be more difficult to bring a couple of European countries together than all ten. In this context, I am thinking of the possibility that the Netherlands would follow the same line as Germany on arms limitation, as has become apparent in recent months.

[Question] Christian Democratic Appeal parliamentary group Chairman Lubbers said in Bonn that the Netherlands would have to reconsider its position if the Federal Republic began to deploy new nuclear arms in 1983 in the event of no results from the negotiations. Do you agree with this line?

[Answer] In the field of arms limitation I support one line. As far as deployment is concerned, as a member of the government I can only repeat the section in the government accord, which said that the cabinet will choose the time for a decision, and that in doing so the results of arms limitation negotiations in particular will play an important role. If the movement for a definite decision comes, our analysis will naturally also take our allies' attitudes into consideration.

[Answer] No political party has remained unaffected by the massive support for the demonstration in Amsterdam 21 November. But I would dare to disagree that this means that the center of decisionmaking has shifted. The peace movement is reasonable and rightly asks the government for a strenuous effort to reduce the risk of nuclear war. But that is not to say that every recipe passed on by the peace movement is particularly suitable.

[Question] Labor Party [PVDA] Chairman Max van den Berg said after the demonstration in Amsterdam that the way of the Interchurch Peace Council is also the way of the PVDA -- that is, the way of unilateral steps intended to lead to multilateral steps. There is no room for people who operate in the name of the PVDA to dissociate themselves from that standpoint, he said. However, you have repeatedly spoken out against unilateral steps.

[Answer] In my lecture on current affairs at Leiden University I left that sort of room for unilateral steps, but I also said that if the West disarms unilaterally, this would not lead to a stabilization in Europe, but to destabilization. That is, I believe, not in conflict with the party's election program. In addition -- I am committed to the urgency of arms limitation talks. We cannot allow ourselves to forget that road. We must explore every avenue. This remains my standpoint. If people do not find this satisfactory, the second chamber need only call for my resignation.

[Question] In December 1979 you said in the second chamber that if there were no results from the negotiations and if the Soviet Union went through with the deployment of the SS-20, the Netherlands could not escape the necessity of deploying a limited number of new weapons. However, last summer in an appendix to the government accord you stated that you would resign your post if the cabinet were to make a positive decision on deployment.

[Answer] That is not inconsistent. The appendix made it clear that, given the attitude of the PVDA parliamentary group, the basis for its ministers' political functioning would disappear if a positive deployment decision were made. That's how things are. If the cabinet were to make such a decision this would -- given the absolute opposition of the PVDA -- lead to a negative attitude to the cabinet on the part of my party. Against this background it would be impossible for a PVDA minister to function any longer.

[Question] Do you yourself adhere to your original view that under certain circumstances a decision in favor of deployment would have to be made?

[Answer] I have always had a number of objections to the modernization decision. At that time my position was that under certain conditions the PVDA would have to reconsider its "no" -- if, for example, the negotiations were unsuccessful, if the Soviet Union went through with the deployment of the SS-20's and if as well, in the exchange for a Netherland's promise on deployment, a number of Netherlands wishes concerning the U.S. nuclear arms in West Europe would be fulfilled. As far as this latter issue is concerned I have not become more optimistic.

GENSCHER VIEWS POLISH POLICY, NATO TALKS

[Reporter Hans-Joachim Reiche interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher on the program "Bonn Perspectives" on 10 January -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Foreign Minister, German foreign policy is supposed to be predictable -- a famous expression in Bonn. Have we become less predictable for the United States?

[Answer] Most certainly not. This has been demonstrated by the meetings in Washington. It is known in Washington that German foreign policy is marked by clarity and firmness, and not by noisy voices.

[Question] The conference of NATO foreign ministers in Brussels will make new decisions tomorrow on the Polish affair, at least it will discuss the situation. Do you believe that developments in Poland will have an effect on the mood of the alliance so that some livelier steps could emanate from this conference?

[Answer] Livelier steps, that is a way of putting it. However, nobody in the alliance will be able to ignore the fact that developments in Poland are not improving but are becoming increasingly worse. The Federal Government has always maintained that in its assessment of the situation in Poland, a decisive role must be played by the opinion of the Catholic Church in Poland. The recent statements by the chairman of the Conference of Polish Bishops makes it very clear how concerned he is about the developments. So I assume that a clear position will be achieved tomorrow. I wish that this had happened earlier. Unfortunately, we must say that so far the federal chancellor and the U.S. President have been the only ones to approach not just the Polish leaders but the Soviet leaders as well on the subject of Poland because the Soviet Union bears grave responsibility for what is going on there.

[Question] Mr Minister, you said a few days ago that the Federal Republic would continue to give financial aid to Poland with the understanding that Poland returns to the way of reform. There are no indications that this is happening. What would happen, and how would Bonn act if no return to the path of reform were to materialize?

[Answer] On the basis of what we may call a unanimously adopted statement by the Bundestag, Mr Reiche, we have always demanded a return to the course of reform and renewal. This, by the way, is exactly what the Polish Government has promised its own people and what it has told us as well. This includes the lifting of martial law, the release of detainees, and the resumption of the dialogue with the Catholic Church and the trade union Solidarity. If these steps are taken, the West must be prepared to extend the necessary financial support to Poland. Should developments worsen, Moscow above all must be aware that this will have repercussions on East-West relations. All of us, after all, are committed by the Helsinki Final Act which represents the great hope of the people of Europe. Warsaw and Moscow should not take this lightly.

[Question] It ought to be possible among friends to speak one's mind, Mr Minister. This also holds true for an alliance, of course. However, aren't the ever recurring quarrels we have been witnessing in the past few years -- be they over lack of consultation, the Afghanistan issue or other issues -- aren't they paralyzing the alliance, and don't they weaken the external impact of the alliance?

[Answer] The concern implied by your question is justified, Mr Reiche. I noted during the past few days especially that we really were running the risk of talking of a failure of the communist system -- and this is what is happening in Poland where communism in Europe is shown to have lost the struggle for the workers even where it is fully responsible -- into a crisis of the Western community as it were.

In this respect all of us are committed. I had the impression at times that some voices in Western foreign countries were more critical of the German attitude than of what the Soviet Union and the military rulers in Poland are doing. We should now concentrate on what must be our objective -- helping the Polish people and creating through our policy the prerequisites for making possible in Poland what the country's own leadership has promised -- the continuation of the course which was so hopefully started last year, the course of reform and renewal in Poland.

To Press For Dialogue

[Excerpts] Bonn, 8 Jan (AFP) -- West Germany will hold out strongly at a North Atlantic treaty Organization (NATO) meeting on Monday for "active dialogue" with the Polish Government, intended to persuade it back to the path of reform interrupted by martial law, a well informed source said here today. The source told AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE that the meeting of the 15 NATO foreign ministers would follow on the European Council, be in line with a joint statement issued in New York after talks between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and President Ronald Reagan, in firmly condemning the Soviet role in the Polish crisis and stressing the urgency of reviving reforms.

But the source said that the West, while rejecting the Soviet interpretation of the situation, must continue to talk with the Polish Government, despite martial law. Referring to a speech on Wednesday by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, the source said that pledging solid economic aid to Poland would help convince Warsaw to resume reforms undertaken 18 months ago. Speaking on his return from Washington, Mr Genscher said that West Germany, and its allies, would give Poland "substantial aid" if it resumed the reforms.

At the NATO meeting, Washington is widely expected to put pressure on its European allies to follow its example and impose economic sanctions against the Soviet Union for its part in the Polish crisis.

BARZEL CALLS FOR TIGHTENING OF SCREWS ON WARSAW

[Text] [No dateline received] Rainer Barzel (CDU), chairman of the Bundestag Foreign Relations Committee, said in an interview for the second television network's program on Sunday that further delays will not promote Western objectives in Poland. The screw will have to be tightened. Barzel referred to the signal which the United States has made with their sanctions. Even Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has now "clarified" that Moscow's responsibility can no longer be denied.

Otto Wolff von Amerongen, president of the German Chamber of Industry and Commerce, speaking on the second television network Sunday, has come out against sanctions of any kind. U.S. sanctions could perhaps delay but hardly cancel the European gas-pipeline deal with the Soviet Union. Should the United States enforce a boycott of supplies then equipment required to lay the pipeline could be "produced without difficulty in Europe." Barzel said concerning this that Soviet policy has put a question mark over this deal.

Concerned About U.S. Opinion

[Text] Bonn, 8 Jan (DPA) -- The chairman of the lower house Foreign Affairs Committee, Rainer Barzel, CDU, has expressed his concern that public opinion in the United States is turning against the Federal Republic. Speaking on German television tonight, Barzel said that public opinion in the United States is as important as a large number of divisions in NATO. "We need a positive public opinion for Germany and for Berlin," Barzel stressed.

It should be clearly understood that Soviet pressure on Poland has been very strong and that the USSR bears the responsibility for the "de facto intervention" in Poland. The sanctions the U.S. imposed on the USSR should be looked at item by item. Though West Europeans cannot follow suit on some points, they could for instance tighten their export regulations for high technology times. Barzel criticized Chancellor Schmidt who, in Barzel's opinion, overrated the role of the Federal Republic. "If I may use a metaphor, I have a feeling that the federal chancellor is trying to play the part of the world's umpire now that his role as the world's economist is in dispute," Barzel said.

CDU/CSU SPOKESMAN ON U.S.-EUROPEAN 'ALIENATION'

[Text] Bonn, 10 Jan (DPA) -- Alois Mertes, foreign policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU Bundestag group, has warned against the threatening disintegration of the Western alliance due to the increasing isolationism in Europe. European isolationism, above all in the SPD, led to growing isolationism in the United States and European U.S. alienation. Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is being put under increasing pressure by the "so-called peace movement and the Brandt-Eppler majority in the SPD," Mertes said in a DPA interview on Sunday. This development serves, in the final analysis, only the Soviet Union which seeks to make the Federal Republic pliable and to expel the United States from Europe. Without stringent self-discipline by the West, the Soviet Union with each intervention will achieve a two-fold objective: namely the subjugation of a neighboring country and the self-inflicted splintering of the West.

With reference to the NATO foreign ministers conference starting on Monday, Mertes called on Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher to urge in Brussels that the alliance should at last rally round a credible strategy of economic deterrence to counter the Soviet policy of force against other peoples in Europe and Asia. "Such nonmilitary strategy of flexible reaction in favor of peace, loyalty to reaty obligations and human rights must supplement the military strategy of preventing war and blackmail," the CDU/CSU politician said. Such action also includes Europe's practical solidarity with the U.S. measures against Moscow and the Jaruzelski regime in Poland. Bonn should not pretend that the political framework terms for the gas-pipeline deal have remained unaffected by Poland.

FDR LEADER REAFFIRMS COALITION WITH SPD

[Excerpts] Coburg/Bonn, 10 Jan (DPA) -- FDP Secretary General Guenter Verheugen has strongly come out in favor of continuing the coalition with the Social Democrats in Bonn for the coming years. Addressing an FDP rally in Coburg on Sunday, Verheugen thus indirectly refused the request by CDU Secretary Heiner Geissler to the FDP to quit the government alliance with the SPD. The FDP secretary general appealed to his party to undertake wide-ranging political initiatives in the new year. He said that the continuation of the peace policy through promoting an East-West dialogue on disarmament, and in the domestic sector, the fight against unemployment as well as environmental protection and help for sociallly disadvantaged groups, especially steps toward integrating foreigners, are among key points of FDP policy.

SCHMIDT TO MAKE BUNDESTAG STATEMENT ON U.S. TALKS

[Excerpt] Bonn, 11 Jan (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will make a government statement to the Bundestag about his talks with President Reagan on Thursday afternoon. This was announced in Bonn today. The statement and the debate that will follow in parliament are likely to concentrate on developments in Poland and the results of today's special NATO foreign ministers' conference in Brussels.

PS, PCF AGREE ON DOMESTIC POLICY, NOT POLAND

[Text] The main political event in France today was the summit meeting of the Socialist and Communist Parties, a meeting which lasted for 3 and 1/2 hours. The PS and PCF have not had contacts at such high levels since last June, and the political world considered today's meeting an important test within the context of the Polish crisis. Poland was, of course, discussed and a disagreement was noted in this respect; whereas on the domestic level the PCF and PS assessed as positive the policy of change implemented since 10 June.

Michel Merle [France-Inter correspondent], you examined the joint communique most thoroughly, and you also attended in the afternoon a press conference held by Lionel Jospin [Socialist Party leader]. What conclusions can you draw from all this:

[Merle] Satisfaction is prevalent this evening on the PS and PCF sides after these 3 and 1/2 hours of talks which provided two confirmations: one positive regarding the support of the two parties for the government's policy, and one negative consisting of the disagreement as regards Poland.

Here is one of those little mysteries which mark relations between journalists and politicians: It was believed that a potential rapprochement between the viewpoints could be expected from this meeting, particularly on Poland. By no means, we were told this evening, it was clear from the start that the analyses were too decisive for there to be a rapprochement. Thus there is no failure on this particular point because no objective was planned in this respect. It is however, admitted that in the absence of a joint analysis of the situation some joint proposals could have been made, such as a request for the release of the imprisoned Polish trade union members, for example, but the PCF did not want this, the PS regretfully points out, which stresses above all the communist' reiteration of their full commitment to the government. In any case, the two parties agree on one formula. Today it was merely a case of renewing the 23 June agreement which to some extent represents the government charter signed by the two parties.

[Excerpt] Paris, 8 Jan (AFP) -- A meeting today between the French Socialist and their government partners, the Moscow-aligned French Communist Party, failed to resolve differences on the Polish crisis which have led to a deepening split among the French left. A joint communique released after the meeting said that the two parties "noted their differences and divergencies" on the Polish situation, but had passed "positive judgement on the politics of change" begun in France with the election of Socialist President Francois Mitterrand on May 10.

JOSPIN COMMENTS ON MITTERRAND, POLISH EVENTS

[Text] Speaking in Chalons-sur-Marne on the evening of Tuesday 5 January [PS first secretary] Lionel Jospin welcomed the fact that France has a president "capable of saying no both to the USSR and the United States." The PS first secretary said: "The head of state is a strong man who acts on principles and is capable of saying no to the United States with regard to El Salvador and no to the USSR when it is tempted to tell Poland what to do."

After expressing his support for Annette Chepy-Leger, PS deputy for Marne, whose election in the third constituency was invalidated by the Constitutional Council, Jospin also condemned "the external logistical support which the military enjoyed when they seized power in Poland." With regard to Poland the PS first secretary finally condemned "the sanctimonious members of the right who have used that country as a pretext for an internal political operation."

QUAI D'ORSAY DENIES REPORT ON CHEYSSON REMARKS

[Excerpt] Paris, 10 Jan (AFP) -- The Quai d'Orsay today denied a report in the London OBSERVER that Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson has said Camp David is dead and Middle East peace now rests on the eight-point plan proposed last year by Saudi Arabia. France's proposal, in accord with its European prtners, to aid in getting up a multinational force in the Sinai after Israeli withdrawal was proof of this, a spokesman said.

CHEYSSON EXPLAINS POSITION ON VIETNAM AID

[Text] Paris, 8 Jan (AFP) -- French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson met today with the five ambassadors to Paris of the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) to explain France's position on aid to Vietnam. The signing of the aid protocol had caused some disquiet among non-communist capitals in South-East Asia, including ASEAN which groups Philippines, Thailand, Singapore, Malaysia and Indonesia.

Mr Cheysson said that despite its signing of a $32 million aid agreement with Vietnam on December 23, France continues to press for the withdrawal of Vietnamese troops from Kampuchea and for measures to insure the self-determination for the Khmer people. Following today's meeting, ASEAN ambassadors termed the talks positive and French officials said they were held amid a "cordial and friendly atmosphere." Mr Cheysson pointed out that the agreement with Vietnam was a logical follow up to the cooperation programme between Paris and Hanoi carried out since 1977.

POLISH GROUP CLAIMS RESPONSIBILITY FOR 3 BOMBINGS

[Text] Paris, 10 Jan (AFP) -- Three explosions went off here this evening within minutes in different areas of the city, the fire brigade announced. The explosions went off in the offices of an insurance company and two business firms, it added. There [were] no casualties, but considerable damage was caused. An organisation calling itself the Bakunin Gdansk Paris Group later claimed responsibility for the explosions in a message sent to AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE. Eyewitnesses said the explosions went off in firms dealing with East Europe, one of them the Franco-Polish Trading Comapny. The message said the previously-unknown group was "against the interments, trials, murders of workers in Poland, organized starvation, torture, and massacre of people in Latin America and Afghanistan" and aimed to fight against "the political and economic interests of the Moscow and Washington imperialists." It said the offices targeted belonged to Esmil, a U.S. company, Slava, a Soviet company and Metallex, a Polish firm.

Tonight's blasts followed a recent series of incidents, here and in other parts of France, linked with the Polish crisis. The offices of a Polish freight company, Botrans, was badly damaged in Paris December 20 in an attack claimed first by a far-right group, Charles Martel, and later by Bakunin Gdansk. The same day half a ton of garbage was dumped in front of the Communist Party headquarters in the capital. A group identifying itself as the International Hooligans (Hooligans Internationale) claimed responsibility.

In the southern town of Perpignan a so-called Ukrainian anarchist group Fils de Makhno (sons of Makhno) set three Soviet-made Lada automobiles on fire. A day later a dozen people attacked a publicity firm in Paris specializing in East-European business. They identified themselves a revolutionary Polish group, Dombrowski Column. On December 22 the Charles Martel group claimed responsibility for two attacks against the communist daily LA MARSEILLAISE.

PAPER VIEWS EUROPEAN, U.S. STAND ON SANCTIONS

[Serge Maffert editorial: "Three Questions"]

[Text] The long and apparently difficult talks between Reagan and Schmidt dealt essentially with the question of sanctions against Poland and the USSR. It is a thorny and complex problem which raises three questions. 1) Sanctions with a view to what result? Many political organizations and some governments are calling on General Jaruzelski and the military government to "return to the democratic freedoms which existed before 13 December." That is confusing communist Poland with, let's say, capitalist Greece: the Polish generals with the Greek colonels.

In its long history Poland has never experienced "democratic freedoms," and especially not since 1945. Of course, the Warsaw regime was more open than that of other Eastern bloc countries, the citizens could leave more easily and voice their opinions more freely. But, in that "people's democracy," the Poles have never experienced that legally constituted state (staatsrecht) which guarantees freedoms as they are generally understood in the West. The situation before 13 December was in fact a revolutionary or prerevolutionary situation characterized by a confrontation between Solidarity, backed by the majority of the population, and the communist government with the objective of bringing about a radical change in Poland's structures and orientations. The Western countries should know how far to go in supporting the Polish people's demands. Their aim should either be to impose a compromise between the military and Solidarity with the church's blessing -- but what kind of compromise? -- in other words, of Poland leaving the socialist system and of confrontation with the USSR. The end of Yalta will long remain a new year resolution.

2) Who is Jaruzelski and what does he want? In Reagan's view he is a puppet whose strings are pulled by Moscow. Schmidt regards him as a Polish nationalist who, in fighting Solidarity, is really confronting the Soviets. What is the real answer? Any effective Western action will largely depend on it. It will be observed that Western sanctions can be justified in both cases. In the first, they could force the Soviets and the Polish military to take a more moderate line. In the second, the West's hostility toward Jaruzelski would strengthen his position with Moscow. 3) What type of sanctions should be chosen? The United States generally believes that economic measures are more effective than political retaliation. The problem is that Mr Reagan has chosen a series of decisions which embarrass the Soviets moderately, embarrass the U.S. industrialists virtually not at all but which, if transposed in their present form to the European Ten, would have a very severe effect both on the Soviet economy and on the European economy, especially that of the FRG. However, this last question may be regarded as secondary compared with the others. Unity of action between Europe and the United States would be much easier to achieve if the West first agreed on the objectives and if Mr Reagan succeeded in convincing his allies that his action matches his tough talk. That remains to be demonstrated.

MITTERRAND-SCHMIDT TALKS -- It is probable that Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will be meeting Francois Mitterrand on Wednesday in Paris. Their meeting will serve to clarify what each side thinks about the situation in Poland. This meeting would be in advance of the French-German summit due to be held next month in Paris, but after the Brussels meeting of NATO foreign ministers which began this morning after a delay because of bad weather. It is expected that this meeting will sound a warning to the Kremlin regarding Poland. [Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 11 Jan 82 LD]

POLICE 'MAY BE CLOSE' TO FINDING GENERAL DOZIER

[Text] Twenty-two days have passed since the kidnapping of U.S. General Dozier and the enquiries by the police and Carabinieri continue in the greatest secrecy. The only admission made by the investigators is that interesting leads are being pursued and facts that have been acquired are causing moderate optimism. A report from Verona by Feruccio (Gobbi):

[(Gobbi)] The reward of 2 billion lire offered by a group of Italian friends of U.S. General James Dozier may no longer be indispensable. This statement made by one of the investigators is important because it may mean that the police and Carabinieri are close to the hideout the Red Brigades are using as a prison. Checkpoints, raids and searches continue in Verona. The photographs of Stefano Petrella and Ennio di Rocco, the two Red Brigades members arrested in Rome, will be shown to Dozier's wife and a direct confrontation is not excluded. The forensic experts are examining the three cars, two 131S' and one [word indistinct] which were used by the terrorists, in addition to a van for the kidnapping, and which were hired in Milan. U.S. Ambassador Rabb made a statement on Dozier's kidnapping during his visit to Udine. Rabb said the terrorists had failed in their objective, stating that the criminal kidnapping of Dozier had not in any way affected the close relationship between the United States and Italy nor had it weakened the Western alliance.

Other Developments

[Excerpts] Rome, 9 Jan (ANSA) -- Italy's Red Brigades terrorists left a forty-minute recorded message at a Milan underground station last night while in Rome the government decided to step up security measures in and around the nation's maximum security prisons where convicted terrorists are serving time and terrorist suspects are awaiting trial. A police spokesman in Milan reported last night that a taped message, apparently recorded by Red Brigades terrorists, was left in a recorder connected to a timer and that the police were called to the station when the recorder began broadcasting "a hash and rehash" of brigades' slogans on the struggle in big Italian factories and in the prisons, on the Italian economic situation and the Atlantic alliance".

The spokesman also disclosed that the message contained a brief reference to U.S. Brigadier-General James L. Dozier, the second in command of NATO land forces in southern Europe kidnapped by brigades terrorists from his home in Verona on December 17. He said that the reference to the hostage, however, added nothing new to the three brigades "communiques" released since the abduction.

Meeting to discuss the spectacular prison break and surveillance at these maximum security institutions, an interministerial session decided on a series of new security measures to include a clampdown on packages sent in or brought to detainees, doing away with "extraordinary" visits by family and friends and beefing up surveillance inside and outside the prison walls. The minsters reportedly did not, however, contemplate reopening the maximum security prison on the island of Asinara, a bleak rock off the northwest coast of Sardinia.

Interrogation of Senzani

[Excerpts] Rome, 11 Jan (ANSA) -- A lead on the whereabouts of United States Army Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier, kidnapped by Italy's Red Brigades terrorists from his home in Verona on December 17, is one of the major elements investigators hope to turn up in the interrogation of Giovanni Senzani, the alleged Red Brigades political mastermind captured on the outskirts of Rome at dawn Saturday morning.

The 40-year-old university criminologist was subjected to intense questioning over the weekend by Assistant State Prosecutor Domenico Sica, who is also in charge of the interrogation of the nine other terrorist suspects, including three women, captured in three hideouts in the capital by "Digos" anti-terrorist police.

Police also discovered in the apartments two Soviet-made ground-to-air missiles, two French-made ground-to-ground missiles, one bazooka, several kilograms of explosives, four hand grenades, and an arsenal of machine guns, pistols, shotguns, and large supplies of ammunition. Rome Police Chief Giovanni Pollio disclosed that the hideouts also contained maps and scores of other documents pertaining to brigade targets "of singular importance."

The five magistrates working on the Senzani case with the assistant prosecutor, however, are uncertain about what information the Red Brigades "Brain" might be in possession of as regards the kidnapped American general because of the split in terrorist ranks between the "Militarists" in the North -- active mostly in the regions of Liguria, Lombardy, the Piedmont and Veneto -- and the "Movimentisti" led by Senzani in central and southern Italy.

Investigators are also exploring the possibility that Senzani and his brigade followers in Rome were betrayed by the northern "Militarists" in light of the capture in Rome last Monday of two young terrorist suspects thought to be preparing the abduction of the managing-director of the Fiat automobile corporation, Cesare Romiti. In speculation of the connection between the capture Monday of two alleged terrorists thought to be close to Senzani and the Saturday morning raids on three hideouts, which led to Senzani's arrest, along with the nine others, sources close to the investigation have said that it would have been very unlikely that the pair seized Monday "cracked" under questioning. Therefore, so the line of speculation runs, police may have been tipped off on the whereabouts of Senzani and the others by the "Militarists" because if the criminologist had any doubts on the ability of the first two arrested to keep their mouths shut, he would have abandoned his hideout.

COMMUNISTS RESPOND TO CSSR CHARGES ON POLAND

[Excerpts] Rome, 9 Jan (ANSA) -- The Italian Communist Party came up with a toughly worded response today to charges levelled by the Czechoslovak party that Italy's Communists had lined up "in opposition to the communist international." The Italian Communist Party, in a piece appearing in today's edition of the party paper L'UNITA, declared that "the method employed (by the Czechoslovak party is deprecable coming from those who failed to provide the least bit of information on the Italian Communists' position on Poland."

The response came to an attack carried two days ago by the Czechoslovak party organ RUDE PRAVO, which argued that Italy's Communists, because of their position on developments in Poland, "had stepped out of the international communist movement and away from the backers of real socialism."

VOTERS IN POLL APPROVE OF SPADOLINI'S PERFORMANCE

[Text] Milan, 9 Jan (ANSA) -- The majority of Italy's eligible voters approve of the way Premier Giovanni Spadolini is handling his job, according to a survey conducted by the nation's biggest polling institute, Doxa, and released here in the evening. Doxa reported that if Spadolini, the first non-Christian Democrat head of government for Italy since shortly after the Second World War, were to run for his office today, he would garner 51 percent of all votes cast.

A breakdown of the pollsters' findings disclosed that 29 percent of the people interviewed approved of the way the premier has handled his job since he was sworn into office last June 28 at the head of a coalition of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Liberals and his own Republican Party. Another 22.3 percent of the people polled said that Spadolini was "sufficient" for the job and only 14.5 percent disapproved of his conduct in office.

Doxa also provided a comparison of the popularity of Italy's heads of governments for the past fifteen years. At the top of the list was Aldo Moro, who was the president of his Christian Democrat Party when he was kidnapped and killed by Red Brigades terrorists in spring of 1978. The second man on the list was Spadolini, followed by Arnaldo Forlani, whose government was toppled in May last year by the scandal surrounding Italy's secret Propaganda Due Masonic lodge, by Francesco Cossiga, who held the office in 1980, and by Giulio Andreotti, who headed his last Rome government in 1979.

CHEYSSON, POPE HOLD HOUR-LONG MEETING 9 JAN

[Text] Poland was certainly at the center of talks this morning between Pope John Paul II and French Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson at the Vatican. The meeting lasted 1 hour, but no comment was made on it. It is the first time a member of the Socialist government has been granted an audience by the holy father.

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON POPE'S MEETING WITH SHAMIR

TA071547 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1500 GMT 7 Jan 82

[Text] The Vatican this afternoon issued a communique on the meeting between Pope John Paul II and Israeli Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir. According to the communique, the pope told Foreign Minister Shamir that a just solution to the Palestinian problem, one that would take into account Israel's security needs, is essential for peace in the Middle East. The pope and Shamir conferred for 30 minutes this afternoon. This was the first meeting a pope has held with a senior Israeli personality in 4 years.

The Vatican announcement stated that the pope expressed the hope that the peace negotiations between Israel and Egypt will expand and include all interested parties in the Middle East. The statement said further that the problem of the Palestinians residing in the Holy Land or as refugees in neighboring countries is of special significance. The communique also said an unequivocal commitment to finding a just and fair solution, one that will also take into account Israel's security problems, will provide a new, determined momentum to the peace process.

Shamir-Spadolini Meeting

[Text] Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini will under no circumstances receive Yasir 'Arafat for a meeting, sources in his office told our correspondent Tzvi Lidar after Spadolini met Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir. These sources also noted that the meeting between Spadolini and Shamir was very good.

The forign minister brought his host a message from Prime Minister Menahem Begin and asked Spadolini why Israel had not yet received an answer to its appeal to the four EEC countries that had agreed to participate in the Sinai multinational force. In the appeal they were requested to endorse the joint U.S.-Israeli declaration of principles. Spadolini replied that after the Golan law was passed, some difficulties cropped up in the countries that are to participate in the force. Still, he expressed hope that an arrangement would be found. He said Italy is interested in participation in that force, even though it objects to the Golan law. He emphasized that it is very important that the Palestinian problem be solved, and stated that he understands that Israel is interested in attaining an agreement on this matter.

Colombo-Shamir Talks

[Excerpts] Rome, 11 Jan (ANSA) -- Israeli Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir, on official visit to Rome since Wednesday, confirmed Israel's intentions to complete its withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula by April 26 during a talk with Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo Sunday. Colombo, who returned to Rome Saturday at the end of official visits to Saudi Arabia and Jordan, declared for his part that the Israeli pullout from the last occupied sector of the Sinai will be "the first step towards peace to which we will lend our cooperation" in reference to the Italian decision to join the multilateral peace-keeping force in the Sinai alongside the European Economic Community partners Britain, France and the Netherlands.

The head of Italian diplomacy also reiterated the Italian condemnation of the unilateral Israeli annexation of the Golan Heights, announced in December in the wake of the Polish crisis, and pointed out for Shamir that, "negotiations are not conducted with a policy of 'fait accompli.'" The Israeli foreign minister replied that his nation will seek to push on with talks on Palestinian autonomy but cautioned that it was difficult to enter into precise commitments with the Egyptians at this time. As far as the Golan Heights is concerned, Shamir said, the territory will stay in Israel's possession because of the opposition of Syria to any form of negotiation. He added that as regards the other occupied territories, these issues must be negotiated on a "case by case" basis.

Addressing himself to Shamir's concern for Egypt's desire to strengthen ties with the rest of the Arab world, Colombo said that on the basis of his talks in Riyadh and Amman, he had gathered the impression that achieving these closer relations, "will not be a simple thing. The Camp David agreements created a deep gulf."

The two foreign ministers also discussed the eight-point Mideast peace plan drafted by Saudi Crown Prince Fahd and, in this connection, Colombo insisted that the steps taken by the moderate Arab states were frustrated by the Israeli policy of "fait accompli." Shamir responded by pointing out that he expects his country to be in a position at some time in the future to open negotiations with Jordan. The foreign minister added that he would also be ready to begin talks with Saudi Arabia.

Addresses Jewish Community

TA101848 Jerusalem Domestic Service in English 1800 GMT 10 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir says that the claim that Israel is isolated is nothing but a myth. Shamir made this statement during a meeting with heads of the Jewish community of Rome. At the meeting, he reported on his talks with the pope last Thursday and on the efforts Israel is making for peace, including the withdrawal from Yamit, which he calls a national tragedy. Reporter Lisa (Bilig) asked Shamir what the main conclusion was on his talks with Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, who has just returned from Egypt:

[Begin recording] [Shamir] The main conclusion was that we have to continue to discuss all the problems of the Middle East and of our region.

[Question] What would you consider were the main achievements of your trip to Rome, including your stopover at the Vatican?

[Answer] Well, the main purpose of my visit was to continue our dialogue with the Vatican and with the Italian Government and to deepen and strengthen the understanding between us (?on) these important political factors. [end recording]

DEFENSE MINISTER ADDRESSES ARMED FORCES CHIEFS

[Speech by Defense Minister Alberto Oliart at a ceremony attended by King Juan Carlos and the armed forces chiefs in the throne room of Madrid's royal palace on the occasion of the Pascua Militar festival 6 January -- live]

[Text] [Words indistinct] and this is why there are gathered here today the commanding officers and representatives of the armed forces and the state security forces on whose behalf it is my honor as minister of defense to reaffirm the loyalty and obedience of the armed forces to their king. This loyalty and obedience constitute a concise military expression of our people's sentiments of respect, admiration and appreciation for you, not only in your capacity as the personification of the institution of the crown, but as King Juan Carlos I the individual. The people love you because, in a period of crisis and at a difficult and important time, by your calmness, wisdom and courage you have won their respect, trust and affection.

Sir, this past year was marked by the difficult and important occasions to which you referred in your Christmas Eve message but it will also be marked in the political life of our fatherland by positive and important achievements in the political, economic and social fields. The economic and social agreement on employment is an example of how different social forces, perhaps with conflicting interests, must and can harmonize their different points of view in the better service of the economy and Spanish society. The agreement on autonomies signed by the government and the main opposition party will, I am sure, permit the channelling, within the framework of the basic unity of the Spanish nation and state, of the construction and development provided by our constitution of the autonomies, and will do so in an orderly way.

In the field of public order, Sir, I would only like to recall the important work done by the Ministry of the Interior and the state security forces in the maintenance of order and peace in the cities, towns and countryside of Spain, and their very important achievements in the struggle against terrorism. The struggle has not ended, but the initiative is now held by the security forces, and we view the future with optimism, although, Sir, we still very much feel the grief caused by the losses we have suffered among the members of the state security forces and armed forces. Their memory and their example will always be with us and will make us, if it is possible, more resolute in our aim to defend the peaceful coexistence of Spaniards and combat and eradicate the murderous violence which is bent on destroying it.

Finally, Sir, in 1981 the decision was made and the process set in motion which will lead Spain toward joining the Atlantic alliance, toward occupying the place which we should and want to occupy in the defense of the free, democratic and Christian West. I venture to say that, in defense policy and Spanish foreign policy, this decision constitutes an event of the greatest historical importance.

I have not cited the aforementioned achievements just to emphasize the action taken by the government of Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo, but above all to show how complex and difficult problems can be resolved within the normal framework of the democratic and constitutional institutions if the executive power and other powers tackle them with the resolve, calmness and courage of which you, Sir, give us such a clear and permanent example.

We have the same trust, Sir, in the military institutions, and at the moment I am thinking especially of those which personify military justice and which now have a noble and delicate task. In any state of law, respect for the law and justice is the best guarantee for the state itself and for peace and good order in the social life of the entire people.

It has become customary on this occasion for the minister of defense to set out before you some of the problems facing the armed forces or which are related to them. I shall begin with relations between the armed forces and the political power which have been of special interest since the creation of the Ministry of Defense and since its political leadership has been in the hands of civilians. It is for me to speak about this subject today because the post which I hold presents me with this responsibility and this honor. I say this without being egotistic, but perhaps with the feeling of modesty and emulation which is produced by daily living with the men of arms. As you well know, they continuously practice, individually and collectively, the cult of honor, generosity, loyalty and other virtues and put personal ambition beyond material interests and even individual ideals, whether these be political or otherwise. This feeling of emulation, which is inspired by working with military men and the aim of which is the good of Spain, increases the pride of carrying out the mission itself and gives me the necessary stimulus and security to fulfill this mission and to try by all possible means not to disappoint those who have placed their trust in me.

You, Sir, are above the problem because, as the constitution says, you are the head of state, the symbol of its unity and permanence, and it is for you to arbitrate and moderate the regular functioning of its institutions. Furthermore, by the constitutional text itself and by the royal ordinances, you hold the supreme command of the armed forces, which are devoted exclusively to the service of the fatherland. With this as the starting point, Sir, and under your very high mission, we have to distinguish who has command over the armed forces and who has command in the armed forces. It is the constitutional texts themselves and the laws in force which contain the basic logic of this relationship, such, moreover, as it is practiced and institutionalized in all the Western democracies, and which, as I understand them, make the problem clear. Command over the armed forces pertains in our system to the government, because this directs the civil and military administration and the defense of the state. And with greater precision the organic law which regulates the basic criteria of national defense and military organization -- distinguishing between defense policy, which is more wide-ranging and general, and military policy -- establishes that the prime minister directs and coordinates the action of this command in defense matters. The minister of defense is responsible for the immediate organization and coordination of defense policy and for the execution of military policy, which determines the organization, training and modernization of military power constituted basically by the army, the navy, and the air force. The political power for the fulfillment of his duties is aided by two collegial bodies -- the Defense Council and the joint chiefs of staff. The latter, which is contained organically in the Ministry of Defense, is dependent on the prime minister who exercises his authority via the minister of defense except in those matters which he expressly reserves for himself.

But in the armed forces command is exercised through the natural chain of command, and thus the law says that the chiefs of staff of the army, navy and the air force exercise military command in their respective branches of the armed forces under the authority of the minister of defense.

It is possible that in some instances these collegial and personal institutions on the edge of the line dividing "command over" from "command in" the armed forces, might give rise to some doubts or problems concerning their functioning, but should this occur, it is you, Sir, with your constitutional role as arbiter and moderator and as supreme commander of the armed forces, who is the guarantee that any doubts or problems will be successfully resolved. I believe, Sir, that it would be appropriate here to point out that what is set out by the constitution in this regard does not respond to an arbitrary notion or circumstantial consideratons of the moment. If the distinction between "command over" and "command in" the armed forces is understood and applied correctly, there will not be inappropriate political interference in what is strictly military or military interference in the political order. And, Sir, much less so if under the daily exercise of your royal role as arbiter and moderator, we can identify and reassimilate those people who do not strictly respect the rules. To achieve this as minister of defense is my first objective, and in achieving it I have been aided, and will continue to be aided, by those virtues of the military class to which I previously referred.

Sir, the armed forces and those of state security are part of the people; they are part of the people which bears arms and which is organized in a discipline hierarchy and whose raison d'etre lies in the defense of the people who form the human basis of the fatherland just as the territory is its physical base. The people organized in terms of family, economic, cultural and juridical relations constitutes society. Something which is an important problem and a permanent aim is to obtain an interrelationship between the military and civilian society.

The complex period of change through which we are living to which I have referred, and the recent events which have affected the armed forces have in some cases provoked among the media greater curiosity about the attention to the problems and activities of the military -- curiosity and attention which is not always fair and unprejudiced and is sometimes malicious. The military has then felt itself antagonized and deeply irritated if not actually wounded.

This problem of relations between the military and civilian society is inherent in the constitutional and democratic state in which we live. Common efforts require the military to adjust to and accommodate the greater levels of freedom of expression which are guaranteed to the media by the constitution; and the media should treat military matters with balance, sincerity and fairness and always with the respect due to the lofty mission entrusted to the armed forces. It is the task of justice to correct deviations and errors which occur.

The recent meetings facilitated by the Ministry of Defense between professional military men and professional workers in the media show that this situation, like in all others, can be improved considerably if both sides approach the meetings seriously and sincerely and with the loyal intention of overcoming the problems for the sake of peaceful coexistence among all Spaniards.

While dealing with this subject of relations between the armed forces and civilian society I do not wish to avoid mentioning the certain degree of isolation of professional military man which can arise from such factors as how units are deployed, particularly army units, the housing provided for the military, the question of pay or that of accommodation after retirement. All these matters, Sir, must be given urgent close attention by the Ministry of Defense, this year. And on these problems we need to know that they are to be examined and tackled quite quickly, though the process of solving them will be implemented over several years because that is the nature of things as we are dealing with a situation which is long estabished and because financial resources, needed for every change, are not unlimited.

The armed forces, Sir, which have the military defense of Spain as their raison d'etre, need to continually increase their operational effectiveness. We have plans for modernization, of our weapon systems and our military organization, which will be carried out with readjustments for situations that may arise at any time. When the new plan -- the law for financing which will be sent to the Cortes, once it is approved by the government in the near future -- is finalized we will have an army which is better and more effectively armed, a Navy with more powerful warships and an air force with more modern aircraft to replace those which are already becoming obsolete. But the modernization of arms, the means of war, the reorganization of units and the change in the deployment of the army are not enough to make the armed forces fully effective -- armed forces the fundamental value of which, it has often been said, is their men. The values which have to be asked of military men in this age are not only moral and combative ones, which are fortunately plentiful in our people. It is also necessary to attain levels of greater professional ability together with this higher level of organization.

In speaking about modernization and reorganization it is necessary to do so within our anticipated and forthcoming NATO membership. I said previously Sir, that this was an historic event in Spanish foreign and defense policy.

Sir, in this sphere of defense policy and military policy we face a complex task -- complex because problems of different kinds arise which range from the modernization of means and procedures to the problems of housing, medical care and, generally, the social problems of the armed forces; complex, moreover, because these problems arise at a time of great changes in the world, the world of which we are a part, and also at a time of profound internal changes in Spain. In a very few years the sociopolitical change has been vast. It is a change which has been endorsed and desired by our people and which occurred in the middle of a very grave world crisis which at times tends to overshadow our achievements. It is a change which has been possible to carry out in peace and without any more interruptions to this peace than those brought about by terrorism, an evil which we also share with the majority of, if not all, Western countries. Peace, I repeat, has been possible because we live, and this must not be forgotten, in a parliamentary and democratic monarchy and because we have you as our king.

In these historic times, which are complex and difficult, there is a greater need to have clear objectives and clear means and instruments to achieve them. It is now, Sir, that there is the greatest need for clarity of ideas and courage and perseverance to translate them into deeds and reality. The armed forces, Sir, as you know better than anyone, have a very clear objective. It is set out in the royal ordinances. The raison d'etre of the armed forces is the military defense of Spain and their mission is to guarantee the sovereignty and independence of the fatherland, to defend territorial integrity and the constitutional order. This mission has to be fulfilled by following the orders of their natural commanders under the political leadership and authority of the legitimate government and, as is set out by Article 2 of the Royal Ordinances, under the supreme command of the king. Spain, Sir, is in the very heart of the armed forces. It is their raison d'etre. The fatherland is an integral part of the life of each of their members and in order to serve the fatherland the armed forces will be a disciplined institution which has a hierarchy and is united -- characteristics, as the royal ordinances say, which are indispensable for the achievement of the maximum effectiveness of their actions. The discipline of our armed forces is enviable, worthy of the fatherland which they serve and of the people which creates and maintains them. I am able to say this with the security of someone who is continually receiving evidence of it and this, Sir, in spite of certain appearances, of certain insidious actions which, at times hiding behind anonymity and deceitfulness, aim to upset this discipline, because, while some employ concrete and purposeful deeds with malicious intentions and destabilizing aims, they have to reach the conclusion that the errors which occurred during the past year only served to underline what malicious extremists are trying to hide. Sir, I believe that just as malicious as those who directly attack the armed forces are those who try to manipulate them by luring them with false flattery.

The true measure of discipline, though it may seem paradoxical, is created by the infringements against it. Perhaps I would be less sure of that in our armed forces if events had not occurred which enabled the virtues of the overwhelming and vast majority of their members to be put to the test. It has been said that the important thing in judging the discipline of the military institution is not the infringements committed against it, which are inevitable in such an ordered and discipline institution, but how the military community in which they occur faces up to them and overcomes them. If it is tests, and above all great tests, which permit the strength of a virtue to be gauged, our armed forces, in the midst of a time of insidious temptation, are affirming in their conduct and in the correction of their deviations every day that discipline, which is basic to the armed forces and a condition of their very existence, is lived and maintained at its highest level. Sir, I should like to say here that discipline and honor, which every member of the military serves, can never be set against each other because they are always united by the sense of the fulfillment of duty. Duty in the military profession is fulfilled above all else. It would be appropriate to cite here Article 25 of the Royal Ordinances which says: In order to live the military profession a pure vocation is necessary, one which will be developed along with the habits of discipline and self-denial until the high level of devotion to the career of arms is achieved which vocation itself demands.

I now say that it will also be an historic event for the organization and training of our armed forces, and, not, Sir, because as some believe -- in my opinion mistakenly -- it will mean that our armed forces will learn techniques or methods of operation which they do not know, but because it will mean a new concept of their activity in relation to other Western armies in a common defense task which will frequently demand that they make the most of the possibilities for cooperation and coordination, and moreover, because of the multiplying effect it will have, of the knowledge of new techniques of each and every one of the members of the alliance in defense matters.

The government to which I belong, and I personally, am convinced that Spain's entry into NATO is not only beneficial to us, but also to peace on the European continent and, therefore, to peace in the world. But this does not mean that our entry into the alliance will transform or transfer the raison d'etre of our armed forces, the military defense of Spain. What it means is that we are looking to complete and build up our defensive capability because in the world in which we live no nation can ensure its own defense in isolation in the face of potential threats by a possible enemy. We need to have friends and allies in the modern world, but the friends will be firmer and the alliances more secure the more effective and powerful our armed forces are.

But all these decisions in domestic and foreign policy mean something more -- they mean, Sir, that under the parliamentary monarchy of which you are the symbol and personification, Spain will complete its social and political development and will take its rightful place among the most advanced Western countries. Together with other foreign policy actions which are under way, it means a break with Spanish secular isolation and, therefore, our full integration into a world in which technology and the evolution of means of transport are leading us inexorably toward a closer and more interdependent coexistence. It means the maximum development of our possibilities as a nation, which throughout its history was able to create other nations which speak our language and share our beliefs and culture. It means, in short, international recognition of the maturity of the Spanish society and nation.

Sir, many and great are the problems we have to face but equally great are the assets with which to tackle and resolve them. The greatest of all is undoubtedly a people which in uneasy circumstances of change and crisis has proven its maturity and sense, its unity toward its institutions and to you, Sir, who are the symbol of the state and king. These armed forces and security forces are themselves a part of the Spanish people.

For me, Sir, it has been a great honor to speak on their behalf before you, and in their name I can tell you that they will overcome all difficulties, all doubts, and any adverse occurrences because their raison d'etre is Spain, because Spain is their goal and their ambition, because in the name of Spain they identify with the missions which the constitution assigns to them, and because Spain and the Spanish people represent an intellectual and emotional identity in the heart of every soldier. And so they are identified with the people and it is the people which they serve. The defense of the people's peace and freedom is the essence of their vocation and total dedication.

You, Sir, are for all of us the symbol of the state, a guarantee of its permanence. The armed forces are proud of your supreme command and the example which you provide, which you give to all of us with your courage, your wisdom and your love and tireless dedication to Spain and the people of Spain.

Once again, Sir, on behalf of the armed forces, I extend greetings. Thank you, sir. At your orders, Sir.

GONZALEZ COMMENTS FAVORABLY ON TALKS WITH HAIG

LD102114 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1800 GMT 10 Jan 82

Our correspondent Hector Arenas caught Felipe Gonzalez when he arrived back at Barajas airport:

[Arenas] When Felipe Gonzalez arrived back here this morning after his meeting in Washington with Alexander Haig, he voiced his optimism that a climate of detente might begin to prevail in relation to the United States and the groups in conflict in some Central American countries, and particularly Cuba, so as to facilitate dialogue and the discussion of peaceful negotiated settlements, even in the difficult case of the civil war in El Salvador. Such a way out of the problems which might make it possible to avoid immediate military and economic blockades of Cuba and Nicaragua, for instance, or the transformation of Central America into another Vietnam seems to be possible in the light of the new willingness for dialogue which Felipe Gonzalez found when he met the man in charge of President Reagan's foreign policy. On this subject he said:

[Begin recording] The most interesting feature of the trip was to find that, even though our views differ on how some problems -- El Salvador, for instance -- should be solved, there is at least understanding of one another's positions. Such a thing is not always easy to find when sides take up antagonistic positions. But I did not have that feeling. As I see it, our positions are different but they are not antagonistic, one to the other, and so not totally incompatible. Thus I believe for instance, and I said this outright from the knowledge I personally have of the real situation, that the elections being prepared for in El Salvador in March are a fiction, there is no real foundation of real facts which might permit one to believe that this will provide the solution to the bloodbath taking place there, because there does not exist any guarantee that the electoral process will take place in democratic conditions of sufficient credibility. [end recording]

[Arenas] Felipe Gonzalez also once again criticized the government for what he called its lack of a concrete foreign policy program, and in connection with Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo's recent statement of intention to move away somewhat from U.S. positions and toward European positions on international matters he said here at the airport that he will be returning to Washington during the spring to continue what he called this dialogue of getting to know one another and, in cooperation with the Madrid government, to deal with issues outstanding between the United States and Spain, especially in the economic and military fields.

BOMB EXPLODES AT GOVERNING PARTY'S HEADQUARTERS

[Excerpt] At about 0315 a small homemade device exploded at the headquarters of the Union of the Democratic Center Party in the Madrid district of Moratalaz. There were no casualties and no damage. At the same time a caller to the offices of the EFE agency announced that the explosion would take place. The caller also said that the action had been carried out to demand the release of the patriots under arrest in Seville -- he was referring to the arrest of ultrarightwingers there.

SOVIET CSCE DELEGATION HEAD TO VISIT 12 JAN

[Text] Deputy Foreign Minister Leonid Ilichev, head of the Soviet CSCE delegation, will arrive in Finland on 12 January. During his 3-day visit he will hold talks with representatives of the Finnish Foreign Ministry on matters related to the CSCE followup conference in Madrid. On the Finnish side the talks will be headed by Secretary of State Matti Tuovinen. Ambassador Richard Mueller, head of the Finnish CSCE delegation will also attend the talks. The CSCE conference in Madrid will continue in the first half of February. Before the conference representatives of the Finnish delegation will have bilateral talks with representatives of other countries too. The neutral and nonaligned countries submitted a joint proposal before the Christmas recess and it is hoped that it will lead to a successful conclusion of the followup conference.

WIRTEN SUBMITS STATE BUDGET PROPOSALS TO RIKSDAG

[Text] Minister of Economy and Budget Rolf Wirten today submitted the state budget proposals to the Riksdag. The budget is characterized by hard work and saving. This is the second year in succession that the government is compelled to present a budget with a record deficit. The deficit is more than 82.5 billion kroner, or about 65 billion markkaa. The budget totals 251.5 billion kroner, or over 196 billion markkaa. Interest on the national debt is now for the first time the biggest single expense item: it amounts to over 39 billion kroner. This exceeds by 2 billion kroner the traditionally highest single expense item -- national pensions.

Minister Wirten has not estimated the inflation rate during the coming budgetary year but he hopes to be able to limit inflation to 6-8 percent. This might be made easier by a possible revaluation of the krona. Activities to promote exports are granted 16 billion kroner more than before. Defense expenditure will amount to a basic 18 billion kroner, or 14 billion markkaa. This is 7.5 percent of the entire budget. The final decision on the total defense expenditure will be made in the spring after the completion of the defense plan for the next 5 years.

According to the government decision, the share of development aid will be 1 percent of the gross national product. Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten proposes that 6.2 billion kroner should be earmarked for development aid. This is an increase of 500 million kroner compared with last year. In its draft budget, the government proposes a rise in the oil tax. Fuel tax will be raised by 7 oere a liter. In the present difficult economic situation, housing production must also be reduced, during the budgetary year the construction of less than 40,000 new dwellings can be started. Last year the figure was 44,000.

RED CROSS TO SEND MORE SUPPLIES TO POLAND

[Text] Stockholm, 10 Jan (AFP) -- A nationwide collection for Poland organized by the Swedish Red Cross has netted 8.2 million krona in cash (1.47 million dollars), 1,500 tons of clothing, 5,000 blankets and 200,000 pairs of shoes, the organization's headquarters here announced today. Beginning January 21, the Red Cross will be shipping relief gifts to Poland at the rate of three truck convoys a week. Distribution will be handled by the Polish Red Cross. From next month, the Swedish Red Cross will also be shipping food, medical supplies, and clothing to Poland as they arrive here from the Canadian Red Cross.

AGREEMENT REACHED ON REOPENING GIBRALTAR BORDER

[By Tom McMullan and David Healy, PA diplomatic staff]

[Text] The Spanish Government agreed today to re-open the border with Gibraltar which has been shut since they closed it in 1969. Normal traffic between Spain and the Rock will resume on April 20. The announcement of the re-opening of the frontier came from the Spanish prime minister, Senor Calvo-Sotelo, during talks with Mrs Thatcher at Downing Street.

On the day the border re-opens, talks will begin in Lisbon between the Spanish and British Governments over the remaining differences between the two sides over the British colony. A British Government spokesman gave an assurance after the talks that the status of Gibraltar would not be changed. The spokesman said: "We made it absolutely clear we stand by the commitment in the 1969 Lisbon agreement on Gibraltar that there will be no change in the sovereignty of Gibraltar against the democratically-expressed wishes of the people of Gibraltar."

Today's agreement on the border will take care of some of the Spanish grievances which led to it being closed. In particular, the frontier will now be open 24 hours a day and seven days a week so that the Spanish workers can come and go at all times. Workers from Spain will have the same rights in Gibraltar as other non-EEC workers. Spain is due to become a member of the Common Market in 1984, and then they will have exactly the same rights as all other Common Market nationals.

The other main subjects discussed by the two leaders today were Spain's entry to the EEC and its accession to NATO from the beginning of this year, which now only remains to be formally endorsed by the governments of the other NATO countries. Britain has strongly supported both moves. Mrs Thatcher said after the meeting: "My talks with Senor Calvo-Sotelo have been wide-ranging, very friendly and valuable. I greatly welcome this progress and I am sure it opens up a new chapter in Anglo-Spanish relations. Our relations with Spain are developing in other ways and I warmly welcome Spain's entry into NATO and the EEC. This will strengthen the alliance and the community, and democracy in Europe." Over a lunch which Mrs Thatcher hosted for the Spanish prime minister at No. 10, she said that four words summed up the relationship between Spain and Britain -- "cooperation, friendship, freedom and democracy." Senor Calvo-Sotelo said the snow which had delayed his arrival by half-an-hour had been "unable to prevent a warm welcome and closer relations."

[By Tom McMullan and David Healy, PA diplomatic staff]

[Text] London, 8 Jan (PA) -- Spain is to re-open her border with Gibraltar, but the main issue of dispute with Britain -- sovereignty remains unresolved. The reopening on April 20 of the frontier, closed in 1969, was announced by Spanish Prime Minister Mr Calvo-Sotelo during talks with Mrs Thatcher at Downing Street today and welcomed by Gibraltar's chief minister. Both British and Spanish leaders were at pains to emphasise the warm spirits of the talks -- Mrs Thatcher described them as "very friendly and valuable," and Mr Calvo-Sotelo spoke of "a new chapter" in Anglo-Spanish relations. But it was clear, that neither side had budged on the major issue, with Britain giving a "no status change" assurance and Mr Calvo-Sotelo emphasising at a press conference later that Spain's claim to sovereignty over Gibraltar still stood.

On the day the border opens the two countries will begin talks in Lisbon in a bid to patch up remaining differences. Mr Calvo-Sotelo ended the press conference by stating that he saw Gibraltar in terms of "the restitution of Spanish full sovereignty and territorial integrity." There had been another revealing moment earlier, when he corrected his translator, who had said that the border would be opened and all restrictions cancelled. The Spanish prime minister substituted the word "suspend" for "cancel," saying both words in English were represented by one Spanish word. The implication of his intervention was that if the negotiations did not succeed, the blockade would be re-imposed. But when Mr Calvo-Sotelo was asked if this was the meaning, he replied: "You start from a very pessimistic hypothesis."

A Downing Street spokesman said Britain's pledge to Gibraltar -- no change against the wishes of the majority of the inhabitants -- still applied. It now remains to be seen whether the new negotiations can produce a sophisticated formula which will satisfy the Spanish claim and the desire of the majority of the people of Gibraltar to remain British. Some observers feel a change in Gibraltar's own internal government arrangements, with the possibility of becoming part of Spain over a lengthy time-scale, will be one of the options considered. In Gibraltar, Chief Minister Sir Joshua Hassan greeted the border's re-opening and said most Gibraltarians would welcome it. "We must now do our best to ensure a smooth transition to normality after 13 years of closure and 18 years' restricted movement," he added. Although the rock's 29,000 inhabitants were still wholly pro-British, the re-opening would allow people much more freedom. Many families split up by the 1969 border shutdown would now be re-united on a day-to-day basis. But Spaniards hoping job prospects on the rock would open up with the frontier could be in for a disappointment, said Sir Joshua. "With the run-down of the naval dockyard, job prospects are not good," he said.

ARCHBISHOP SENDS 'HEARTFELT' MESSAGE TO POLAND

[Text] The Catholic archbishop of Westminister, Cardinal Basil Hume, today sent a "heartfelt" message to Poland pledging greater European efforts in providing aid -- material and spiritual. Writing as president of the Council of European Bishops Conferences, he said: "The whole of free Europe watches with growing dismay the continuation of martial law within your country with its grim consequences for the whole of your people. In 1966, Poland celebrated its millenium as a Christian country at the heart of Europe. Your history, your culture, your faith and your human values are witness to the one heritage which you, as Europeans, share with us.

"In this time of crisis, you are more than ever a member of the European family. You live in a political and economic system different from ours, but we share the same faith and the same hope in Jesus Christ." In a statement issued by the Catholic Information Office Cardinal Hume declared: "If you have need of Europe, even more does Europe have need of you." He added: "I am asking the bishops of Europe to intensify their efforts to bring you all possible aid, material as well as spiritual."

WEST SHOULD 'STOP BACKBITING' ON POLAND

[Editorial: "The West and Poland"]

[Excerpts] Chancellor Schmidt's meeting with President Reagan has produced a dog's breakfast of reactions. Herr Schmidt now admits that Russia is responsible for what is happening in Poland. But the fuzziness in the West's reaction has not been removed. President Reagan has been insisting that a "tangible alliance response" to the Polish crisis must be made now. The Europeans have declined to institute measures against Russia though they have stopped government to government aid to Poland. They are, of course, more involved economically than is the United States. So the impression has been allowed to spread that Washington and Europe are at loggerheads. This is basically untrue. Where they appear on the surface to differ is on the best means to encourage these results. Western leaders should remove the surface differences and stop the backbiting. They can make a start at next week's NATO meeting, as Mr Haig suggested yesterday. In the meantime, Mr Haig's indication that high-level lines of communication between Washington and Moscow, including the arms-control talks, are to be kept open is welcome.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE DELEGATES COMMENT ON VISIT

[Text] Ankara, 10 Jan (AA) -- A group of delegates from the Council of Europe has favourable impressions of Turkey after two days of interviews (?and official) meetings in the capital city of Ankara. The delegates talked about their findings at a cocktail party late Saturday night.

Mr Percy Grieve, chairman of the legal affairs committee of the council, told a correspondent of the ANATOLIA news agency that he had positive impressions of the announced timetable for the restoration of democracy in Turkey. He said he believed that Turkey was on the right path. Noting that Turkey was part of Europe, the Conservative MP said: "Turkey should remain a member of the council. I believe that the parliamentary assembly will take a positive stand when the issue of Turkey's continued membership comes before the house." Mr Tom Urwin, the chairman of the political affairs committee of the council, who is a Labourite, said he personally believed that Turkey needed a constitutional revision. Such a revision, or amendment, would help to solve many of Turkey's problems. He added that Turkey was sincere in her desire to return to a democratic form of government.

Mr Bjon Elmquist, a Danish member of the parliamentary assembly of the council, told the ANATOLIA news agency that their presence in Ankara (the delegation's visit) should not be taken as meaning that the council was interfering in Turkey's internal affairs. He said: "We have no intention of interfering in your affairs. But we intend to make some recommendations in genuine good will. These two should not be mixed with, and one should not confuse these two things. The purpose of our recommendations would be to help Turkey to fulfill her obligations as a member of the Council of Europe." The Danish legislator said Turkey's head of state General Kenan Evren told them to mix with people in Turkey, to talk to the men in the streets and to learn how they feel about the way of life. "This has been a most useful proposal. But because of our tight schedule, we are unable to do so," he said.

Mr Cavaliere, an Italian Christian Democratic legislator, said he had useful talks with Mr Sadi Irmak of the Consultative Assembly and Prof Orhan Aldikacti of the Constitutional Committee. He said he had high hopes about the future of Turkey, especially about the role of the future political parties would play in the new Turkish democracy.

GREECE ACCUSED OF VIOLATING LAUSANNE AGREEMENT

[Text] Istanbul, 10 Jan (AA) -- Greece is violating the Lausanne agreements by supressing the ethnic Turkish minority in western Thrace, a conference was told Sunday. The conference, sponsored by the Solidarity Society with the Western Thracian Turks, heard one speaker as saying that ethnic Turks in western Thrace were being denied the right to engage in trade and to become factory owners while Greeks living in Turkey enjoyed widespread privileges for years. The speakers said the Turks of Greece expected to enjoy the same universal rights as enjoyed by the Greeks.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN DENIES TURKMEN 'ALLEGATIONS'

[Text] The Cyprus Government has again denied the Turkish allegations on the so-called dispatch of Greek troops to Cyprus and on the import of arms. Answering a question today, the government spokesman said the statement by Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen caused real surprise because any tension is not the outcome of actions by our side. He added: The allegations on the import of arms and the arrival of troops from Greece do not respond to reality. Furthermore, Turkmen's statement does not aid in creation of a suitable climate for progress in the intercommunal talks.

Turkish 'Threat'

NC090727 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 9 Jan 82 p 12

[Excerpts] Turkey, in a statement by Foreign Minister Turkmen, has made an open threat of military action in Cyprus. Referring to what Turkish propaganda has been spreading about the arming of the National Guard, Turkmen said that "there is no possibility of preventing the dispatch of arms through diplomatic channels." (O FILELEVTHEROS editor's note: From this it is concluded that for Turkey there is only one course open: the military one.) According to reports last night, the Cyprus Government considers the situation very serious, and it will plan a response as soon as it receives the official text of the Turkish foreign minister's statement.

According to the same reports, Greek Ambassador to Cyprus Zakharakis is leaving today for Athens for contacts with Greek Prime Minister Papandreou and Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos. No statement has been issued in connection with Zakharakis' unexpected departure.

SPOKESMAN REPLIES TO TURKMEN AEGEAN ALLEGATIONS

[Text] Referring to an interview given by Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen to ANKARA NEWS AGENCY, a government spokesman made the following statement: The Turkish press continues to fantasize about Greek claims in the Aegean or about its aggressive policy in the archipelago. Perhaps this is being done to cover up Turkish intentions. Once again we reiterate that Greece does not claim anything from anyone. In an interview with the Turkish news agency ANKA, the Turkish minister stated, among other things, that Turkey has used all means to reduce existing tension with the new Greek Government of Papandreou. In the excerpts of the interview that were reported by the ASSOCIATED PRESS, Turkmen is alleged to have stated that he would like to keep hoping that 1982 will bring about a reduction in tension with Greece. However, he added that under the existing conditions he believes that there is no justification in believing that the Turks should continue to be optimistic.

GREECE NOTIFIES MEETING OF TURKISH CYPRUS CHARGES

[Text] Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos has availed himself of the opportunity in Brussels to hand over to his NATO counterparts a letter pointing out the latest statement by Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen on the Cyprus issue. Mr Kharalambopoulos refers to Mr Turkmen's allegations that Greece has sent arms to Cyprus and draws the attention of the NATO foreign ministers to that point of Turkmen's statement according to which, after such a process has begun, there would be no possibility of preventing it through diplomatic channels.

Mr Kharalambopoulos stresses that the allegations about Greek military aid to Cyprus are completely unfounded and, on the contrary, there is evidence that the Turkish occupation forces in Cyprus have recently been bolstered both in the number of men and materiel. In conclusion Mr Kharalambopoulos stresses that Mr Turkmen's statement contains a clear threat both against Cyprus and Greece.

PAPANDREOU EXPLAINS STAND ON POLAND COMMUNIQUE

[Text] Prime Minister Papandreou has made the following statement:

The Greek Government has informed its NATO partners of its position that the condemnation, of a Cold War nature, of the whole of one of the systems which today governs a coexisting alliance would damage the continuation of the climate of detente and dialogue within which the Geneva talks are being conducted on the reduction of nuclear arms. The Greek Government has also let it be known that it could not accept sanctions against Poland and the other Eastern countries. Such sanctions, in addition to their repercussions on the economies of small states such as Greece, would not contribute to improving the situation in Poland but rather would worsen both the situation in Poland and East-West relations.

For these reasons, although Greece participated in the issuing of the joint communique which denounces martial law in Poland, with all its repercussions, and which warns the Soviet Union against any intervention in that country, Greece has disagreed and made reservations on a section of the communique's Paragraph 3 as well as on those paragraphs which concern sanctions. This Greek reservation was accepted by all the other NATO partners.

[Text] After the NATO communique was issued a government spokesman pointed out that this is the first time NATO has accepted reservations by a member country in a communique, in this case by Greece. The foreign ministers participating in the conference allowed a mention of those points on which Greece disagrees. In essence the possibility was granted -- a fact that never happened in the past -- for our country to state its reservations and objections concerning the nature of the Warsaw Pact regimes.

At the same time, the government spokesman said, during the drafting of the communique amendments proposed for some phrases by Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos were accepted so that there might be a milder formulation.

GREEK COMMUNISTS CRITICIZE ATHENS ON COMMUNIQUE

[Text] The KKE Central Committee press office has issued the following statement:

The joint communique of the NATO foreign ministers conference, with the participation of the Turkish junta, constitutes a brutal interference in the internal affairs of an independent state. It is sheer hypocrisy for the imperialists -- who are burdened with crimes against the freedom and independence of people, and who support the Turkish junta and the occupation of Cyprus territory by Turkish troops -- to appear as defenders of democratic rights.

The positive reservations made by the Greek Government on certain points of the joint communique do not negate the fact that it participated in such a Cold War conference and virtually cosigned inadmissible declarations by the imperialists.

TURKEY NOTES CONTRADICTIONS IN MEMBERS' STANDS

[Text] NATO Foreign Ministers meeting in Brussels decided to impose sanctions on Poland and the USSR in accordance with their own means. The special meeting of the NATO foreign ministers on Poland ended in Brussels today. A joint statement issued at the end of the meeting appeals to Poland to lift the martial law, free the detained persons and renew the dialogue with the church and the Solidarity trade union. The statement also appeals to the Soviet Union to avoid interfering in the internal affairs of Poland and adds that if such a development occurred, international relations would be undermined deeply.

Turkish Radio and Television correspondent Nusret Ozgul reports from Brussels that sanctions to be imposed by each country according to its own means include curtailing movement of Polish and Soviet diplomats, declining scientific and technical activities with these countries and refusing to renew extradition agreements with them.

In a statement following the special meeting of NATO foreign ministers, Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said that at the meeting he reiterated his government's views on Poland. Turkmen said that he pointed out the contradiction in efforts exerted by some NATO countries to compare the martial law in Poland with Turkey. Turkmen added that it was impossible to explain how countries which opted for aid to continue to Poland wanted aid to Turkey -- a NATO country -- to be suspended.

Turkmen, who is in Brussels for the NATO meeting, is holding bilateral contacts in Brussels. He met this morning before the NATO meeting with Belgian Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans, who is also the present chairman of the EEC ministerial council. It has been announced that relations between Turkey and the EEC were discussed during the meeting. Turkmen is expected to meet other EEC and European Parliament officials tomorrow.

GENSCHER 'WELCOMES' NATO MINISTERS' STATEMENT

[Text] Bonn, 12 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today expressly welcomed yesterday's statement in Brussels by the NATO foreign ministers, which he sees as a basis for the political strategy to overcome the Polish crisis. Genscher made this assessment of the NATO meeting at a breakfast with U.S. Senator Sam Nunn in Bonn today. Nunn, a Democrat, is one of the most influential foreign and defense experts on Capitol Hill.

BRANDT REJECTS SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR, POLAND

[Excerpt] Bonn, 12 Jan (DPA) -- On the day after the decision by NATO foreign ministers to take a tougher course on the Polish question, SPD Chairman Willy Brandt has rejected sanctions by the Federal Republic against the Soviet Union and Poland. He told newsmen in Bonn today: "I cannot see that the Federal Republic of Germany could serve a sensible aim with sanctions." Experience had shown that sanctions had only a limited effect. At the same time, Brandt praised the efforts of the Federal Government "within the bounds of reason" to contribute to as united a stance as possible by the Western alliance, which he said was "itself of high value."

Brandt said that in a letter sent last Friday, Polish head of government Wojciech Jaruzelski again assured him of the Warsaw military government's determination to continue the course of renewal. On behalf of the military government, Jaruzelski wrote, it was intended that the restrictions on civil rights would be gradually removed. Brandt said he would reply to the letter shortly and would state that the SPD did not consider the easing of martial law so far to be adequate.

Reacting to criticism at home and abroad of the SPD's restraint in condemning the Polish crisis, Brandt gave the assurance that his party's clear and consistent support for the policy of detente did not prevent the SPD from stating "what we think about the situation at a given time in the states of East Europe." It was also wrong to contend that the SPD did not realize that what happened in East Europe had to be seen in connection with a "basic joint responsibility" of the Soviet Union.

In the wake of detailed discussions on the situation in Poland by the SPD Presidium yesterday evening, Brandt renewed the appeal by his party and by the West to the Polish military government to lift martial law, free the internees and resume the dialogue with the church and with the Solidarity trade union. Brandt also reaffirmed an appeal to all SPD members to give strong support to the churches and the German Trade Union Federation in their humanitarian actions for the Polish people.

Brandt said the SPD fully supports the Federal Government's efforts to pursue a policy based on a sense of proportion and level-headedness in order to make possible a return to the path of reform. He criticised as "not so helpful" tendencies in the Federal Republic and abroad to misuse the depressing and alarming events for internal political ends.

CDU/CSU Favors Sanctions

[Excerpt] Berlin, 12 Jan (DPA) -- The CDU/CSU is in favor of sanctions against the Soviet Union and the Warsaw military government if the situation in Poland does not change.

At its meeting in Berlin's Reichstag building today, the CDU/CSU parliamentary party unanimously adopted a resolution to this effect which it will put to the vote in the Bundestag on Thursday, the day on which parliament is to debate a government statement by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on the situation in Poland.

U.S. SANCTIONS TO AFFECT GAS PIPELINE PROJECT

[Excerpt] Frankfurt, 11 Jan (DPA) -- The economic sanctions against the USSR imposed by the U.S. administration are causing complications in the completion of the AEG's [FRG company awarded contract to supply turbines for USSR-FRG gas pipeline] contract for 47 gas turbines for the new gas pipeline from western Siberia to Europe. The company said today that they [the sanctions] will apply to the supply of components from the U.S. company, General Electric, for the turbines which AEG-KANIS is to produce. AEG-Telefunken is now holding talks with the U.S. company to clarify the situation and on the measures that will follow. These were not explained in detail.

SCHMIDT, MITTERRAND TO HOLD PARIS TALKS 13 JAN

[Excerpt] Bonn, 11 Jan (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will visit French President Francois Mitterrand on Wednesday for summit talks arranged on short notice. The meeting is described by Government Spokesman Kurt Becker in Bonn today as a working meeting in a small circle such as has "always been arranged" when the situation has warranted it. Without an agenda, Schmidt and Mitterrand want to discuss the situation in Poland and its effects within the framework of East-West relations. Becker said that after having dinner in Paris, Schmidt would return to Bonn during the night. He would be presenting a government statement to the Bundestag the next day.

POLAND REPORTED INTERESTED IN RESCHEDULING DEBTS

[Excerpt] Frankfurt, 12 Jan (DPA) -- Poland has expressed to the Dresdner Bank its unchanged interest in the early signing of the 1981 agreement on rescheduling its $2.4 billion (DM5.4 billion) debt. Polish Government representatives stated this to Hans Friderichs, spokesman for the board of the Dresdner Bank AG (Frankfurt), who paid a 1-day visit to Warsaw yesterday at the invitation of Polish Finance Minister Marian Krzak, and President of the Bank Handlowy Marian Minkiewicz. The Dresdner Bank said today it had drawn the attention of the Poles to the fact that the condition for signing the moratorium was payment of the outstanding interest. It has been learned from circles among the 500 Western creditor banks that Poland has meanwhile paid part of the interest arrears for the last quarter of 1981, which totals $350 million, to some banks and that the interest arrears now amounts to less than $300 million.

RED CROSS SENDS RELIEF SUPPLIES TO POLAND

[Text] Kiel, 10 Jan (DPA) -- A new relief convoy for Poland with more than 100 tons of goods is being assembled by the Schleswig-Holstein regional association of the German Red Cross (DRK). The consignment is to be shipped on 30 trucks by ferry to Gdynia on 20 January and will be accompanied by a staff of 60. The DRK has been using donations and its own funds to gather medical supplies, children's food, foodstuffs and clothing for over 8,000 people in 25 children's homes and hospitals in 23 towns in northern Poland. Among the articles are 32 tons of beans, 15 tons of mixed fruit, fresh fruit, 15 tons of vegetables, 10,000 tins of tuna fish, 3 tons of margarine, 2 tons of biscuits and 2.5 tons of ready-packed parcels.

PRESIDENT ALLUDES TO VISIT TO GDR IN 1983

[Text] Osnabruck, 8 Jan (DPA) -- President Karl Carstens does not rule out the possibility of visiting the GDR in 1983 on the occasion of Luther's anniversary celebrations. This was stated by Carstens in an interview with the NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG (Saturday issue). He emphatically appealed to FRG citizens to not let the human contacts with the Germans in the GDR be even more disrupted. Everybody who is in a position to do so should visit the GDR as often as possible. The increased compulsory currency exchange requirements represent an obstacle which has to be taken seriously and it is hoped that there will be an improvement in this context.

Carstens expressed the view that German-U.S. friendship cannot be seriously affected even by temporary encumbrances. Over the decades there have been real as well as imaginary upsets in relations, the president went on. However, they cannot cause lasting harm to the "basic relations," which rest on the common concept of human rights, the freedom of the individual and democracy. "I am convinced that this will also be the case in the future," Carstens said.

He described the affiliation with NATO as an issue involving the very existence of the FRG. He stressed that the ostpolitik pursued by the FRG for 12 years was based on the unanimous general conviction about Bonn's firm integration with the alliance and with the EEC. This must also be the unalterable condition of the future German ostpolitik. The president went on to express the hope that despite the critical situation in Poland progress will be made at the Geneva talks on the limitation of Eurostrategic arms.

SPOKESMAN DISCOUNTS REPORTS ON EXCHANGE RATE

[Excerpt] Bonn, 11 Jan (DPA) -- The Federal Government today again underlined its strong interest in a lowering of the minimum amount of currency to be exchanged by Western visitors which was drastically raised by the GDR 15 months ago. Against a background of continuing speculation about such a step by the GDR, Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told newsmen in Bonn today: "The Federal Government would very much welcome it if something happened soon." Becker described press reports that East Berlin would soon reduce the compulsory exchange amount as "speculation," and added: "There is no cause for the Federal Government to say anything different." Bonn government circles also added that there was no reason, such as unofficial hints from the GDR leaders, to expect an imminent adjustment of the minimum compulsory exchange amount.

BOELLING MEETS WITH HONECKER AT RECEPTION

["Conversation" between Erich Honecker, chairman of the GDR Council of State, and State Secretary Klaus Boelling, head of the permanent FRG representation in the GDR, on the occasion of the diplomatic corps New Year reception in East Berlin on 10 January -- recorded]

[Text] [Boelling] The meeting [between Honecker and Schmidt] provided the first opportunity for you and our federal chancellor to thoroughly learn in a couple of days about each other's way of thinking.

[Honecker] You are quite right. You know, regarding the matter of my intense talks with the federal chancellor, I would like to say that these talks revealed that we have points of contact in many issues which will contribute to the further development of relations between the GDR and the FRG.

I would like to tell you that I was elated that on the Guestrow balcony — which according to some of your media was much too protected, although this visit was originally not in the program -- the great effect of the earlier talks was demonstrated.

[Boelling] It is now important for the citizens in your GDR and in our country to really experience expanded perspectives from the intensive talks you recently had with the federal chancellor; it is important for the people to really feel this in your country and in ours...

[Honecker--interrupting] Yes.

[Boelling] ...so that something will come of this.

[Honecker] Yes, and the most important thing is naturally that both German states, as we said or as we said in our agreed statement, that the most important thing is to preserve peace. [sentence as heard]

[Boelling] Yes, agreed.

[Honecker] If we succeed in preserving peace, we will at the same time create the basis for the improvement of relations between the GDR and the FRG.

[Boelling] The federal chancellor fully agrees with that, Mr Honecker. The special peace duty of both German states, as Mr Hager and I have just said, must be legitimized by a situation in which the Germans deal with each other reasonably.

[Honecker] Yes, naturally.

[Boelling] And quite a few possibilities certainly exist which have not yet been exploited.

[Honecker] Yes, naturally there are a lot of matters and things we have not exploited, as you said. But you will agree that we are jointly committed to ensuring that no war emanates again from German soil, and that both German states....

[Boelling--interrupting] Yes, that is clear.

[Honecker] ...are not turned into a nuclear wasteland.

LEISTER DOUBTS FUTURE OF FRG - FRANCE TANK PROJECT

PM111029 Paris LE FIGARO in French 21 Dec 81 p 7

[Pierre Darcourt report]

[Excerpt] West German Secretary of State for Defense Klaus Leister had a meeting in Bonn with the French Defense Journalists Association, chaired by our journalist Pierre Darcourt, and spoke to them about various problems: the U.S.-Soviet arms control negotiations in Geneva, his government's "realistic and cautious" stance on the situation in Poland, "a country which has been included in the USSR's direct sphere of influence since 1945," and cooperation between France and the FRG in the arms sphere.

Questioned on the future French-German combat tank, K.S. Leister suggested that the agreement drawn up by Chancellor H. Schmidt and President Giscard d'Estaing, then signed by the two countries' defense ministers on 5 February 1980, "had little chance of being inplemented."

"The problem," he explained, "will be examined in spring 1982 by the parliamentary defense commission." This commission has great influence and the minister cannot readily reject its opinion. If need be the plan will be debated in parliament.

The deputies, who are at present very conscious of military spending controls, will "scrutinize" the matter very strictly.

There is a marked gap between the French and German timetables, the young secretary of state stressed. France would like to have a new battle tank in the nineties. By 1985 the Germans, however, will be able to count on the Leopard II, an armored vehicle of excellent quality which, with a few minor alterations, will be able to be continued until 1995.

PAPER VIEWS 'RIGHTEOUS PEOPLE IN WEST'

[Hans-Herbert Gaebel commentary]

[Text] U.S. and German politicians have tried very hard not to let their differences of opinion on Poland get out of control, but they were not able to achieve full harmony. The media in the United States and other Western countries, which are not bound to follow diplomatic rules, will ensure that what they call German laxness, cowardice and egotism will continue to be criticized. The Germans are evading confrontation with Moscow -- that is probably still the basic mood. In addition, U.S. commentators have once again discovered the mysterious German soul. This issue is too beautiful to disappear quickly.

Well, let us assume the Germans would be prepared to join very punitive action of the U.S. Government -- something the Bonn government probably cannot avoid anyway if the situation in Poland does not improve soon, and if new and sharper U.S. sanctions then follows and there is irresistable pressure on the Federal Government.

Bonn would then follow the U.S. leader. But in such a case it would not be long -- if the punitive policy were strong and persistent enough -- until cold war fully returned to Central Europe. Even if they wanted to, Bonn, Moscow, Warsaw and certainly East Berlin could not prevent such a punitive policy from getting out of control. Particularly inflexible people in the United States and elsewhere go as far as to demand that the Federal Republic close its ports to Soviet ships, rip the gas deal contract to pieces and reduce economic relations with Moscow to a minimum. We are allegedly so lax because we want to continue business as usual.

Central Europe is still the most sensitive area of the world because the two blocs are facing each other here directly. Completely forgotten is the fact that at the same time it is the most secure area, paradoxically for the same reason. If the world powers can afford to have very strong disputes without fear of sliding into an uncontrollable collision, this has very much to do with the fact that there is a buffer in the middle of Europe. It is not very thick and not at all indestructible, but so far it has been flexible enough. Eliminating this carefully built-in buffer in the name of understandable and justified but also intoxicating disgust could be fatal, first of all for the Germans but then also for our Western partners.

The Soviet Union and its East German helpers have sufficient imagination and opportunities to produce endless crises in Central Europe without formally breaking the respective treaties. Not only the egotistic Germans would have to pay for this, but also the protective powers of Berlin, first of all the United States -- and it is most unlikely that this would help the tortured Polish people.

If the at least somewhat excited and hostile polemics of the U.S. and French media did not exist, it would probably be possible to discuss more soberly than hitherto the sense or senslessness of sanctions and real help for Poland. But it is probably no coincidence that the most radical critics of West German policy, in addition to maintaining that detente policy has come to an end without having achieved anything, link their death sentence with a strong blow against "mysterious" Germany, with every possible prejudice appearing again.

More must be boiling there than just acute irritation over West German stubbornness. For three decades the Federal Republic was a most agreeable ally, despite repetitious differenes of opinion with this or that ally. It has always tried to please more or less everybody. This can be felt again, but the claim of the righteous people in the West that they are the only ones who can see matters correctly is so strong that it hurts the core of German interests, which cannot be fully identical with those of other states let alone with the aims of the world power the United States for which Poland is only a part of the fight for power with the Soviet Union.

This has nothing to do with German unreliability or the always seething German soul. It is the consequence of facts established in the past 10 to 15 years in Central Europe with the more or less enthusiastic blessings of the allies, not only to the advantage of the Germans but also of others, even if they do not want to or cannot realize it today any more.

The Western world agrees that the Polish people should be helped. The fact that a quarrel over the best ways to achieve this aim has almost created a crisis of the alliance should force the whole alliance to seriously consider the common and different interests and on ways to find common ground between both of them. More must happen than an excited search for a scapegoat. if no success is achieved, the Polish tragedy -- certainly a milestone on the way to the cemetary of contemporary socialism -- will also be an omen of the limited duration of the Western community.

DIE WELT VIEWS NATO CONFERENCE ON POLAND

[Ruediger Monuac commentary]

[Text] NATO has obviously realized the essential thing. Instead of quarreling in its own house, it has rallied together in Brussel standing shoulder to shoulder -- to the extent it can -- regarding developments in P d. The alliance has managed after all -- with all partner states agreeing unanimously to accuse the Soviet Union of trying to direct Poland's fate with a strong hand in accordance with the Brezhnev doctrine. The 15 members stated that Moscow has no right to do this, and pointed admonishingly to the Helsinki Final Act.

Naturally these are just words, although to object is correct. However, the words have some weight because they represent more than the smallest common denominator of NATO. The question, however, of what may come after the significant words of Western criticism of the Kremlin remains unclear after the special Brussels session. We must realize that these words are only declarations of intent, and are vague and lack exact stipulations regarding when they will be implemented. What help is it if the West Europeans generally welcome U.S. sanctions regarding the Soviet Union? What help is it if they state that they are prepared to examine which economic measures could possibly hurt the Soviet Union? We will soon see how the individual interests of the alliance partners cannot be brought into accord if they contradict economic egotism. Unfortunately, this is the point where the good intentions of the alliance partners will probably quickly part. This prospect casts a shadow over the generally positive answer which the alliance has finally given after numerous disputes to the almost uncontrolled challenge of the Soviet Union in the Polish crisis.

GAS PIPELINE DEBATE REVIVED IN OFFICIAL CIRCLES

PM111505 Paris LE MONDE in French 3-4 Jan 82 pp 1, 14

[Bruno DeThomas report]

[Text] When preparing for the energy debate in September, government experts gave gas a smaller share of the national energy account for 1980 than the Giraud plan envisaged. But, particularly under pressure from Gaz de France, a rather more optimistic slice (13 to 17 percent) was finally adopted. The development of the Polish crisis and the discussions with Algeria -- although an outline agreement was signed with that country in December -- suggest that those estimates may be overly optimistic. Indeed, events in Poland have revived the debate on the Soviet contract in government circles.

Although Gaz de France and Soyuzgazeksport will in principle resume their discussions 18 January, this agreement -- which is virtually concluded aside from the basic price question -- has been partly called into question. France is to buy 8 billion cubic meters of gas per year from the Soviet Union from 1984 for a period of 25 years. In exchange a loan of around Fr 10 billion has been granted to the USSR, and several French companies (especially Thompson and Creusot-Loire) are taking part in the effort to exploit Siberian gas resources.

The compression and refrigeration stations which Creusot-Loire is to supply are under U.S. license from General Electric, which may raise some problems after Mr Reagan's decision to suspend in particular -- among the sanctions taken against the USSR -- "export licenses for petroleum equipment, including equipment for the construction of gas pipelines." But aside from that, events in Poland have strengthened those among the government experts who think that Gaz de France should not be so heavily tied to the Soviet Union unless the exterprise is already capable of proving that it can do without that gas in time of crisis. Indeed, that presupposes a major extension of underground gas storage capacities and the signing of "suspendable" contracts with major clients, with manufacturers having to secure alternative sources of energy. To cope with a possible failure of Soviet gas supplies, Gaz de France is being asked to have a useable underground reservoir capacity of at least 60 billion kilowatt-hours, and suspendable clients should account for between 70 and 80 billion kilowatt-hours. However, such figures are a long way off. Without calling into question the whole contract, as several opposition representatives are loudly demanding, some people are wondering whether it would not be wise to be committed to smaller quantities.

While the anxieties raised by the purchase of Siberian gas are political, those stemming from the French-Algerian contract are economic. The National Company for the Transport and Marketing of Hydrocarbons [SONATRACH] and Gaz de France have until the end of January to put the final touches to the technical details of the outline agreement signed in Paris 20 December by the French external relations minister and his Algerian counterpart. Although the two sides are saying nothing, it seems certain that the basic gas price will be only partly (around 50 percent) index-linked to the crude oil price -- the Algerians' initial demand.

But in addition to the price paid by Gaz de France which should be at market level (note: Gaz de France paid SONATRACH a free-on-board price of $4.28 per million British Thermal Units [BTU] in the second half of 1982 [as published]. That price should fall to $3.92 in the first half of 1982. By comparison the price of gas from Groningen Province for the period 1 October 1981 through 1 April 1982 is $4.75 per million BTU delivered at the Netherlands border, in other words with much lower transport costs and no regasification costs (Algerian gas is transported in liquified form in methane tankers). [end footnote] France will pay a supplement from the state budget (there is talk of 0.15 cent per million BTU) to an ad hoc joint French-Algerian development body.

It was, of course, vital to overcome a crisis which had been going on for 2 years and was affecting all political relations between the two countries. In this case it was tempting to start implementing the idea of Algeria, which is so close, that the industrialized nations' aid to the developing countries should take the form of unequal trade to the latters' advantage. Hence this intentional link between the political gesture of aid to Algeria and the gas prices. However, in an international economy still largely dominated by market forces, "political" prices have always been a source of problems. And if this outline agreement is confirmed, the USSR, which has always tried to take advantage of an unwritten most-favored vendor clause, and the African countries -- also close to France -- which are potential gas exporters (like Cameroon for instance) will only be developed -- and this is vital to the world energy balance -- if the gas prices remain competitive with that of rival products (fuel oil and gas oil), whether paid by Gaz de France or the state budget.

LE MONDE COMMENTS ON MIDEAST, AFRICAN POLICIES

Talks With Begin Postponed

[Editorial: "Visit to Jerusalem Thwarted"]

[Text] At a time when the UN Security Council is resuming its debate on Israel's annexation of the Golan Heights, Mr Mitterrand has hinted that his visit to Jerusalem, hitherto scheduled for 10 February, will be postponed. The French preparatory mission's departure for Jerusalem, which was due to take place this Wednesday, has been postponed. The president harrassed by questions from journalists who had come to express their new year wishes Tuesday, avoided giving any details on the date of his visit. "I will visit that country," he merely confirmed.

This postponement, which is, in fact, the second, is no surprise. As soon as he arrived at the Elysee the president expressed his intention of visiting Israel quickly -- a country which no French or even Western head of state has yet visited officially. The president not only finds that anomaly shocking, he regards it as harmful.

He intends to exploit the attention of an Israeli opinion which is well-disposed toward him in order to tell it what it has rarely had the opportunity of hearing in its own country: that, like the Jewish people, Palestine's Arab people have the right to live in independence, peace and security in their homeland and the state of their choice. He will probably explain, as [external relations minister] Cheysson has just done after his recent visit to Cairo, that that state will "naturally" have to be where the Palestinian people "have been for centuries," in other words in the territories occupied by Israel for almost 15 years now. That explanation is a reply to [Israel prime minister] Begin's government, which is offering to allow the Palestinians form their state...in Jordan.

Mr Mitterrand had already abandoned the idea of an "early" visit to Israel after the destruction of the French-built Iraqi nuclear power station immediately after he entered the Elysee.

The second postponement comes after the Golan affair. Taking advantage of the confusion caused in the West by the coup in Poland, Mr Begin's government annexed the occupied Syrian Golan Heights a few hours later.

On 17 December the Security Council, unanimous for once, called upon Jerusalem to revoke its decision before 5 January. The debate reopens this Wednesday. The Quai d'Orsay, for its part, stated back on 20 December that Mr Mitterrand would assess the appropriateness of his visit in accordance with that debate.

Mr Begin's determination to keep the "Israeli" Golan Heights has, however, not been shaken.

In these conditions Mr Mitterrand's visit will most probably only take place at the end of April at the earliest. It will then have a different significance.

Going to Israel in February would mean that Mr Mitterrand was giving his blessing to strong-arm tactics. Going after 25 April, however, would mean that he was giving his support to a peace gesture. Under the terms of the Camp David agreements, Israel should have completely withdrawn from the Egyptian Sinai by that date, and France has already agreed to take part in the peacekeeping force in the region.

Moreover the government thinks that the Camp David agreements will by then have had their full effect and that it will be necessary to start another process for a settlement on the other "fronts": Gaza, the West Bank, the Golan Heights and Lebanon. Moreover it apparently has some thoughts on the subject which it does not yet deem timely to express.

Resurgent Ties With Egypt

[Editorial: "A New Departure"]

[Text] There are three ministers -- Mr Cheysson, Mr Hernu and Mrs Avice -- in Cairo at the same time. General Mubarak, the new rais, is expected in Paris at the beginning of February while President Mitterrand has agreed to visit Egypt later. Twenty Mirage 2000 aircraft have been sold to the Egyptian Armed Forces with a loan of Fr5.7 billion at an interest rate which, in view of the French and Egyptian inflation rates, verges on a gift. Mr Butrus Ghali, an Egyptian minister, has stated that the "French Socialists'" position on the Palestinian question is "fully satisfactory" to his country. Mr Hernu, a French minister, has drawn a bold parallel between two nations in a "state of grace" and two heads of state carried along by a "wave of confidence, hope and respect."

You could imagine that you had returned to the days of Presidents Giscard d'Estaing and As-Sadat -- before the Egyptian-Israeli Camp David agreements of 1978 and the 1979 Washington treaty -- when the high level of political, diplomatic and economic cooperation made it possible to say, both on the banks of the Nile and the Seine, that the two countries had revived the spirit of the Khedive period during which Egypt's modernization and emancipation were encouraged by the French.

After the slackening in relations between the two governments resulting from Mr Giscard d'Estaing's reservations on the "pax Americana" in the Near East, all that remained of the new departure in French-Egyptian cooperation launched under the previous 7-year term was intensive French financial participation -- albeit second to that of the United States -- in Egypt's neo-liberal economic development enterprise.

Despite Mr Mitterrand's personal support for the peace process launched by As-Sadat's visit to Jerusalem in 1977, the change of presidents in Paris did not immediately improve French-Egyptian relations.

After being subsequently enlightened by a mission to Cairo by Mr Attali, President Mitterrand's special adviser, President as-Sadat had, however, become aware of the new ideas which the French Socialists, owing to the special ties they have with the Israelis but also with the Palestinians, could contribute to the Near East at a time when U.S. policy in that region seems to lack imagination.

As for the French, as soon as General Mubarak came to power, they demonstrated their concern to strengthen his authority by giving him an unhoped-for gift: European participation in the Sinai peacekeeping force, previously composed solely of U.S. elements, which will be installed after Israel's total withdrawal from the peninsula in April 1982.

The French-Egyptian axis, which Paris naturally wants to be restored to its place within a broader French cooperation with all Arab nations, is therefore undergoing a notable revival in the political and military spheres. Since economic and financial links have been maintained all that remains is for new life to be breathed into bilateral cultural relations, neglected by Paris under the previous 7-year term, for French-Egyptian cooperation to cover all sectors.

Negotiations in Chad Necessary

[Editorial: "The Chadian Firebrand"]

[Text] Serious hopes for a solution of the crisis in Chad emerged during 1981, but the events of these past few weeks, particularly the rapid strengthening of Hissein Habre's position, seem to indicate that the country is now heading toward a trial of strength between President Goukouni Oueddei and his former minister of defense, who the Libyan Army had defeated and expelled from N'djamena in December 1980.

On the strength of a plan for an inter-African peacekeeping force adopted during the July summit of the OAU, the Elysee had cleverly urged Colonel al-Qadhdhafi to withdraw last November, the bulk of his troops stationed in Chad. Having the advantage of U.S. support, France's action had enduced the OAU to action, namely sending the first contingents -- Zairian, Nigerian and Senegalese -- of a neutral force whose task was to "take over" officially from Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's soldiers and to do so as soon as possible in order to avoid the disorders that might result from an excessively long transition period.

Contrary to what one might have thought, most of this did happen, in spite of the defection of certain African states which refused to participate in the inter-African force. But the deployment of the latter could not alone avert all the risks of civil war, particularly when it transpired that the "rebels" in the east -- Hissein Habre's northern armed forces -- certainly constituted the strongest political and military faction in the country.

Having successfully checked a Libyan offensive against his bases in September, Habre took advantage of the departure of Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's men to move his troops closer to the center of the country, and is still in the process of doing so now. For this, he has at his disposal what is supposed to be the most disciplined army in Chad and a considerable amount of equipment seized from the Libyans.

In the face of this threat, President Goukouni, at the head of a flimsy coalition of inexperienced troops, has done his utmost to enlist the help of the inter-African force in suppressing the "rebellion." As things stand at the moment, the OAU has not agreed to his request, believing its troops should not take sides with either of the Chad factions.

Finding himself in a position of strength, Hissein Habre is, for his part, advocating negotiations between the Chad factions, a solution to which Goukouni Oueddei has not yet agreed. The later has even threatened, as a last resort, to appeal to Libya again. As that country seems, for the moment, to have very little desire to return to the Chad quagmire, one might well ask how much room for maneuver President Goukouni Oueddei still has.

As no one seems to foresee direct intervention by France to save the peace plan and contain the "rebellion," only a new roundtable between the Chad factions could bring detente, albeit a precarious one. In the absence of such an initiative, it will just have to accepted that Hissein Habre will nibble away slowly at the positions of a coalition -- legitimized by Paris and the OAU -- which appears to be falling apart already.

SPADOLINI, OFFICIALS ISSUE REPORT ON TERRORISM

AU120906 Rome ANSA in English 0852 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 12 Jan (ANSA) -- Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini, joined by his ministers for the interior, defense and justice, delivered a detailed report to the Italian lower house on the "winter offensive" of armed guerrilla groups on the Italian peninsula. Spadolini's long report, given on Monday before the assembled MP's in Italy's Chamber of Deputies was dedicated in part to the theme of international connections.

The Rome government leader emphasized the "duty of the government to dedicate its attention to the abundant indications on international connections among subversive groups operating in Western countries," indicating the Mediterranian area as being "at the center of all the tensions" because it borders "on one of the most decisive and high-lighted areas of world equilibrium, the Mid-East." Spadolini also underlined the "singular chronological coincidence" between various anti-NATO attacks in Italy and West Germany, all aimed at "putting obstacles before the installation of nuclear missiles in Western Europe."

The premier also provided the MP's with a list of foreigners who have been expelled from Italy in the past two years because they were "dangerous for security, or operating in the interest of information activities concerning security-sensitive areas of the life of the state." The expulsions included citizens of various nationalities, "but above all from Libya, Hungary, the Soviet Union and Bulgaria," Spadolini said, adding that there were 26 expulsions in the last two years.

Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni confirmed to the chamber that the Italian Government intends to react with "complete firmness" without concessions or giving in to any demands on the part of the guerrilla groups. Rognoni provided the deputies with a detailed outline of the activity of subversive groups in Italy, reconstructing the principal armed guerrilla attacks of 1981-82 beginning with the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II on May 13, 1981, by right-wing Turkish terrorist Mehmet Ali Agca. Rognoni also revealed that according to the ongoing investigation into the December 17 kidnapping of United States Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier by the Red Brigades urban guerrilla group, approximately 12 brigades members from the "Militarist" wing of the organization participated in the abduction of the ranking NATO official of the land forces in southern Europe headquarters in Verona. The investigation, Rognoni said, is presently employing 1600 men, 200 vehicles and a number of helicopters and other special equipment in the search for Dozier and his kidnappers. "Normal collaboration with (?U.S.) security services" is being employed in the investigation, the interior minister declared, "with the authority of Western European nations."

Rognoni however warned the deputies not to hasten to any "quick conclusions" because of the discovery and arrest on Saturday of Giovanni Senzani, considered one of the leaders of the Red Brigades organization. "Terrorism will be finished in Italy," Rognoni said, "when the Italians have forgotten the last terrorist act."

During his report, Italian Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio revealed that the Italian military secret service force, SISMI, informed the NATO command on three different occasions in 1981 on the possibility of an attack against NATO officials and installations in Italy. The latest report released by SISMI on the 20th of October 1981, Largorio said, explained that one possible objective of a Red Brigades attack could have been a superior official whose habits and apartment location were also specified in the report.

Italian Minister of Justice Clelio Darida affirmed to the parliamentary assembly that the January third attack on the which [as received] four women prisoners suspected of belonging to the "Front Line" guerrilla group were aided in a spectacular jail-break, constituted a veritable "jump in quality" for the armed party of Italy's far-left subversives.

Darida described the Rovigo jail-break as a guerrilla action which "nears the level of the Northern Irish or Basque nationalist guerrilla groups, if not actually the level of South-American guerrillas." The justice minister asked for the full solidarity of the Parliament to provide the government with the legislative instruments necessary to defeat subversive attacks against prisons, defining these instruments as indispensable for the defense of democratic life.

ISRAELI FOREIGN MINISTER LEAVES ROME 11 JAN

BERLINGUER ADDRESSES PCI CENTRAL COMMITTEE SESSION

[Excerpts] The secretary general of the PCI, Enrico Berlinguer, discussed the events in Poland and their political repercussions on Western communism in his opening speech at the Central Committee meeting. The topics Berlinguer dealt with were the military intervention in Poland, the responsibilities of the Polish communist party, the communist societies in East Europe, the need for detente, the role of Europe and the third way.

He reiterated his firm condemnation of the state of siege and underlined the responsibility of the Polish communist party's leading group. The Communist secretary also emphasized the responsibility of the Soviet Union and of other Warsaw Pact countries, who were unable to understand the depth and the nature of the Polish crisis and who mistrusted and had important reservations about the process of renewal in which important sections of the communist party were engaged as well as Solidarity and the church. Berlinguer asserted he is convinced of the need for a turning toward a democratic direction based on the unity of the left and of the people's forces.

On Development of Socialism

[Luciano Fraschetti report]

[Text] The stage of the development of socialism which began with the October revolution has exhausted its thrust. Berlinguer, in his report to the Central Committee, again used the sentence which was the focus of the main internal criticism of Cossutta. He did so by developing the analysis contained in the leadership's document published on 30 December by L'UNITA which affirmed that in the Soviet Union and in the so-called people's democracies of Eastern Europe every capacity for political, economic and cultural renewal has entered a state of crisis, and that in those countries there may occur further and more serious regressive events. The restatement, therefore, is not fortuitous.

In the opening passage of his report, some 80 typed pages, Berlinguer points out that this Central Committee meeting was necessary for the purpose of verifying his party's endorsement of the analyses and the document on the events in Poland issued by the national directorate and which, Berlinguer stated, provoked Cossutta's dissent. To his authoritative opponent, Berlinguer makes two further polemical references, reminding him that whatever the conclusions of this debate within the Central Committee, they involve the entire Communist Party, and again to Cossutta, who in his article of open dissent from the directorate gave a glimpse of the possibility of further opposition, Berlinguer addresses a formal warning: It is not possible to allow -- he used these exact words -- formations of organized groups within the Communist Party.

Berlinguer's analysis then focused on the contents of the so-called third way, in which he defines the third stage of the struggle for socialism and which is not a middle way between communism and capitalism but a strategy to surpass capitalism at its present stage in the industrialized West and which, at the same time, guarantees democratic liberties and development.

Berlinguer is now about halfway through his report.

On U.S. Sanctions

LD120038 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 11 Jan 82

[Excerpts] The condemnation by the Italian Communist Party of the military coup in Poland was reiterated by Berlinguer in his report opening the PCI Central Committee meeting, a session which may have considerable consequences on relations between the Italian and the Soviet Communist Parties.

We took it for granted some time ago that the stage of leader parties and leader states had ended; we have no special links with any party, nor do we wish to have any, Berlinguer said. Berlinguer went on to speak of the reactions the stand taken on the events in Poland had caused within the party. In this connection he named Cossutta, openly accusing him of suppressing and ignoring facts. Berlinguer, however, added that the reasons of those who disagree and who fear a yielding to pressures from the class enemies must be understood and, therefore, an open debate must develop within the PCI on all these questions.

Naturally Berlinguer did not omit some critical references to those who, like the United States, demand sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union, sanctions, he said, which may reinforce a rigid concept of the blocs.

AU120940 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 12 Jan 82

Berlinguer claimed that the international situation is worsening because economic sanctions proposed by the United States towards Poland and the Soviet Union "cannot be of any help in reopening a process of renewal in Poland." "If the proposals for sanctions, already activated in part by the United States, are accepted by the European allies," Berlinguer warned, "a rigid concept of the East-West blocs would be reinforced instead of gradually overcome. "It would certainly not be weakened," Berlinguer added.

But the Communist Party leader also reiterated the strong stand adopted by his party toward the Soviet Union, maintaining that certain "realistic facts" cannot be forgotten. Among these he listed an economic strangling of the Kremlin's financial situation which forced the Soviet Union to acquire 23 million tons of grain from the United States, permanent and heavy limits to civil rights, limits on political participation because of an overall climate of de-politicization, and the dispersion of intellectuals.

PCI PAPER VIEWS STATE SOCIALISM'S ROLE IN POLAND

PM120957 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 29 Dec 81 p 3

[Francesco Galgano article: "Did Solidarity Really Go Too Far?"]

[Text] Of the innumerable "socialisms" that populated the ideological world of the 19th century, "state socialism" was just one of the many clearly opposed to Marxist socialism and, indeed, strongly opposed by Marx.

State socialism was nurtured by the Hegelian concept of the ethical state and by new approximate doctrines of state economic activity. It led to a view of the state as the exclusive agent of economic prosperity, the sole regulator of production. It combined with Marxism only at the beginning of its course, and not in the Western industrial societies but in the Eastern part of the world, where -- as Gramsci wrote in connection with the 1917 events -- "the state was everything and civil society was still primitive."

This kind of statism, both ethical and economic, followed natural paths when, following the October revolution, it spread in the East as a model adaptable to the countries freeing themselves from colonialism to which the colonialist heritage had bequeathed, together with a primitve form of society, a concentrated power structure (countries that are too glibly dubbed "Marxist regimes"). But others of its paths proved unnatural, in conflict with the society's degree of development. It prompted reactions of rejection when it was imposed -- as happened after World War II and the Yalta agreement -- in societies bordering the West, from Poland to the Balkan peninsula.

The main issue does not concern labels; it does not lie in establishing whether or not this is socialism. Nobody is authorized to attach such labels and nobody has a copyright on socialism. The main issue is rather to judge, on the basis of several decades' experience, the results achieved by the model of "state socialism" based on state ownership of the means of production and on the leading party, the sole mediator and arbiter in all the conflicts that emerge within society and in all decisions on what should be produced and what can be consumed.

It is of little importance that in Russia, for instance, there is acknowledgement of enterprises' autonomy in decisionmaking or, as elsewhere, there is an approach to (or even realization of) their self-management. In all the conflicts that emerge between the state economic management bodies and individual enterprises (and these conflicts are not infrequent, even in the USSR) there is still only one definitive body that mediates in them and settles them, the same body that represents both supply and demand -- whether for goods or services, savings or labor, and so forth.

Such a concentration of power creates as its first effect the retardation of the development of production forces and civil progress. The results have been the underutilization of material and human resources, low labor productivity, the weakening of innovative and creative stimuli and the bureaucratization of social life.

Only those who arbitrarily confuse "state socialism" with Marxism can talk about its failure. On the contrary, the categories of Marxism prompt us to contiue our critical analysis even among socieites that have abolished private ownership of the means of production, replacing it with state ownership. Here too these categories enable us to identify production relations (in this case the concentration of the ownership of a party-state) as the cause governing society's overall development conditions.

Some 18 months ago in Poland, Solidarity's emergence posed the question whether trade union freedom and the right to strike were compatible with state ownership of the means of production and the principle of the leading party. The affirmative answer seemed obvious to almost everyone. As long as the worker's separation from ownership (whether public or private is of little importance) of the means of production continues, trade union action remains fully legitimate and the need to defend the workers' rights and interests remains in every enterprise and with society.

The experience of the past 18 months in Poland and the way in which it has been terminated, however, prompts further observations. The conquest of trade union freedom and of the right to strike introduced to Poland an element of social conflict characteristic of Western societies, the workers could collectively negotiate with the government the cost and conditions for the granting of labor.

This might have seemed a great deal, bearing in mind that in the West government-trade union negotiations are the nub of the sociopolitical system. But in Western society this nucleus is surrounded by the system of parties, the system of enterprises, the system of local government, channels of public opinion and social movements. The conflicting bodies of society find innumerable other forums of representation and mediation. Not all society's needs are represented by the trade union (and the trade union itself can allow itself to choose among them), nor are the forms of trade union action, particularly the strike, the only forms of pressure.

However, this is what happened in Poland: There was no aspiration or need of society that Solidarity did not have to take up; and there was no way of asserting this other than the strike. Try to imagine for a moment an Italy with no political freedom, but only trade union freedom, with all society's aspirations concentrated within a trade union movement armed exclusively with the right to strike. In 18 months Solidarity reached almost 700 agreements with the government (an average of 1 per day).

It is true that things could not continue that way and Poland has in fact become ungovernable. But the necessary subsequent phase should have been the recognition of political freedom, the democratic organization of Polish society. One freedom demands another. Political freedoms would have implied first, the abandonment of the principle of the leading party; then it would have led to civil freedoms and perhaps even economic freedoms, thus calling into question -- in a parliament elected freely by universal suffrage -- even what Eastern bloc constitutions persist in calling the "inviolable" state ownership of the means of production.

This is why the events in Poland involve not only questions of principle, matters concerning the observance of a people's freedom and will or just images of socialism. They also raise ineluctable questions concerning the governability of the East European industrial societies. Poland was difficult to govern even before Solidarity appeared on the scene. Solidarity's 18 months were not enough on their own to make it governable. Still less will the present state of martial law make it governable, with its suppression of trade union freedom and militarization of the economy.

PCE'S CARRILLO SPEAKS ON POLAND, PARTY CRISIS

LD112004 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 11 Jan 82

[Text] PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo today held a press conference on the resolutions passed by the party Central Committee over the weekend on events in Poland and on repression by the Turkish regime. He also replied to questions about the crisis within the PCE.

Carrillo, among other things, proposed the formation of a new international alignment of socialist and communist parties and national liberation movements. The Communist Party leader said that the events in Poland have forced the PCE to take a hard look at the theory involved in the need for creating a new international to supercede the existing models, especially the Soviet one, which after the Polish events can be clearly seen to have failed.

The Communist leaner described the imposition of a military governing junta in Poland as unacceptable and at odds with the ideas of socialism. Carrillo went on to say that communist parties have not been able to bring about transformations in Western countries because they have long identified the October Revolution with the political and economic system put into effect by Stalin. The way out of this mistaken idea, he said, lies with Eurocommunism.

Turning to Spanish politics, the Communist leader stressed that his party sees democracy and socialism as inseparable from political pluralism, the alternation of political power and respect for human rights. Carrillo denounced the anti-PCE campaign which he said is being waged not only by ideological adversaries but also by people defending the same ideas as communists, though from different viewpoints. This is the explanation for the crisis the party is currently going through, a crisis which has been sharpened by the expulsion of members from the renewalist sector and by the resignation of 48 party members holding councillorships and other municipal posts in the province of Madrid. The Communist leader tried to play down the crisis, though he stressed that the PCE, like any democratic society, has its rules of play and that there are some people who are unwilling to respect these. He was making a direct reference here to the expelled renewalist members.

Speaking of accusations that he had been accumulating power within the Communist Party, Carrillo said that he would leave the leadership any time the Central Committee wished. He said he is sure there are quite a few people who would like to see him out of the leadership of the party.

ALVAREZ: PCE FAVORS DIALOGUE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

PA111808 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1541 GMT 11 Jan 82

[Text] Madrid, 11 Jan (EFE) -- The Communist Party (PCE) is in favor of dialogue and negotiation as a means of solving the conflicts in Central America, Santiago Alvarez, member of the party's Central Committee told EFE today. Alvarez, who recently visited the Central American region, said that, regarding El Salvador, the PCE supports the position adopted by France and Mexico, which "favors negotiation and the search for a solution with the participation of the two factions involved in the struggle."

He also said that elections will not be the solution for this country "divided by civil war." A negotiated solution, he added, is very important for Central America because it would eliminate a trouble spot and the danger of war spreading. Regarding Nicaragua, Santiago Alvarez stressed the PCE's solidarity with and support for the Sandinist government and said that he did not believe the news about Cuba's presence in that country. "Cuba influences countries in this region with its specific achievements" in the industrial, cultural and other fields, he said. The Communist leader said that his party would work within Spain to obtain the solidarity of political and social forces for Central America.

PAPER PONDERS CONTINGENCY STOCKPILING ISSUE

PM111619 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 30 Dec 81 p 8

[Editorial: "Allied Reinforcements"]

[Text] With the defense settlement made earlier this year several guidelines were drawn up for defense and in the coming months these will be enshrined in new legislation. On one important point a definite decision had to be postponed. This was the share and size of the army reinforcements which Denmark can expect in a given situation and will make preparations to receive.

A decision had to be postponed because Denmark cannot, of course, decide on its own the number and type of reinforcements which it can expect in a given situation. There were various proposals from NATO, but the so-called revised reinforcement plan from the chief of NATO forces in Europe will not be ready until early 1982.

During the preparatory negotiations it became clear that there were circles within the Social Democratic Party that were hesitant about stockpiling heavy materiel for the expected U.S. forces. Since then even greater uncertainty has been sown as to whether there will be any U.S. reinforcements available at all, because these could be needed elsewhere, possibly in the Middle East, for example.

It is assumed therefore that negotiations in the coming months will cover, in particular, a British brigade of 5,000 men without heavy materiel. This could mean that there will be no need for the stockpiling of heavy materiel such as tanks and artillery. This possibility has been greeted with satisfaction by the Radical Liberals, who are not party to the defense settlement, but who have not completely abandoned hope of playing a central role in the formation of a future government. It has also been greeted with relief by the government and by circles in the Social Democratic Party, because such a way out could avert a new conflict with the party's left wing, which is so critical on matters of defense policy.

It is possible that the coming negotiations will show that Denmark -- unlike Norway -- cannot count on being provided with U.S. reinforcements. But has the government made the necessary efforts to get them? Has it drawn the correct conclusions from the consideration that our need for allied reinforcements has grown at the same rate as the Soviet military buildup and the Soviet naval forces' capacity to delay or even prevent the arrival of reinforcements by sea during wartime? Or has the government admitted through its attitude that it prefers an arrangement which makes it possible for Denmark to "get out of" stockpiling heavy materiel?

If this latter is the case it must be difficult for Denmark's NATO allies to understand that circles in Denmark and possibly even the government see it as a Danish concession that Denmark should stockpile heavy materiel for forces which in a given situation would come to Denmark's assistance.

The certainty that in a given situation Denmark could count on considerable allied reinforcements and that Denmark has prepared itself in good time to receive them is a more vital element in Danish defense policy than ever.

Denmark must press to win the most favorable reinforcement agreements possible. This is not a matter which can be determined by the government alone on the basis of what is politically expedient. All the five parties supporting the defense settlement must be involved in the negotiations, as provided for in the defense settlement.

BREZHNEV CABLES KOIVISTO, KEKKONEN ON RELATIONS

[Text] Soviet President and Party Chairman Leonid Brezhnev says that he noted with satisfaction the Finnish endeavor and readiness as expressed by Premier Mauno Koivisto to actively contribute to the development of Finnish-Soviet relations on the basis of the treaty of friendship, cooperation and mutual assistance. Brezhnev says that this course is in complete agreement with interests of the peoples of our countries. According to Brezhnev, it also serves the cause of international detente and permanent peace.

President Brezhnev sent President Urho Kekkonen and the acting president, Premier Mauno Koivisto telegrams in which he expresses his thanks for the congratulations he received on his 75th birthday. In his message to Kekkonen, Brezhnev stresses that the development of Finnish-Soviet relations in the future will be an important part of the foreign political activities of the Soviet leadership.

SWEDEN

EXPORT OF MILITARY MATERIEL SHOWS INCREASE

PM111525 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 5 Jan 82 p 11

[FORENADE LANDSORTSTIDNINGAR Correspondent Ulf Wiberg article]

[Text] In the last 10 years Sweden's exports of military materiel have risen, but have shown no clear trend since the 1960's. This is the view of the publication INTERNATIONELLA STUDIER in a fresh look at Sweden's share of world arms sales. In 1970 arms sales totaled 322 million kronor and amounted to 0.9 percent of the country's total exports. In 1980 these figures had risen to 2 billion kronor and 1.6 percent, but in terms of 1968 prices sales had only trebled. In the years between 1973 and 1979 two-thirds of military materiel sales were to countries in Europe and one-fourth to states in Asia. According to the available statistics, the increase in exports has chiefly been to West Europe, South America and certain selected states in Africa.

At least 50 percent of exports came into the category "arms and ammunition," such as guns, missiles, weapons pods [vapenkapslar], torpedoes and mines. The biggest suppliers were Bofors and Forenade Fabriksverken. It is easy to explain the peaks in the export graph during the 1970's. They were Draken aircraft to Denmark and Finland, training aircraft to Norway and patrol boats to a number of nations. Among the largest purchasers are buyers like Norway, Dubai, Tunisia and Bahrain, nations which can hardly be said to have an aggressive defense policy. In money terms the largest category is "arms and ammunition." This is followed by warships, dynamite and explosives, aircraft and spare parts, and tanks and armored vehicles. "Sundry materiel," a broad category, is, however, the second largest category of exports from Sweden.

It is interesting to note that in 1978 532 foreign products were used by the U.S. Navy maintenance organization. Sweden, Japan and Australia were the United States' only suppliers not belonging to NATO. Sweden provided the largest number of products from this group. In 1980 there were between 20 and 30 products from Sweden in use. Most notable are spare parts from Motala Engineering Works for the engines of 5 LCA ships and 30 Spruance-class destroyers and engines from Elmo AB in Flen for three maintenance ships designed to aid attack submarines of the new SSN-688 class. The United States has also bought the Carl Gustaf antitank gun, the 103-S tank, the 202 and 206 tracklaying vehicles, vehicles from Saab-Scania and a type of weapon produced by Forsvarets Fabriksverk [the state-owned arms marufacturer] which has been thoroughly tested in the United States.

The export share of total supplies of defense materiel from Bofors AB in the last 35 years does not show any large or unambiguous increase. In 1950 70 percent of all production was exported. Then the figures through 1970 were between 30 and 40 percent and decreased to 25 percent in 1975. In 1980 there was an increase almost back up to the 1950 level. The majority of customers for Swedish defense materiel are to be found in comparatively peaceful West Europe, but there are also some in Africa, the Middle East, Asia and South and Central America. Bofors AB is one of Sweden's most successful and profitable companies. Company director Hans Ulric Winberg told a British audience that the upward trend in Swedish defense materiel exports could become more of a rule than an exception for Bofors in the future.

USSR USES SWEDISH JOURNALIST AS 'SCAPEGOAT'

[Olof Santesson editorial: "The Soviet Union and DAGENS NYHETER"]

[Text] The Soviet authorities are persisting in their offensive treatment of DAGENS NYHETER's Moscow correspondent Staffan Teste. Monday's [4 January] meeting between the Soviet Union's ambassador in Stockholm and the cabinet secretary showed that Moscow is sticking to its threat to adopt "the necessary measures" against Teste if he returns to the Soviet Union. Thus the superpower has missed the chance of rethinking an issue which is compromising for it.

The Soviet Union is pretending that the correspondent is guilty of spying and agitation. The accusations are a crude attempt to sidestep the Helsinki Final Act's statements on the free flow of information, unhindered by national authorities. This document is the outcome of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe -- of which the Soviet Union perhaps more than any other power was a keen supporter, with all its important principles, and it was signed by President and party Chairman Leonid Brezhnev personally. Now, in the present case, the Soviet leadership has boldly crossed through its words by simply announcing that the correspondent's "activities in the Soviet Union have nothing to do with journalism."

In its diplomatic demarche in mid-December Moscow actually asserted that Staffan Teste had "systematically infringed Soviet legislation from the very beginning of his work" by engaging in espionage and agitation. Teste began his stint in the Soviet Union at the beginning of 1979. Thus, according to their own version, the Soviet authorities have allowed systematic violation of the law to take place for almost 3 years before deciding to take action. Does Moscow really believe that anyone would swallow these fairy stories? While discharging his duties, DAGENS NYHETER's Moscow correspondent has of course practiced journalism and nothing else. But normal news reporting -- which is what one expects journalists to accomplish -- is all too easily given other labels by Soviet rulers frightened by their own shadows.

It is obvious that somewhere in the bunkers of power Soviet officials are still sitting busily collecting information on foreign journalists; everything is worth having -- even the most natural, trivial or harmless thing can with a little effort be built up into an accusation if the Soviet authorities so decide.

Through the usual informal channels the Soviet Union has indicated that the correspondent is actually being made the scapegoat of strong Soviet displeasure with Sweden. The superpower men are seeking revenge because the Swedish authorities and Swedish public opinion have continued to take a critical view of the Soviet submarine intrusion in the Karlskrona Archipelago in October/November. Relations are hardly likely to become more cordial since Sweden has reacted more strongly to recent developments in Poland than many other Western countries. The question is whether the Soviet leadership is capable of recognizing genuine indignation in others. But what is certain is that superpowers are unfortunately not in the habit of tolerating criticism without retaliating in some cheap way or other. DAGENS NYHETER's Moscow correspondent happened to be available. The injustice to him is small compared to a lot of other things the Soviet state has on its conscience. However, the fact remains that the Soviet Union has disgraced itself -- again.

COMMUNIST PARTY ISSUES DECLARATION ON POLAND

PM111309 London MORNING STAR in English 11 Jan 82 p 3

[Text] The Communist Party Executive Committee issued the following declaration on Poland:

The Executive Committee of the Communist Party of Great Britain expresses its profound concern at recent developments in Poland.

We call for the immediate release of the detained representatives of trade union and other democratic organisations, the restoration of democratic rights to the Polish people, and a return to civilian rule.

We reaffirm our principled view that socialism and democracy are inseparable and urge the resumption of the process of democratic and socialist renewal in Poland, brought to a halt by the establishment and actions of the Military Council for National Salvation.

This ended a process in which, despite difficulties, bitter disputes and painful compromises, the further democratisation of Polish society had been taking place.

The significant new factor in this process, compared with previous periods of crisis and promised reform, was the continuing mass action of millions of Polish people and the setting up of the Solidarity trade union.

Some leaders of Solidarity have made provocative and adventurist statements, but while this made the process of dialogue and democratic renewal more difficult, it did not justify the attacks on the democratic rights of the Polish people which have taken place.

The establishment and actions of the military council have taken place against the background of the continuing deterioration of the economic and social situation and developing confrontation between the government and Solidarity in which forces hostile to socialism had become increasingly active.

But rule by a military council is no substitute for the complex, difficult and lengthy process of re-establishing trust and confidence between the Polish people, the Polish United Workers Party and the government.

Far from being seen as extending democracy, the party and the government of a socialist state have become identified, in the eyes of many millions in Poland and elsewhere, as opposed to the demands and independent activity of working people.

Because, as the Polish United Workers Party itself recognised, it had lost the confidence of the majority of the Polish people, and because of the government's economic and political failures, it was clear that anti-socialist forces would try to take advantage of the situation.

But no evidence was produced, or has yet been produced to indicate that there was an imminent danger of a coup which could only be dealt with by the establishment of military rule and the suspension of virtually all democratic rights. On the contrary, what has happened shows that the government, with the support of the armed forces, was fully capable of dealing with any such problem.

If it was considered that new emergency powers were needed, our view is that such powers should always remain subject to civilian control and confirmation by parliament.

All that has happened in recent weeks can only make more difficult the re-establishment of trust and confidence between the Polish people and the Polish United Workers Party and government.

This confidence was forfeited over a period of many years in which party and government leaders, divorced from the people, made serious errors in economic policy, were responsible for undemocratic practices and mismanagement, and were in some cases corrupt. It is these wrong policies which placed in jeopardy the many great achievements of people's Poland, and produced the crises of 1956, 1970, 1976 and 1980.

The urgent need has been to regain the confidence of the people, and restore the credibility of the party. But instead, the party has been subordinated to military rule, an unprecedented step in a socialist country, and one which will make it far more difficult for the party to win public support.

The only way out of the present crisis remains the effort to reach agreement between the PUWP, Solidarity and the church, and the pre-requisite for success in this is the ending of martial law and return to the path of democratic renewal.

Imperialism seeks to exploit the crisis in Poland in order to further its reactionary aims and to undermine the process of detente and disarmament in Europe. Reagan, Thatcher and their accomplices shed crocodile tears over the introduction of martial law in Poland while at the same time giving support and aid to the most vicious antidemocratic, racist and warmongering regimes throughout the world. U.S. imperialism's trade sanctions on Poland stand in sharp contrast to this and should be rejected by our labour movement.

We will continue to combat all imperialist actions which threaten peace, national liberation and socialist advance, and carry forward our traditions of international solidarity in that struggle.

A resolution of the crisis in Poland on the basis of dialogue, negotiation and democratic renewal, without intervention from outside, will not only help the Polish people, but contribute to the cause of peace and detente throughout the world.

We call on the labour and democratic movement to oppose military rule while exposing and combating the hypocrisy of the Reagan-Thatcher response.

CP HEAD'S LETTER DEMANDS REAGAN END INTERFERENCE

TA120855 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Letter from Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen to President Reagan dated 11 January]

[Text] Mr Reagan: As you know, a military dictatorship was established in Turkey, a NATO member, on 12 September 1980. The generals who came to power in this military coup abolished the constitution and the parliament. They disbanded the political parties, banned the unions, that had hundreds of thousands of members, and abolished all basic democratic rights and workers and trade union freedoms. Strict martial law conditions have been in effect for the last 16 months. Prisons are filled with tens of thousands of communists, socialists and patriots. Over 500 progressives have been killed in police operations and by torture. Now the military junta is trying 52 trade unionists in a martial law court without presenting any evidence and is demanding the death penalty for all of them. The trial of the unionists, for whom the death penalty has been demanded because of union activities and which started on 24 January, is being held under state of war regulations.

In a statement you made on Christmas, you defended your boycott against Poland on grounds that you wanted to insure workers and trade union rights and to defend the unionists. Given the situation, we would like to ask you a question on behalf of millions of Turkish workers whose union rights have been abolished and whose leaders are being dragged to the gallows and on behalf of the families of the 52 unionists who have been in detention for the last 16 months: If you support workers and union rights and if you defend union leaders, then why are you keeping silent when justice and human rights are being trampled on in such a way in Turkey that the whole world can see? You not only have not protested this barbarism in a NATO country but from the very first day you have openly supported the junta administration that is exerting efforts to transform the whole of Turkey into a concentration camp. Today no NATO country, with the exception of the United States, has the audacity to express such support for the junta openly. However, your war minister, Mr Weinberger, while in Ankara in December, once more told the generals that U.S. support will continue. It is clear that had it not been for U.S. support to keep our country within NATO, the oppression and terror in our country would not have reached the current dimensions. Given the circumstances, you share a great responsibility. You are the accomplice of those who wish to execute 52 innocent unionists like the May Day unionists who were hanged in Chicago in 1887. Our people know this.

In your statement on 30 December, you tried to accuse the USSR, without presenting any evidence, of interfering in Polish domestic affairs and of violating the UN resolutions and the Helsinki accords with the intention of concealing your own attempts to interfere in Polish domestic affairs. There is no evidence from the past or present that the Soviet Union has ever violated the agreements you mentioned. On the other hand, there are innumerable indications that methods such as interference in other countries' domestic affairs, threats, pressure and embargoes constitute the basis of U.S. foreign policy. Our people have witnessed this through the bitter experiences of the last 30 years. Your administration, as has been the case with previous administrations, is interfering harshly in the domestic affairs of Turkey, which, together with the United States, is a cosigner of the Helsinki Act.

Furthermore, you have carried this interference to the most extreme dimensions. Our people are well aware that the CIA had an active role in escalating the terrorism, claiming some 20 - 30 lives a day, that led to the military coup on 12 September 1980. This is part of the CIA's strategy to create domestic tension and chaos in foreign countries. If you so desire, you can be briefed in detail on the issue by your aide and former CIA director, Mr Bush, and by the current assistant secretary of defense and former deputy director of the CIA, Mr Carlucci.

Your administration for a long time has been applying strong pressure on Ankara in a bid to secure facilities and bases for your Rapid Deployment Force attack units established in line with your policy of increasing international tension and conflicts. You are preparing to send your secretary of state, Mr Haig, to our country in the coming days. Your goal is to drag our country in to adventures outside NATO as well in a bid to insure your own interests. Currently your administration is making demands on our country in order to undermine our relations with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. You are supporting domestic reaction and anti-Soviet circles. Even the Washington POST has reported that your CIA agents are engaging in operations against our neighbor Iran on our territory. Neither is it a secret that you are exerting efforts to create new conflicts between Turkey and Greece in a bid to prevent our neighbor Greece from dismantling the U.S. bases on its territory and withdrawing from NATO. Furthermore, your administration, in its interference in our domestic affiars, always uses as trump cards U.S. military and economic aid as well as the economic investment organizations under its control such as the IMF.

You claim you resorted to the embargo you are trying to impose on the Soviet Union and Poland for humanitarian and ethical reasons. However, you are imposing a boycott on Poland and interfering in its domestic affairs in a bid to defend the counterrevolutionaries in Poland. You are using the legal measures taken against the counterrevolutionaries as a pretext in a bid to increase international tension and to deploy your nuclear missiles in Western Europe. You are trying to use the legal measures of the legal Polish administration as a reason for antipeace efforts against the Soviet Union.

On the other hand you are supporting the junta in Turkey, which has no legality. You are supporting it to attain your inauspicious goals in the Middle East, which you have declared to be your region of interest. Most of the generals in power have been educated in your schools. Most of the arms used to suppress the people have been purchased from you. Your open support for the military dictatorship in Turkey has brought nothing but hunger, poverty and oppression to our people. It is obvious that the Turkish people are the last in the world to believe that you act on humanitarian and ethical grounds.

The Turkish working class and the democratic forces are currently waging a struggle to save the 52 unionists. All world public opinion and all world unions are supporting us in this struggle. No doubt no one expects your administration, which has chained its own unionists, to be in solidarity with the Turkish unionists. As with the Polish workers and communists, we have one thing to say to you on behalf of the Turkish working class and the democratic forces: Take your dirty hands off our beautiful country.

MINISTER RECEIVES COUNCIL OF EUROPE DELEGATION

TA111709 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 11 Jan 82

[Text] The Council of Europe delegation, which is continuing its contacts in Ankara, was received this afternoon by Justice Minister Cevdet Mentes. In a statement on behalf of the delegation, the chairman of the Council of Europe's judicial committee, Percy Grieve, said they were discussing the council's relations with Turkey and closely observing work being conducted in Turkey for restoration of the democratic system.

Mentes said he would brief the delegation members on legislation enacted following the 12 September 1980 coup as well as judicial work being carried out in Turkey and its implementation.

The Council of Europe delegation is expected to continue its contacts in Ankara tomorrow.

UNITY URGED WITH PERSECUTED TRADE UNION LEADERS

TA100951 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 10 Jan 82

[Statement by the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee dated 8 January]

[Text] The Turkish working class is currently facing one of the strongest attacks in its history. Thousands of workers with different political views -- communist, socialist or religious -- are being prosecuted. These pressures have reached their peak with the trial of 52 administrators of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] with the demand for death penalties.

The lives of the DISK leaders are in danger. Those who are dragging the country toward dangerous adventures in the wake of U.S. imperialism, those who are trying to tear up the 1961 constitution and those who are mercilessly laying the burden of the economic crisis on the shoulders of the workers are asking for the heads of the workers' leaders. Therefore the trial of 52 DISK administrators, with the demand for death penalties, must be considered a dangerous signal for our national independence and security, our freedom and livelihood as well as for the lives of the unionists. These facts prove that the junta's talk about a return to democracy is merely a maneuver.

The unionists are being tried with fascist methods. State of war regulations -- which are not applied even to fascists who shed the blood of thousands of people and who murdered Kemal Turkler, one of the leaders of DISK, on orders from their master -- are being implemented at the DISK trial. It is evident that the junta has declared war against the working class. The suit filed by the martial law court is against millions of workers and not only against the 52 unionists. The court prosecutor has been unable to produce a single piece of evidence of the unionists' terrorist actions because there is no such evidence. The prosecutor wants to execute the DISK leaders for the actions of hundreds of thousands of workers, for strikes by millions of people and for the glorious May Day demonstrations. In that case it is not only the lives of 52 unionists that are at stake. All workers' freedoms -- their rights to strike, to form unions and to sign collective wage contracts in the future so-called democratic regime -- are at stake. Rescuing the 52 is synonymous with the workers' cause for freedom and livelihood.

Prosecutor Suleyman Takkeci -- the notorious man of the counterguerrillas -- is also claiming that DISK is an organization affiliated with the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] in order to sentence the DISK administrators to death. Our party has always refuted this coarse accusation. DISK and its affiliated unions do not have the slightest organizational connection with our party. The TCP defends the organizational independence of unions. Unions must, above all, be independent of the bourgeois state. Those who are trying DISK are attempting to place the unions under the ruthless hegemony of the bourgeois state. Martial law officials have undoubtedly seen that in numerous cases the working class has elected communist workers to labor representations and union leaderships and are waging a noisy campaign against this. This course of trade union struggle cannot be averted. Workers have supported and are still supporting the members of our party only because they defend the rights and interests of the working class in the most consistent and brave manner. This does not prove that DISK is dependent on the TCP. It shows clearly that millions of workers have attained an awareness of their own class interests against this system of tyranny and exploitation.

All the developments in Turkey and the trial of the 52 penetrate the disguise of imperialism, the likes of Reagan and the internal reactionaries. While they shed false tears for Poland, these forces continue to support the dictatorship in Turkey, which is prosecuting thousands of unionists and workers, seeking death penalties for 52 DISK administrators and throwing some 1,000 progressives into dungeons on the grounds that they are members of the TCP.

The motives for threatening the 52 unionists with death are evident. The goal is to deprive the workers of their democratic trade union rights and keep the working class in chains in the future so-called democracy as well. Workers, do not bow down to this!

The junta is resorting to every means in a bid to slander the glorious 15-year history of DISK. The strikes, led by hundreds of thousands of workers risking their lives in the name of employment, livelihood and freedom and the May Day demonstrations are being considered equal to the murders of a handful of terrorists and antipeople fascists. This is intended to erase from the consciousness of the working class its own revolutionary struggle traditions.

The TCP calls on our entire working class, on all toilers and all citizens in favor of freedom to express solidarity with DISK. Freedom for the 52! Let us stop the murders that are about to be committed in the courts of the junta. The unity of action of all workers is essential to secure the reopening of DISK and end the pressure on the Turkish Confederation of Labor. Now every worker understands better how trade union division aids the collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie. In that case, let us regroup our forces to form unions of unity. The possibilities of rescuing the 52 and succeeding in the struggle for trade union rights and freedoms are actually greater than they appear. The junta was forced to revert to the tactic of announcing the election date in the fact of internal and external democratic pressure. This shows that while on one hand the dictatorship is increasing the pressure on the people, on the other hand it is becoming weaker. The trial of the 52 is provoking increasing reaction in our country. All world unions, the World Federation of Trade Unions, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the World Confederation of Labor and hundreds of millions of workers have united in solidarity with DISK. Freedom for the 52!

TRIALS OF TWO LEFTIST GROUPS' MEMBERS UNDERWAY

[Text] Ankara, 11 Jan (AA) -- The trials of two illegal extremist groups were started at Golcuk and Adana martial law courts. The Golcuk court started hearing the case against 74 members of a faction of the illegal organization calling itself People's Liberation Party-Front, "THKP-C Kurtulus (Liberation)," while the Adana military court tried 277 members of the organization "Dev-Yol (Revolutionary Path)."

Two Captured Trying To Escape

TA111642 Ankara ANATOLIA in French 1620 GMT 11 Jan 82

[Text] Cesme, 11 Jan (AA) -- Ismail Akcay and Ahmet Dartan, two militants, were captured today by security forces as they were trying to flee to Greece in a sailboat. Security forces caught up with them off Karaada islet, near Cesme, a seaside resort in Izmir. The two suspects were carrying a fake passport of the TFSC as well as 19,000 Turkish liras. Some food was found in the stolen boat. An investigation into the incident is underway.

65 Arrested in Mardin

[Summary] The VII Corps and Diyarbakir, Urfa, Mardin, Siirt, Hakkari and Van Martial Law Command press and public relations department has announced that during a series of operations carried out in and around Mardin during the past month security forces captured 65 members of the illegal and secessionist Kordestan Workers Party. They include some administrative and financial officials of the organizations. During these operations the security forces also seized 9 rifles, 1 sten gun, 11 pistols, 33 cartridges, 5 bombs, 214 dynamite sticks, 73 kg of explosives, 17 TNT blocks and electric fuses, 4 meters of time fuse, fake identity cards and bankbooks and a large number of banned publications, pamphlets, organizational notes and directives by high-ranking officials of the organization.

[Text] The trial of 277 suspects belonging to the leftist illegal Revolutionary Path [Dev-Yol] organization began in Adana today. After the court completed the identification of the accused, the defense lawyers asked for time to study the supplementary indictment prepared by the military prosecutor. The court agreed to this request and adjourned the hearings until 14 January.

In his indictment the prosecutor of the 2d Military Court in Adana is accusing the 277 suspects of being involved in the killing of 39 persons in Adana in the last 4 years, including two policemen, a commando and a physician. The indictment also accuses the suspects of wounding several persons, engaging in armed robberies, planting bombs, organizing unauthorized rallies and other crimes. They are also accused of aiming at changing or disrupting the implementation of a large part of the constitution, trying to establish the domination of one social class over other classes and trying to destroy a social class by the use of force.

The indictment asks the death sentence for 126 of the suspects and prison sentences of 2-20 years for the rest. Out of 277 suspects, 206 are under arrest.

13 Separatists Arrested

TA111802 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 11 Jan 82

[Summary] A statement by the press and public relations department of the Adana, Icel, Kahramanamaras, Gaziantep, Adiyaman and Hatay Martial Law Command says that as a result of operations conducted in Adana and Icel Provinces, as well as in Iskenderun District, 13 militants belonging to the illegal separatist Kordestan Workers Party [PKK], also known as Apoists, were captured by the security forces. The following weapons were seized by the security forces during the operations, which have been underway since October: 4 automatic rifles, 13 pistols and some ammunition. The suspects are accused of killing six persons, executing three others following a so-called trial in a people's court, torturing a woman to death, carrying out several armed robberies, distributing illegal leaflets and other crimes. Legal action against the suspects is continuing.

Writer Sentenced in Absentia

[Text] [Film director] Yilmaz Guney, who is currently at large abroad, has been sentenced in absentia to 7 and 1/2 years in prison by the 1st Military Court of the Istanbul Martial Law Command for engaging in communist propaganda through publication. The military court also ruled that Guney be kept under general security surveillance in Erzurum for 2 years. Guney was tried for an article he published in GUNEY magazine in December 1978.

ANTIDRUG OPERATIONS SEIZE RECORD HAUL IN 1981

[Erhan Akyildiz report]

[Excerpts] Teams from the narcotics branch of the Istanbul Security Directorate seized 44 kg of heroin in 1981 worth an estimated 150 million liras on the local market and about 450 million liras abroad. This was achieved through successful antinarcotics operations in Istanbul and its suburbs. The narcotics branch teams seized 460 kg of hashish worth about 70 million liras at home and 180 million liras abroad. They also seized 4 kg of raw opium originating from Iran. It has been stated that a kilogram of unprocessed opium costs about 500,000 liras.

It has also been reported that 420 people were detained, 75 percent of whom were later arrested on grounds that they were found to be guilty. Due to continuous antinarcotic operations and stringent controls carried out in Istanbul and its suburbs in 1981, the quantity of narcotics seized increased 100 percent compared with the previous year. While the quantity of heroin seized in Istanbul and its suburbs was 24.5 kg in 1980, this quantity rose to 44 kg in 1981. The quantity of hashish rose from 284.5 kg in 1980 to 460 kg in 1981.

According to information obtained from the evaluation of the results of these operations, the narcotics are being smuggled into Turkey from the east -- Iran. The narcotics traffic destined for Europe after transiting Turkey pursued two main routes up to the beginning of 1981. The first was the Iranian border-Van-Diyarbakir-Malatya-Ankara-Izmit-Afyon-Izmir-Europe. As a result of stringent controls carried out in 1981, the narcotics traffic moved toward the south. As a result of the antinarcotic operations carried out in 1981, the narcotics traffic began to follow two new routes. The first route is the Iranian border-Malatya-Gaziantep-Aleppo-Beirut-Turkish sector of Cyprus-northern Italy-Europe. The second route is the Iranian border-Malatya-Gaziantep-Aleppo-Beirut-Turkish sector of Cyprus-Britain-the Netherlands-other Baltic countries.

MILLIYET learned that two Jordanians, Husayan Muhammad Sharaf and Ali Husayn Sharif, who wanted to enter Turkey through Cilvegozu, were caught by customs officers with 37.6 kg of hashish in their car. Both Jordanians were arrested after initial interrogations.

Reports from Izmir say a worker, Ahmet Komutan, coming to Izmir, Turkey, for the New Year holidays, was caught along with four of his friends for possessing 1.3 kg of hashish.

IRANIAN INDUSTRIES MINISTER ARRIVES ON VISIT

TA121030 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Text] Iranian Industries Minister Mostafa Hashemi arrived in Turkey last night for an official visit. In a statement to a Turkish Radio and Television correspondent on arriving in Istanbul, Hashemi said his government intended to promote economic and trade relations between his country and Turkey. The visiting minister added that his country was interested in importing machinery, spare parts, knowhow on the manufacture of cars and oil products from Turkey.

The Iranian trade delegation, headed by the industries minister, will go to Ankara after visiting some industrial installations in Istanbul.

BRIEFS

INDIA CULTURAL EXCHANGE -- A cultural exchange program for 1982-84 has been signed in Ankara by Turkey and India. The program envisages the allocation of mutual scholarships, cooperation among universities and exchanges and cooperation in the various art fields. The radio and television of the two countries will organize film weeks and will exchange programs. It was also agreed that the Indian Government should support the cultural activities to be organized in India to mark the 60th anniversary of the Turkish Republic. OIL OUTLOOK -- Contracts have been signed for Turkey's crude oil needs for 1982. Turkey will use an estimated 16.3 million tons of crude oil this year. Most will be supplied by Libya, Saudi Arabia and Iraq. Negotiations are being held with Iran on crude oil imports. About 2 million of the required 16.3 million tons will be supplied by local production. The Turkish Petroleum Corporation will drill a total 215,000 meters at 99 production and exploration wells. Exploration will be intensified in Thrace, the Salt Lake region, Adana, Iskenderun and southeastern Anatolia. An area along the Syrian border has been cleared of mines and oil exploration will begin there as soon as road construction is completed. Domestic crude production increased by 7 percent in 1981 over 1980. [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 6 Jan 82 TA]

KREISKY NOTES ASSURANCES IN LETTER FROM JARUZELSKI

[Text] Vienna (AZ) -- Poland's party and government chief Jaruzelski has assured Chancellor Kreisky in a letter that the measures connected with the proclamation of martial law will be abolished as soon as the situation permits and that there will be a return to the reform policy. On Monday the chancellor declared to journalists that a democratic state's sympathy will always be on the side of the oppressed. Nevertheless, he said, in the case of Poland he advocated exercising the greatest restraint because one must not misjudge the realities.

TRADE MINISTER SEES NO WINTER ENERGY SHORTAGES

[Summary] Trade Minister Staribacher declared yesterday that he did not expect any power shortages this winter provided the current low growth rate in power use does not increase and that there is no extreme weather. The minister warned, however, that Austria did not have any reserves to cope with unfavorable situations in power production. Regarding oil consumption, Staribacher predicted a decline this year as against 1981 when large stores of oil products were built up. The country's coal supply was affected by the events in Poland, a development which induced Austria to increase its efforts to put its energy imports on as many legs as possible. Despite arrears in Polish coal deliveries, the coal supply for this winter has been ensured through substitute deliveries from Western countries, although at a higher cost, the minister stressed. He added that Austria's natural gas stores at present were adequate to meet half a year's demand.

ROLANDHIS, VENIAMIN DENY 'AGGRESSIVE ACTS' LIKELY

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis has stated that the government has no information that intentions exist for aggressive action of any sort in Cyprus. In a statement, Mr Rolandhis says that a report in a Greek newspaper that he summoned Soviet Ambassador Astavin and asked for his country's intervention to avert a new aggressive action by the Turkish troops is completely unfounded. Mr. Rolandhis added: My meeting with Mr Astavin last Saturday had no connection with this issue. Mr. Rolandhis further denied Turkish allegations about the arrival of troops and imports of arms from Greece. His statement says: The government is following the situation carefully and is in contact with foreign governments and urges the avoidance of press reports which are not based on facts but result in creating confusion and unrest.

At the same time, Interior and Defense Minister Veniamin issued a statement denying press reports that he has submitted to the Council of Ministers a report on preparations by the Turkish invaders to carry out a third Attila. Mr Veniamin says consequently he could not have given the information which was attributed to him in these press reports.

COMMUNITY WELCOMES TURKEY'S PLAN FOR RESTORATION

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that the recent official statements concerning a return to pluralist democracy in Turkey were welcomed in EEC and European Parliament circles. In a news conference in Brussels last night, Turkmen commented on his contacts, saying that the announcement of the timetable for a return to democracy was welcomed by all people with good faith who attach importance to relations with Turkey and who want Turkey to continue its relations with the West.

Pointing out that the EEC officials he met stressed the wish to develop relations with Turkey, Turkmen said: I believe more intense efforts will be exerted in the future in a bid to activate the measures in connection with the fourth financial protocol. Turkmen added that despite efforts by those who are acting through ideological motives or with prejudice, he is optimistic that elements obstructing Turkish-EEC relations will be eliminated in view of the significant developments toward establishing parliamentary democracy in Turkey. Turkmen will return to Turkey today.

Turkmen Meets With Officials

[Text] Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who attended the NATO meeting in Brussels, held talks separately with the present president of the EEC Commission, Gaston Thorn, as well as European Parliament President Simone Veil. Turkish Radio and Television correspondent Nusret Ozgul reports that during the meetings, Turkmen briefed the EEC officials on the timetable for the return to a democratic system in Turkey. Relations between Turkey and the EEC were also reviewed during the talks. Turkmen also met with the European Parliament's Social Democrat and Liberal group leaders for talks. Having concluded his contacts in Brussels, he will return to Turkey tomorrow.

Turkmen-Thorn Meeting

[Text] Brussels, 12 Jan (AFP) -- Former Turkish Premier Bulent Ecevit, currently serving a four-month jail term, will be released on February 1, EEC sources said here today following a meeting between Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and Gaston Thorn, president of the European Commission. Mr Turkmen also provided an agenda for Turkey's return to democracy in the wake of last September's military takeover by a junta under Gen Kenan Evren, the sources said. Listed on the agenda were a constitutional referendum set for autumn this year, and a law providing for political parties and general elections in autumn 1983, with a conditional proviso for 1984 if "events" made this necessary.

The EEC sources said that Mr Thorn expressed his satisfaction at the news of Mr Ecevit's release and by the move to a democratic return, but recalled European Economic Community (EEC) concern -- a 12-man Council of Europe parliamentary delegation is currently in Turkey studying the situation there -- over the denial of defence rights at the Ankara trial of 52 members of DISK, the left-wing trade union.

The finalisation of the fourth EEC-Turkey financial accords will be decided by the ten EEC foreign ministers during an informal meeting here on Thursday and Friday. Negotiations on the 660 million dollar deal in loans and grants were concluded last June but its approval by the EEC Council of Ministers was delayed on Mr Ecevit's detention and the charging of the 52 trade unionists.

VAN DER STOEL 'REGRETS' GREEK STAND ON POLAND

[Text] Luanda, 9 Jan -- Netherlands Foreign Minister van der Stoel expressed his deepest regrets that Greece dissociated itself from the declaration by the 10 EEC partners on Poland. He hopes to be able to make a contribution in bilateral talks to preventing the gulf between Greece and the community from becoming too great.

The minister, who arrived in the Angolan capital, Luanda, for a 2-day visit yesterday, said that he hopes that we are dealing w-th a misunderstanding here. "It is a worrying development that Greece has dissociated itself from what was arrived at in proper consultations. I am convinced that it was, is and will remain the wish of the EEC nations as much as possible to attempt to clarify the background to and the reasons for such a stance in bilateral consultations," Van der Stoel said.

The Greeks chiefly object to a passage in the communique which states that the nonfulfillment of the legitimate wishes of the population in East Europe endangers public confidence in the possibility of cooperative links with East European countries and seriously affects international relations.

In general terms Van der Stoel expressed the hope that in the near future Greece will accept the EEC's "political achievement" (what joint foreign policy has been formulated) as well as its "community achievement" (what joint legislation has been passed in the community). Unlike the latter the former has no legally binding effect and is not automatically connected with EEC membership.

In the recent past the Greek Government has on several occasions rejected policies already forming part of European political cooperation. For example, Athens does not want to lend its support to the Venice declaration of June 1980, in which the then nine EEC nations formulated their policy on the Middle East. At the beginning of December Greece also refused to sign the communique of the NATO Council of Ministers. Contrary to general expectations Greece has also omitted establishing full diplomatic relations with Israel since its accession to the community.

SCHMIDT COMMENTS ON ASPECTS OF POLISH CRISIS

Relations With U.S.

LD121514 Hamburg DPA in German 1414 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Text] Hamburg, 12 Jan (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt is convinced that the Federal Republic will not be forced by the United States' anti-Soviet attitude to widen the gulf in its policy towards the USSR. In an interview in Thursday's issue of the Hamburg magazine STERN Schmidt points to the different interests of the United States and the Federal Republic: "The United States as a world power, pursues interests which encompass the whole globe. The main interest of the Germans, however, consists in reconciliation with our immediate neighbors." He said that the Federal Republic is in agreement with all alliance partners, however, about the necessity for NATO. "There is no NATO crisis," the chancellor stressed.

According to Schmidt the U.S. sanctions against the Soviet Union only have a slight economic effect, but a certain political role. They express the United States' determination to roll back Soviet pressure on developments in Poland. Moscow, on the other hand, has a strong political and military interest in preserving the postwar state of affairs because its own vital interests are at stake.

Schmidt said that the United States probably would not withdraw into a "neoisolationism" in anger at the German rejection of sanctions. Although there always were these tendencies in U.S. policy they never influenced official policy. "Isolationism would be linked with the United States' abdication as a world power," Schmidt added.

The interview was prereleased to DPA in an edited version by STERN.

Speaks to Bundestag Group

LD121750 Hamburg DPA in German 1633 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 12 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has expressed great concern at the continuing martial law in Poland and at the same time warned the East against jeopardizing cooperation with the West through repression in Poland. Addressing the SPD parliamentary group in Bonn today, Schmidt said that several factors pointed to a longer-term development being introduced in Poland which might lead away from the course of reforms and renewal. The hope that martial law will only be a temporary situation has so far not been fulfilled.

According to the parliamentary group spokesman, Knut Terjung, Schmidt described Poland's response to the West's demand for a lifting of martial law, the release of prisoners and a resumption of the dialogue with the church and with the Solidarity trade union as unsatisfactory. Addressing the Soviet Union and Poland, the chancellor warned that a continuation of the current situation in Poland will jeopardize the bases for cooperation with the West. The West must issue clear signals in this situation and say what it thinks of developments. It is the West's right that the human rights contained in the Helsinki Final Act be upheld in the European states.

At the same time, the chancellor affirmed the Federal Government's intention of continuing the policy of dialogue and cooperation with East Europe. The overall goal of the policy is still to help the Polish people in a situation which is very difficult to bear.

Together with its Western allies, Bonn wants to institute a policy of pressure and incentive aimed at getting the Polish process of reform and renewal underway again. According to Schmidt, the Western alliance is agreed that the Polish crisis should be regarded as a crisis of adjustment in the Soviet-dominated communist system. The West should not permit the Polish crisis to cause a crisis within its own alliance. Schmidt criticized the continued harsh repression in the Polish Communist Party. The measures relaxing martial law on 10 January, lifting censorship for foreign correspondents and allowing telephone communication, which in Schmidt's view are intended as a signal for the NATO council meeting, changed nothing with respect to the "substance of repression."

Schmidt made a strong plea for cohesion in the West. The scope of the German policy, which Bonn has successfully broadened during the past 10 years, will shrink considerably if the fundamental accord with the Western guarantor powers, especially the United States, is lost. The stronger the Federal Republic's position within the alliance, the more the views and special interests of the Germans can be upheld in the alliance.

SPD Chairman Willy Brandt, addressing the group, called for support for the Federal Government in its "very circumspect attitude" on the Polish question. Brandt strongly criticized the CSU and individual CDU spokesmen who, according to the SPD chairman, are using Poland in a detestable manner for a petty, hateful, and in practical terms unjustifiable clash with the chancellor, with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and with the SPD/FDP coalition. Brandt advised the SPD, therefore, to play "a bit more hard to get" than in the case of the resolution agreed by all parties on 18 December when it comes to a further Bundestag resolution on Poland this Thursday. SPD Parliamentary Group Leader Herbert Wehner stated that the Social Democrats must make it clear on Thursday, with the FDP in parliament, that the coalition stands together with regard to the important issues surrounding the Polish question. Brandt made a plea not to let the policy of detente, now of all times, be destroyed and he recommended the Federal Government to take especially seriously the careful examination of sanctions against Moscow and Warsaw agreed to by NATO.

Relations With France

[Text] Bonn, 12 Jan (DPA) -- On the eve of his meeting with French President Francois Mitterrand, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today described the relations between the two countries as close and trusting. There could be no question of a break in the Paris-Bonn axis, Schmidt told the SPD parliamentary group in Bonn with reference to the, in some cases, massive criticism in the French press of Bonn's attitude on the Polish crisis. According to SPD Parliamentary Group Spokesman Knut Terjung, Schmidt said that the attitudes of the French and German Governments were closely aligned.

There were no differences of opinion to be cleared up with Mitterrand on Wednesday, said the chancellor. In addition to the Polish question, which will be discussed on the basis of the NATO council statement, economic policy will be an equally important topic of discussion. Schmidt stressed that Mitterrand had strongly refuted in a talk with the German ambassador in Paris the impression created by the media of differences of opinion between the two governments.

Bonn-Paris Problems

DW131009 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1900 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Reporter Thomas interview with Chancellor Helmut Schmidt; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] What is the reason for your sudden trip to Paris? Are there still differences of opinion between Bonn and Paris which have to be eliminated?

[Answer] On the contrary, there are no differences of opinion at all. French External Relations Minister Cheysson, commented publicly and very convincingly on French television -- which I very much welcomed -- on the absurdity of some papers' insinuations that the German federal chancellor is aiming for neutralism. So this is not the reason. We also noted that yesterday the French president himself underlined the close cooperation and parallel attitudes of Paris and Bonn.

[Question] Still, aren't you worried by the sometimes very critical voices coming from France in connection with the German Government's attitude toward the Polish problem?

[Answer] You have to understand these voices coming from France. What is involved is the fight to reduce the French Communist Party which has so far acted in a most friendly way toward the Soviet Union and which is most Soviet-orientated.

[Question] So this is more a French domestic political problem?

[Answer] Oriented to domestic policy to a great degree, I would say.

DRESDNER BANK DIRECTOR VIEWS POLISH DEBT

[Text] Cologne, 13 Jan (DPA) -- In the view of Reinhold Stoessel, director of the Dresdner Bank, Poland is not expecting Soviet aid in solving its debt problem with its Western creditors. "There is obviously no prospect of this," said Stoessel in an interview with Deutschlandfunk in Cologne today. During the 1-day visit to Warsaw by Western bankers, an attempt was made to introduce a fresh idea into the situation: perhaps through the intervention of the international COMECON Bank in Moscow a new solution could be found to repay the remaining interest debts of less than $300 million. In its continuing difficult economic situation, Poland will not have sufficient foreign exchange available this year to meet its commitments, stressed Stoessel.

Strong assurance has been given in Warsaw that the outstanding debts will be paid but the Poles could give no firm date for this. The fact that an agreement on rescheduling the $2.4 billion loans from last year will not be reached until such time was described by Stoessel as an "immovable position." The Western banks have now adopted a waiting attitude.

It was earlier learned from circles of the approximately 500 Western creditors banks that Warsaw has meanwhile paid more than $50 million of the interest due for the fourth quarter of 1981, totalling $350 million to individual banks.

PROFESSOR DETAINED ON SUSPICION OF GDR ESPIONAGE

[Excerpts] Duesseldorf, 12 Jan (DPA) -- Forty-nine year old Peter Stichel, a professor of physics at Bielefeld University, is thought to have worked for the East Berlin Ministry for State Security. After several hours' interrogation by police and the public prosecutor's office, the professor was detained today under strong suspicion of carrying out espionage. A spokesman for the Duesseldorf public prosecutors' office told DPA in response to a question that the federal prosecutor general's office started investigations into Stichel as long ago as autumn 1981 which were then passed on to the Duesseldorf authorities. A decision as to whether the Duesseldorf public prosecutor's office will apply for an arrest warrant is to be made tomorrow.

JORDANIAN CROWN PRINCE MEETS CARSTENS, GENSCHER

[Text] Bonn, 12 Jan (DPA) -- The Jordanian crown prince, Hasan, expressed strong criticism in Bonn today of the Israeli Government's settlement policy and underlined the demand for the Palestinians' right to self-determination. The Israeli settlement policy has become the main obstacle to peace in the Middle East, Hasan said in a speech to the German Society for Foreign Policy.

During his 1-day working visit to Bonn, Hasan, a close associate of King Husayn, was received by Federal President Karl Carstens and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher for talks centering on developments in the Middle East and cooperation between Europe and the Arab countries. Carstens stressed in this respect Jordan's importance in solving the problems of this region. Genscher praised the "moderate policy of Jordan" in the Middle East. Genscher described relations between the two countries as friendly and cordial.

PAPER SEES AN 'ATLANTIC HURDLE' OVERCOME

[Commentary signed EIN.: "The Spiritual Gap"]

[Text] The U.S. secretary of state has given a great speech. It represents the exclamation point which the strongest alliance partner has placed at the end of the communique of the special Atlantic session. Haig spoke about Poland. That was the issue which the NATO council dealt with on Monday. The U.S. interpretation of the Polish situation is basically not much different from that of the Europeans. The political passion with which the United States rejects the situation in Poland is much greater by far than that of their allies. By proxy Haig formulated what his President and the U.S. voters feel. It is a kind of disgust with the reality that an entire nation is being oppressed. It is not merely the material misery which the Soviet kind of communism has imposed on the Poles. Haig disclosed the spiritual gap separating the East from the West. The United States is upset because their highest ideal for the citizen, freedom, is being trampled upon.

Thus Haig's speech was necessary. Now the NATO partners know that such special sessions cannot be mere routine conferences where political disagreement is covered up by semantics. There may be different opinions in the alliance on the value of sanctions or their uselessness, but Haig's speech should have made the Europeans realize that the United States considers the threat of sanctions -- as suggested by Reagan -- to be above all a political element of deterrence. It is supposed to prevent the Poles' from living without freedom forever.

If the United States wants to effect deterrence, then NATO must follow the paragraph of the communique which outlines the areas of possible reprisals against the East. If the Europeans try to dodge the issue or take refuge in such arguments as: Sanctions are a burden to detente and they call East-West trade into question which would cause the loss of jobs -- if this happens, it could be that United States would lose interest in the alliance. For the time being, however, it seems that an Atlantic hurdle has been overcome once again. The foreign ministers, including Haig departed Brussels with the feeling that the alliance had not just been chatting. One partner, however, has veered away -- namely the Greek ally. Apparently Athens is confusing NATO with the United Nations.

RISE IN UNEMPLOYMENT -- Nuremberg, 7Jan (DPA) -- The number of unemployed rose to 1,703,862 (7.3 percent) [DPA percentage presumably refers to percentage of total workforce] at the end of 1981. This was announced today by the Federal Labor Office in Nuremberg. In November the number of unemployed was 1,489,976 (6.4 percent). The number of part-time workers rose by 69,489 to 505,542 and the number of job vacancies fell by 13,951 to 118,410. The seasonably adjusted unemployment figure rose to 1,566,000. Youth unemployment rose by 16,948 to 156,591, which represents 6.9 percent. [Percentage presumably refers to percentage of youth workforce] [Excerpt] [Hamburg DPA in German 0944 GMT 7 Jan 82 LD]

CHEYSSON ON POLAND, AFRICA, NICARAGUA, MIDEAST

[Text] "In recent years not enough has been said about the fundamental aspects of the East-West conflict. It is not just so many divisions against so many divisions.... It is the struggle against totalitarianism," External Relations Minister Cheysson stated in an interview on the Radio Luxembourg-LE MONDE Grand Jury Program Sunday 10 January.

"The most important and serious response" for the socialist system -- the minister also said -- is to seize "this horrible opportunity (the Polish affair -- LE MONDE note), to unmask it, to reveal its mechanisms, logic and real nature. After all, that system has long tried to portray itself as a system of thought, a system of reasoning, an inspiration serving a class -- they used to say the proletariat. Well! I think the best reply that can be given to it, the reply which is most harmful to it, is to show that that is not true. The workers are in prison and the military in government!"

Asked "how to get out of Yalta," the minister first replied that it was not a question of getting out of what was "legally" the 1945 Yalta agreement between the great victors but of "the interpretation it is given." "The Red Army took a totalitarian system into the countries it was occupying," he said. "That is what is wrongly called Yalta."

On that basis Mr Cheysson said he thinks that the first thing to be done is not to allow East-West conflicts "to be necessarily transposed into the parts of the world it has not yet reached" and to encourage a real alignment in the Third World. Second, the minister said he thinks that "in Europe and on a slightly wider scale it is necessary to try to establish bridges between the two sides, in the knowledge that developments will be slow, that they will take years and years, and not being deceived and not thinking that the problems have been solved just because we have established trade relations, had slightly more frequent meetings and used the same expressions, very often with totally different connotations on the two sides."

"At times the will of the people has been seen to surface within the totalitarian system. The most overwhelming case is the events in Poland," the minister pointed out, expressing satisfaction at the French people's reaction. "What will happen next? I believe it is much too early to say. What will remain of the 1980-1981 renewal? For the time being nothing remains. We have regressed compared with the beginning of 1980.

Mr Cheysson then stressed that, while maintaining humanitarian aid to Poland, "we cannot have the kind of relations with the Polish Government and authorities which would enable us to discuss cooperation and ties while a number of unacceptable elements remain: martial law, the internment of a large number of leaders, especially trade union officials, and the absence of any dialogue with the country's political and social forces, in other words the destruction of everything which made up the renewal. While that continues we cannot have cooperative relations with the Polish authorities.... For the time being we cannot discuss the debt with the Poles.... We cannot envisage those kind of talks with a government and authorities which have -- I will not repeat my three points -- declared martial law, interned trade union leaders and suspended, annulled and destroyed the renewal process."

Soviet Gas

As for sanctions against the USSR, Mr Cheysson said, "We must not sanction ourselves.... We need Soviet gas," he pointed out, adding that the United States is taking care not to call into question the "deal of the century" involving the sale of U.S. grain to the USSR.

Mr Cheysson certainly does not think that [FRG] Chancellor Schmidt is tempted by neutralism. It is "glaringly absurd," he said, to regard him as a "secret neutralist."

Questioned on arms sales, especially to Nicaragua, Mr Cheysson stated: "You cannot say that that country is 'red' because it buys Soviet arms and at the same time criticize it now because it wants, symbolically, to buy arms which are not Soviet but French.... Helping a country to assert its independence is a fundamental element of policy."

He denied that there had been any question of arms sales during his recent visit to Ethiopia. The first thing the Ethiopians asked him to do was to extend the teaching of French. However, he did not conceal the fact that he would have preferred to meet with the Ethiopian head of state in Addis Ababa -- which had originally been intended -- rather than in Eritrea, in Asmara, which is a disputed region. "I went where he was," he said.

With regard to Chad Mr Cheysson stated: "It is not for us to say that Hissein Habre should be crushed, that there should be negotiations with Hissein Habre or that Hissein Habre should be isolated. Certainly not! We support the national unity transition government."

Finally the minister denied wanting to bury the Egyptian-Israeli Camp David agreement. "I am not burying anything," he said. "It is perfectly possible to move beyond Camp David after the withdrawal from Sinai, in other words from 26 April. But if Camp David became inspired, if other countries entered into that negotiation, something might perhaps be made of it, but we certainly cannot see it."

Finally, questioned on the postponement of Mr Mitterrand's visit to Israel, Mr Cheysson stated: "The visit will take place, the preparatory arrangements have been suspended following the law on the Golan Heights passed by the Knesset, which is an unacceptable law and a real provocation to international law."

He admitted that France "does not have any clout" in the Near East but, he said, that is no reason for "not saying what we think."

MITTERAND, MARCHAIS RECEIVE JARUZELSKI LETTERS

LD130900 Paris Domestic Service in French 0800 GMT 13 Jan 82

[Text] In Poland, General Jaruzelski has been writing letters. He has sent letters to Francois Mitterrand and Georges Marchais. The president revealed this on 12 January at the National Assembly during a ceremony to present new year wishes. The contents of the letter are still a mystery. Francois Mitterrand said that Jaruzelski's message was addressed to France and that it was interesting; no more details are known. Georges Marchais was not much more explicit and only indicated that Jaruzelski's letter followed his own anxieties. Theoretically, the letter received by Georges Marchais could be published on 14 January.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION TO CONTINUE WITH POLAND

[Text] Paris, 12 Jan (AFP) -- France will continue economic cooperation with Poland unless the situation there undergoes modification, secretary-general at the Presidential Office, Pierre Beregovoy, said today at the close of a restricted cabinet session.

Asked about sanctions, Mr Beregovoy said that France had already made its position known in a North Atlantic Treaty Organization statement in Brussels yesterday that blamed Moscow for the crisis but left sanctions up to each individual government.

LE MONDE SEES 'GAMBLE' ON NICARAGUA ARMS DEAL

[Editorial: "A Dangerous Gamble"]

[Text] The arms contract concluded in December between Paris and the Sandinist authorities and revealed by L'EXPRESS Thursday [7 January] during Hernu's visit to Washington has a mainly symbolic value. Indeed, two coastal patrol boats, two helicopters and a few trucks are not likely to enable Managua's revolutionary regime to effectively export its anti-Americanism. Nonetheless by giving military support to the Nicaraguan revolutionaries the French Government is again challenging the United States in a region which it traditionally regards as very "sensitive."

Mr Mitterrand has never concealed his sympathy for the Sandinistas. As soon as he took office he had a meeting at the Elysee with Sandinist Foreign Minister Father d'Escoto and then sent Cheysson to Managua. These gestures, as well as the appointment of Regis Debray as adviser to the Elysee, had somewhat worried and even irritated Washington. The French-Mexican statement in August recognizing the two revolutionary fronts in El Salvador as "representative forces" had confirmed the United States' suspicions.

The gamble which France seems to be taking is dangerous. The French leaders do not think that the course of the Sandinist revolution is irreversible as yet and believe that there may be time to change it. That analysis is entirely different from the one made in Washington: In the view of the United States it is to a considerable extent a Castroist-type process which has started in Nicaragua. As proof of that they cite the systematic elimination of the most moderate elements which had contributed to the Somoza dictatorship's fall. In addition Washington states that it is convinced that arms intended for the Salvadoran guerrillas are passing through Nicaragua.

The arguments put forward by Paris have little chance of convincing the United States. The equipment sold, people here are saying, is more defensive than offensive and is not reexportable. But that nonreexportation clause is a part of all contracts and this does not prevent it from being regularly violated. It is better, the French Government adds, for the Sandinistas to turn to France than to the USSR. That may be so.

However, it is probable that this affair will not produce a serious crisis between Paris and Washington. As far as the United States is concerned, France's stance on Poland is much more important than its sympathies for the Central American revolutionaries. There are already sufficiently serious disagreements between West Europe and the United States for them to avoid any further serious deterioration in transatlantic relations, in the short term it is the Europeans' attitude toward the Polish crisis and the USSR which Washington regards as most important.

POLICE ARREST ANOTHER ALLEGED RED BRIGADES MEMBER

[Text] Rome, 13 Jan (ANSA) -- The search is still going on for links between the Red Brigades members detained in Rome last weekend and the kidnappers of U.S. Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier abducted in Verona almost a month ago, according to police sources here. But the sources said yesterday that the wave of Red Brigades arrests had also led to another member of the urban guerrilla organization, 42-year-old Professor Fernando Iannetti, a lecturer in moral philosophy at the University of Salerno.

According to the sources, Iannetti is a friend of Red Brigades ideologist Giovanni Senzani, the criminologist arrested last Saturday in a Rome apartment. Iannetti was arrested Monday evening in an apartment in Formia, between Rome and Naples. The sources said the apartment contained nothing suspicious, leading them to argue that it was what anti-terrorist experts call a "cold hideout." According to this theory, the apartment was to be used to house another kidnap victim, possibly Fiat Managing-Director Cesare Romiti, whose kidnapping two Red Brigades members, Stefano Petrella and Ennio di Rocco, are suspected of readying when they were arrested in downtown Rome on January 4.

In another development, an unidentified youth was arrested Monday evening because he was carrying a revolver. According to police sources, the youth is thought to be a member of the Red Brigades unit, the March 28 Column, which claimed responsibility for the January 6 wounding of Nicola Simone, deputy chief of the Roman section of the Italian anti-terrorist corps.

As for the Dozier kidnapping, police sources in Verona said one of the most accredited hypotheses is that the "people's prison" where he is held is not far from the northern Italian town where he was abducted. According to one of the investigators, "it has been amply shown that the Red Brigades choose their bases in urban zones, preferably with a dense population, where they can pass unobserved." Nonetheless, with some sources reporting that as many as three hundred searches have so far been carried out in the most densely populated zones of Verona, no progress has apparently been made.

The same is true of the January 3 jail break in which four women urban guerrillas escaped from the penitentiary in Rovigo near Verona. Currently, the investigators tend to rule out any link between the most recent Red Brigades arrests and the assault on Rovigo jail.

In the meantime, police sources in Rome refuse to comment on statements from the defense lawyer of Petrella and Di Rocco that their clients claim to have been tortured by the police after their arrest. The two defendants advanced the accusation to the magistrate named to question them and, according to their lawyer, he too will present a description of the events to the magistrates.

In other developments, police sources claimed that the Soviet-made bazooka and two French-made air-air missiles found in one of the Red Brigades hideouts found this weekend in Rome were going to be used against the Italian Christian Democrat Party's national headquarters in the capital's Eur residential neighborhood. Without explaining how they had reached this conclusion, the sources also ruled out the original hypothesis that the weapons were to be used against one of the maximum security jails where Red Brigades leaders are held.

Party Meeting Attack Thwarted

[Excerpt] Rome, 12 Jan (AFP) -- The arsenal uncovered here on Saturday by police when raiding three hideouts of the Red Brigades was to have been used in an attack on the Christian Democratic Party headquarters, informed sources said today. Among the arms seized, according to the sources, were numbers of French-built rockets. The attack had been planned by the brigades for the next meeting of the Christian Democrats' national leadership.

POPE RECEIVES LETTERS FROM JARUZELSKI, WALESA

[Text] Vatican City, 12 Jan (ANSA) -- Pope John Paul II today received a letter from the Polish prime minister and head of the Polish Communist Party, General Wojciech Jaruzelski, in reply to the message from the pontiff given to the Polish leader on Christmas Eve by the apostolic nuncio, Msgr Luigi Poggi.

The letter was handed to the pope by the head of the Polish delegation for permanent contact with the Holy See, Kazimerz Szablewski, during a private audience in the Vatican. Szablewski was the first representative of the Warsaw government to be received by the Polish-born pontiff since the proclamation of martial law in the Eastern European country on December 13.

A communique released by the Vatican press office today also disclosed that the pontiff had received a reply to his letter to the leader of Poland's Solidarnosc independent labor movement, Lech Walesa. The papal letters to Walesa, to Polish primate Msgr Jozef Glemp, and "through him, to the entire Polish episcopacy" as well as to Cardinal Franzisek Macharski, the archbishop of Krakow, were copies of the letter the pontiff addressed to General Jaruzelski the head of the Vatican press office, Father Romeo Panciroli, said.

The Vatican did not disclose the contents of the Polish leader's message to the pope but reported, in the communique, segments of the pope's message to the general. In his message, the pontiff lodged the plea that "no more Polish blood be shed and that the state siege in effect in the country be abolished." The communique also disclosed that the Pope voiced hopes that the reform of Polish society, following the peaceful beginning in August 1980, "might return to peaceful methods, which are difficult but not impossible."

The Vatican press office chief said that copies of this letter had also been delivered to the heads of all the government and states represented as signatories of the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference on European Security and Cooperation.

PCI'S COSSUTTA CRITICIZES PARTY STANCE ON POLAND

[PCI Secretariat member Armando Cosutta article: "How I Disagree With Document on Poland"]

[Text] The tragic events in Poland have prompted -- and are still prompting -- deliberations among us that are not unamimous but which we must strive to make really thorough so as to produce the most unitary results possible by means of a committed debate capable of involving hundreds of thousands of members, the entire party.

Basically, I express my disagreement with the resolution drawn up by the Secretariat on the Directorate's instructions precisely because I consider that it does not facilitate the necessary unitary conclusions. In fact, while on some points it is creatively and innovatively consistent with the major and fertile line of our deliberations over the decades. on other points it constitutes not only a swing, a turning point, but a "rupture" with our tradition and history (as well as with some fundamental congress theses).

Audacity is needed in the task of regeneration. But the party is not be be regenerated by extirpating its roots. There is a danger (and more than a danger) of undermining its conscience and strength and even jeopardizing its very future.

For instance, the resolution in effect "eliminates" all the socialist societies hitherto realized. Is such a drastic and final verdict justified? I am not convinced, and believe that this should be discussed openly.

Are we agreed on the option to develop relations in the "same way," as the resolution puts it (except that this does not mean "in full autonomy and never uncritically," which is, however, obvious and was always taken for granted) with, for instance, the parties of Fidel Castro, Giap, Tito and Kadar and "in the same way" with the reformist parties, with the parties of La Pasionaria, Deng Xiaoping and Brezhnev "in the same way" as with any social democratic party?

Does all this not mean perhaps that what this resolution expresses is not a distancing or a criticism or a serious disagreement with respect to the USSR's communist party and others, but the desire for a real "rupture"?

We must all strive to build, by means of an honest, broad and responsible debate, the conditions for an elucidation that will lead to the most unitary possible conclusions within our party.

This is the aim that prompts me to contribute some observations, though I am aware that the document as a whole requires -- and will require -- further in-depth analysis.

I believe that there are two prime points of broadest convergence to which one can refer: 1) There is virtually total acknowledgement of the decisive importance that the October Revolution and socialist building primarily in the USSR "have had" in the whole of world history, in mankind's progress; 2) there is also a shared, and not recent, awareness that neither the USSR nor any other of the present socialist countries can be taken as a valid "model" for the establishment of socialism in the West.

In fact we believe that socialism can only be established in the West if combined with "full" democracy. Or, more precisely, that the particular history of Western Europe, of our country, makes it necessary and possible to approach the problem of how to transcend capitalism only on this plane. Let it be clear that this does not in the least mean -- at least, so I believe -- that the democratic "principle" is valid only for the West and in no way concerns the present socialist countries or other areas of the world. Indeed it is true that "principles" stem from real conditions and assert themselves -- through men's awareness, decisions and actions -- in relation to "specific" historical possibilities. No real conditions, however, can stem solely from "principles."

Moreover, it is not true that the huge effort made and the results already achieved and those which can still be achieved by the USSR and the other socialist countries (under particular historical conditions, certainly not favorable, partly because of the capitalist powers' aggressive hostility) in the direction of the "liberation" of millions and millions of people from poverty and ignorance, in the building of a society aimed at asserting the "principles" of equality and solidarity, at restoring dignity and a human meaning to production and at guaranteeing work for all and satisfying the basic social needs, liberating women, protecting children and health, promoting high levels of mass education and the development of science and safeguarding and making the best use of territory -- these no longer have a precise significance not only for the peoples of the Third and Fourth worlds but even for the West European people's masses. This effort and these results have not exhausted their propulsive capacity and, albeit at different levels of awareness, in fact represent, I believe, a "permanent" reference point and ideological stimulus.

Not the least important reason for this is the fact that by means of this effort and these results, which it was possible to achieve outside the capitalist framework, a "pole" of world development alien and antagonistic to the logic of imperialism has been established.

Having said that, however, we do not of course want to close our eyes to another fact: That the very results achieved pose more and more serious problems for the socialist societies with regard to freedoms and even the economy and consumption.

But in this connection what is needed is certainly not an alignment with those who try to exaggerate its effects, to the extent of using it as an adequate argument for explaining even tragic events, such as Poland's.

These difficulties prompt in us, however, a just and salutary reaction if they shake a possible erroneous belief that our "revolutionary" task could consist essentially of preparing to adopt, within a framework of developed democracy, socialism as a fruit ripened on a tree that had already been planted elsewhere and that was now growing inexorably, discounting outside attacks. Instead, we must be fully convinced of something of which Lenin himself was aware, namely the necessity, for the very development of socialism as hitherto realized, of a revolutionary "rupture" at the summits of capitalist development. And the more convinced we are of this, the more we must approach ourselves, our strategy and our practice with the responsibility, lucidity and rigor required of a revolutionary party.

A new phase in the "international" struggle for socialism cannot be supported and prompted by a dismissive attitude toward the experiences of socialism as hitherto realized, but requires a clear theoretical and scientific basis, which does not consist solely of an option -- however correct and indeed necessary -- for democracy, participation and pluralism, but which also involves the hitherto unresolved problems of social and production relations. Without this, the appeal to "revolution in the West" will for some people remain a mere, albeit most lofty, exhortation. For others, I fear, it will be an alibi to conceal their real view of a new order, admittedly founded on democracy and accentuation of public involvement in the economic and social fields -- but not in forms likely to promote the elimination of capitalist domination in society. This applies in fact to the view of the most advanced sector of social democrats -- in fact an abandonment of socialism, albeit in a new form.

As can be seen, there are undoubtedly many problems struggling for in-depth analysis and proper reflection in practice within the party, partly because of methods relating to its internal life, which must be promptly revised. But I believe there is now one point above all that must be made the subject of an entirely lucid debate. The question is whether the opportunities for a revolutionary process in the West could remain in the event of a lapse by the "fixed point" constituted by the presence and strength of the USSR -- despite its errors -- on the world scene, capable of keeping the breach in the capitalist system open by facing up -- including militarily, in the final analysis -- to the "natural" U.S. impetus to restore capitalist rule worldwide. In fact this impetus is now becoming more and more acute and threatening as the capitalist countries themselves become aware of the consequences of the growth -- even amid huge difficulties and contradictions -- of the Third and Fourth world peoples' emancipation process. These consequences are accumulating and exacerbating the capitalist contradictions, particularly between the United States and Europe, and also contradictions within individual countries between developed democracy and capitalism.

All this creates a situation open to prospects of both reaction and revolution. And I have no doubt that such a situation would inevitably plunge, on both the international and the domestic plane, toward the most barbaric forms of reaction if the Soviet "counterbalance" were to be seriously weakened or even disappear.

A lucid appraoch must also be adopted toward the subject, to which I have already referred, of the nature of the party. "Diplomatic" or truncated debates are not at all a good defense against the "adversary" because they do not build real party unity. They crystallize "interpretative" tendencies and reduce the chances of members making their influence felt and identifying with party actions and thus taking a leading role in its life.

Election results and membership figures are undoubtedly significant indications of the party's state of health. But for a party such as ours, I believe that figures for active involvement would be even more significant. (and such figures, albeit approximate, should not be impossible to obtain). For instance, figures showing how this has varied over the past decade.

I consider "centralism" justified by the need to impart to our party's action all the strength it needs -- but not simply to cope with the situation but to change it. What is indispensable to this end is the gaining of members' "active consensus." This constitutes the best guarantee of a democratic approach in our method of internal life.

POPE MEETS FRANCE'S CHEYSSON, UNESCO'S M'BOW

[Text] Vatican City, 9 Jan (ANSA) -- The Polish situation and the crisis in the Mid-East, particularly Lebanon, were discussed here today by French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson and Polish-born Pope Paul II, qualified Vatican sources disclosed. Cheysson is the first minister of the government of newly-elected French Socialist President Francois Mitterrand to pay a visit to the Vatican. Official spokesman for the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church refused to release any details on the meeting, which reportedly also included talks with Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Agostino Casaroli. Cheysson was accompanied by a delegation from his Foreign Ministry which included East European expert Harris Puisais.

In another development, the Vatican press office announced that the pope today also received the general-director of the United Nations UNESCO organization, the Senegalese Amadou m'Bow. The UNESCO leader met with the pope last year when John Paul II visited the Paris UNESCO headquarters. This is also his second meeting with the pope in the Vatican.

POPE DONATES MONEY FOR FOOD AID TO POLAND

LD091630 Vatican City in English to Central and West Europe 1445 GMT 9 Jan 82

[Text] The holy father has placed the sum of (?100 million) lira at the disposal of Italian CARITAS. The sum consists of contributions coming to him from various countries, and is to be utilized to alleviate the current food shortage in Poland. The funds will be used for the purchase and sending of foodstuffs to the welfare commission of the Polish [word indistinct] conference. Italian CARITAS [words indistinct] to purchase with the money almost 100 tons of sugar, which it will transport to Poland in four trucks in the next few days. The president of Italian CARITAS, (?Monsignor Pasiolo), has sent a cable to the holy father, expressing his gratitude for (?this) generous gesture of confidence in the pastoral organ of coordination of the Italian church.

Bishops Appeal for Solidarity

[Text] Rome, 9 Jan (ANSA) -- An appeal to the Italian Roman Catholic ecclesiastical community to express "their solidarity in a concrete manner" with the Polish people was launched here today by Italy's episcopal conference. The communique from the gathering of Italian Roman Catholic bishops, who concluded four days of discussions here on January 7, maintained that the situation in Poland is "a danger for world peace and constitutes, alongside of the problems of assuring a more peaceful social cohabitation in Italy, one of the principal concerns of the moment for Italian bishops."

Appealing for the solidarity of members of Roman Catholic religious communities in Italy, the communique described the Polish people as being put "to a severe test" by the efforts enacted "to freely express their deep aspirations and responsibly affirm their basic rights".

GONCALVES PEREIRA INTERVIEWED ON EEC, AFRICA

PM130815 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 21 Dec 81 pp 7-8

[Helena Marques 15 December interview in Lisbon with Foreign Minister Andre Goncalves Pereira]

[Text] [Question] Francois Mitterrand's official visit to Lisbon having taken place a few days ago we would like you to tell us the results of the talks specifically, with respect to joining the EEC and the separation of the Portuguese and Spanish dossiers.

[Answer] Even before that point I would like to mention that the visit was also extremely important for another aspect which concerns the entire Portuguese people, and that is the situation of the Portuguese community in France. In fact both President Metterrand and External Relations Minister Cheysson reaffirmed, not only publicly but also in the greatest detail at the working meetings, this idea which is particularly attractive and important for the Portuguese people: the idea that those who contributed to France's prosperity while Europe's progress and economy were moving upward will not now find France's doors closed to them when there is recession and international difficulties. It is an attractive idea; it is a generous idea, which is in the spirit of the setting up of a ministry of solidarity in the new French Government, which is directly responsible for the immigrants' situation, and it was, of course, an idea which the Portuguese Government received with pleasure. At the same time, there was the guarantee, which was reaffirmed by the president and by the minister, that there would be no obstacles to the remittance of the proceeds of their work by the immigrants.

Another issue which was examined and to which the French Government also promised to devote its closest attention was the normalizing of the situation of the Portuguese immigrants who are in France illegally having entered clandestinely. The French Government has already adopted measures which I can describe as generous in this respect. Specific instances in which the measures adopted by the French Government are perhaps not sufficient were pointed out, and the French Government promised to devote its closest attention to these matters. So in this issue the results of President Mitterrand's visit were positive.

Returning to the question you asked me, concerning joining the EEC, the visit was also extremely positive, both in President Mitterrand's public statements -- specifically, in the speech at the Ajuda Palace and at the press conference -- and also, in greater detail, in the talks I held with Claude Cheysson.

France acknowledges that the Spanish and Portuguese processes for joining the EEC are essentially different. This is a thesis which the Portuguese Government has always maintained, not because of a matter of precedence -- we are not in a race against anybody -- nor, obviously, do we desire to delay Spain's entry, all that we desire is that our process should not be harmed by matters in which we have no part. But it is natural that the scale of the Spanish economy and its interconnections -- specifically, with the French economy -- should pose France greater problems than Portugal's membership. This is indeed the case. This is why we have been demanding that there by no lumping together in the examination of the two processes, because that would mean that any delay in Spain's entry would entail a similar delay in our process. This is the decision now made on the part of France by President Mitterrand. Of course, this does not mean that there aren't still many problems to be negotiated with France, with the other countries and with the EEC institutions. But a very important step forward has been taken. And although Mitterrand, in accepting the separation of processes, was careful to state that he was speaking on behalf of France and that he could not speak on behalf of the 10 EEC countries, we know from statements which have repeatedly been made to us that the nine other countries do not insist on lumping the applications together and raise no objection to separation.

British Prime Minister Mrs Margaret Thatcher told the Portuguese prime minister this just a few days ago. The ministers of the other countries concerned have also said so; Italian Minister Emilio Colombo said so recently. So this leads us to believe that this stance on the part of France could contribute to a separate examination of the two processes, and that, of course, because the case of Portugal is less significant within Europe as a whole, could lead to a more rapid resolution of these matters. To this end we will conduct diplomatic initiatives -- and I must say that these initiatives will be conducted at the highest level -- it being expected that we will make visits to the EEC countries and to the EEC bodies.

[Question] In light of the situation which you have just mentioned, do you envisage that the timetable laid down for membership can be adhered to?

[Answer] It is extraordinarily difficult -- and recent experience demonstrates this -- to make an exact forecast. What I can tell you is that we are currently encouraged to believe that the signing of the treaty of accession will be possible before the end of 1982 -- hence within a year -- setting aside 1983 for the ratifications by the 10 states, and 1 January 1984 being the date of Portugal's actual entry. However, I must tell you quite sincerely: We have already been mistaken in these forecasts, as have been, moreover, other officials. So it is not a timetable which we can put forward as certain; it is a timetable for which we will work and which we believe it is possible to maintain. It does not depend solely on us; the good will which has been expressed by political leaders must also materialize at the level of implementation.

Poland

[Question] The events in Poland have shaken public opinion throughout the West, although they were not wholly unexpected. Did the Portuguese foreign minister have prior knowledge of the imminence of the events?

[Answer] I did not exactly have prior knowledge of what was going to happen. But it is obvious that during last week there were events -- specifically, the postponement of visits to be paid to Poland and the hastening of certain meetings which were taking place in Warsaw -- which suggested that something was going to happen. It is obvious that what happened was one of the possible scenarios -- already envisaged, moreover, within the Atlantic alliance. But I did not know, nor did anybody in Portugal know, exactly what was going to happen. This assertion may have a slightly categorical tone, but it is my personal conviction that there was nobody in Portugal who was informed.

[Question] Does the current situation in Poland and -- its foreseeable evolution -- constitute a real threat to peace in Europe and to world peace?

[Answer] From my viewpoint and from the government's viewpoint, repeatedly expressed within the cabinet, the situation is already extremely grave, although unfortunately, it could become even graver. There are currently no signs of movements by Soviet troops or those of other Warsaw Pact countries, and so it cannot be said that a foreign military intervention, such as happened in Hungary and in Czechoslovakia, has been noted. However, there are about 60,000 Soviet troops in Poland and there are about 48,000 on the GDR's border with Poland. So there are already forces there which are not in action but whose presence is obviously a threat. That is why we believe that the events are already very grave, because although they have an internal Polish aspect, they transcend that aspect. And it is for this reason that the government felt not only obliged but entitled to make known its viewpoints on the matter, just as other governments have done. For instance, I should say that the French Premier issued a statement on Sunday expressing his concern at the events in Poland, in addition to canceling the visit which he was to pay to that country. Why do we believe that this is not a mere internal event? Of course, Portugal respects other countries' internal problems. The event is not merely internal simply because it stems, in our opinion, from the pressures exerted on Poland by the Soviet Union. Those pressures are countless. I will recall the note sent by the Moscow government to the Warsaw government 17 September this year, in which there was a more or less veiled threat of intervention.

And it is obvious that these actions taken by the Warsaw government are the result of foreign pressure. We have no doubt about this, and I must say that there are no doubts in the West, and there will be few doubts even in Poland. There may be people who believe that this averted a greater evil, which would be an actual Soviet armed intervention with bloodshed. However, as I said, the matter is not merely internal. There are matters which appear to be internal but which take on such an international importance that other countries must express their opinions on them. Such as the instance of apartheid: All the state bodies in Portugal have declared themselves opposed to apartheid. It is a purely internal problem of South Africa, which is not seeking to export apartheid. However, we believe -- both the president during his recent visit to Africa and the government -- that although the internal nature of the problem is obvious, it is subject to international criticism because it is a violation of human rights and because its existence threatens peace in southern Africa.

Now, while keeping a sense of proportion, what is happening in Poland is very similar. It is an action which apparently is taking place inside the country but which represents a violation of human rights and a violation of trade union freedoms which obviously threatens peace because it is a further step toward a possible Soviet intervention.

Moreover, from a strictly legal viewpoint, Poland and Portugal are signatories of the 1979 Helsinki Final Act, in which both countries undertook to respect a large number of public freedoms -- specifically freedom of expression and assembly, the right to individual freedom and trade union freedom. All these rights have been systematically violated, I would say, in virtually all the Warsaw Pact countries. We might mention the instance of the dissidents in the Soviet Union, the arrest of thousands of trade union leaders in Poland and the arrest -- not as yet confirmed but announced -- of the leader Lech Walesa, which are instances of flagrant violations of international commitments. The Portuguese Government cannot place itself in a situation of merely keeping silent about actions which affront human dignity and agreed international commitments. Moreover, although we have not as yet had direct communication with the Portuguese Embassy in Warsaw, the Portuguese Government is sufficiently well-informed about what is happening, both through the news media and through contacts with European Atlantic alliance member countries, to be able to express an opinion confidently and with knowledge of the facts on the situation existing in Poland. Not only several governments but even -- and I would like to mention this -- West European communist parties have done likewise. The Netherlands Communist Party was particularly vehement in that condemnation; the PCE has just expressed condemnation. When parties linked with the Polish United Workers Party by ties of solidarity in the Third International do not refrain from adopting this stance, it would be strange if a government whose options are clearly different did not do so. Therefore the Portuguese Government is not only performing a duty but is also exercising an inalienable right in condemning the situation existing in Poland. And it is also doing so in accordance with the provisions of the constitution: Article 7 of the Constitution enshrines the right of all peoples to self-determination, which is precisely what is being pointed out and demanded. I would also like to state that, contrary to what has been said, most Western governments and parliaments, including virutally all NATO members, have publicly condemned the Polish Government's action. But the Portuguese Government decides on its own and has no lessons to learn in this respect.

[Question] To what extent will the situation in Poland affect the progress of the Geneva talks between the United States and the Soviet Union?

[Answer] I am in no position to answer that question at this moment, although I have been in touch with one of the sides in those talks. However, I have no reliable information which would enable me to answer you, but I can say that the deterioration of the Polish situation will certainly have repercussions on the Geneva talks, and they will not, of course, be favorable repercussions.

NATO

[Question] During a recent visit by Portuguese journalists to NATO headquarters we were told repeatedly that any debate on the allocation or redefining of commands would be held following Spain's joining the Atlantic alliance. Could the timing of decisions be deterimental to Portugal?

[Answer] I do not know who gave you that information.... NATO officials, I suppose....

[Question] Exactly.

[Answer] That information is formally correct but fundamentally incorrect. It is formally correct because the Atlantic alliance treaty of 4 April 1949, to which Spain will now accede, is different from NATO's military organization, which Spain has not as yet joined, although it is assumed that it will join. Their structures do not coincide; moreover, France is a member of the former and not of the latter. Hence stems the idea -- which, incidentally, has already been expressed in several newspapers, specifically in DIARIO DE NOTICIAS -- that there are two junctures here which would be unfavorable to Portugal; first, Spain would join the Atlantic alliance, and next, as a member state, would discuss its participation in the military organization. But the Portuguese Government, however incompetent its foreign minister, knows about this characteristic of the organization. And so it has adopted the necessary measures and secured the essential guarantees prior to the signing of the protocol of accession which I had the pleasure of signing in Brussels last Thursday. The rule of unanimity applies here, just as it will also apply to Spain's joining the military organization. But in order to prevent problems arising, the Portuguese Government consulted all the other sectors concerned and the Spanish Government itself, securing from everybody an assurance that Spain's possible inclusion in the military organization would not alter the command zones which affect Portugal, and hence would not jeopardize Portugal's strategic interests. Briefly, it can be said that the line which is taking shape is for Spain to form part of the European command -- SACEUR (Supreme Allied Command Europe) -- with its headquarters in Brussels, while the Portuguese territory will remain part of SACLANT (Supreme Allied Command Atlantic), with its headquarters in Norfolk, in the United States, and with a command here in Lisbon -- the IBERLANT. If that is the case there will therefore be no alteration in the command zones affecting Portugal. If that does not happen and if any alteration contrary to Portuguese strategic interests occurs, then Portugal, in view of the requirement of the rule of unanimity will be perfectly able to dispute this and possibly to prevent its happening. So although I can understand some historical concern among the public -- because we cannot forget that Portugal's history records some influences, not always positive, in our relations with Spain -- I must say that I find those apprehensions, which are understandable in certain ill-informed circles, surprising on the part of those who hold or have held responsibilities in the international sphere.

[Question] Continuing to talk about Spain, doesn't the current instability in the Spanish Armed Forces pose dangers for Portugal?

[Answer] I will begin by saying that it is not for me to comment on the internal situation in Spain, although, as may be imagined, we are following it with the utmost attention. For instance, I can tell you that I spent the whole night of 23 February [date of attempted coup in Spain] here in this office: This in itself demonstrates that virtually everything that happens in Spain has repercussions on Portugal. And if a grave deterioration in the situation of the democratic institutions in Spain occurred now, I fear that this would have some, certainly not favorable, influence. Our democratic institutions are functioning, but they are still relatively young, there are still certain signs of weakness, and it would not be desirable to put them to the test of an influence of the kind I have just mentioned. So, while repeating that we do not wish to express opinions on the evolution of the internal situation in Spain, we sincerely hope that the Spanish State's democratic institutions will be able to surmount the difficulties confronting them, and I am also convinced that Spain's joining the Atlantic alliance will be, among others, a factor of stabilization.

Mozambique

[Question] Could you take stock for us of the president's visit to Africa, in which you also took part?

[Answer] Certainly, although I must tell you that the visit was the president's visit, and it is for the president to take stock of it more authoritatively than I could do. However, I took part in the visit, and so I can give my viewpoint; and it is not a personal viewpoint but the viewpoint of the government, which took part in organizing and carrying out the visit. The visit was extremely positive in Mozambique, and also positive, although, of course, less significant, in Zambia and Tanzania. In Mozambique the visit had a historical significance of turning over a page, which is extremely important. Following decolonization there is always a certain period when relations between the new country and the former mother country are marked by traces of bitterness on both sides; and this has happened in the case of all countries which have been decolonized. For instance, in France there are still consequences of the war in Algeria (look at the controversy now created over the possible restoration to Algeria of the historical archives concerning that former French territory, which clearly demonstrates that the traumas of decolonization have not as yet been finally surmounted). I do not know whether they have been completely surmounted in Portugal, too, but we have the impression that, certainly on the part of the state bodies and of most of the public, the page has indeed been turned.

We also believe that this page is in the process of being turned by the Mozambican state. It is clear that decolonization does not only cause traumas in the colonizer; it also causes them in the colonized, and there is a stage when, of course, the former colonizer is blamed for all the shortcomings and difficulties of society. That stage, which has existed in all the former colonies, is in the process of being surmounted. Time is passing and is healing the wounds that can be healed. Moreover, Mozambique is at a stage in its economic and social development when it has much to gain from the economic and technical assistance which the Portuguese people can give it. And I say "the Portuguese people" advisedly, because it is not merely a matter of interstate tasks which should be performed, but of individual tasks, performed by individuals in the capacity of overseas workers or by enterprises.

The enthusiasm with which the president was received by the population, not only of Maputo but of all the areas he visited in Mozambique, clearly demonstrates that there is in fact no resentment against Portugal among the Mozambican population. On the contrary, I would even say that there is a natural and spontaneous feeling of rapprochement which was, moreover, extremely precious, and even moving, for any Portuguese to ascertain. So the visit was extremely opportune because it gave the world evidence of that resumption of relations, which, moreover, stems essentially from the sixth constitutional government and the initiative of Dr sa Carneiro, who wrote a letter to President Samora Machel and who paved the way for a new understanding between the two states. President Samora Machel had occasion to tell me personally -- and, moreover, he said this publicly -- that he believes that Prime Minister sa Carneiro was the principal sponsor of the reconcilation between the two peoples. It is worth mentioning that at the time of Dr sa Carneiro's tragic death President Samora Machel went personally to the Portuguese Embassy to sign the book of condolences, which was not formally required of him, and it was a demonstration of esteem for the Democratic Alliance government, which continues Dr sa Carneiro's work, as President Machel confirmed to me by the invitation extended to Dr Pinto Balsemao to pay an official visit to Mozambique.

I said a short while ago that the visit to Zambia and Tanzania was less important than the visit to Mozambique. However I would not like to be misinterpreted or interpreted as being less polite toward those countries which invited the president. The visits were important, but, obviously, we do not have ties with those countries like those which bind us to Mozambique. However the talks -- specifically, with President Kaunda and with President Nyerere, who are men of great experience and great prestige in Africa -- were of the utmost importance and will be followed by other contacts.

[Question] Within the context of European-African dialogue, President Mitterrand referred in Lisbon to a triangle among Portugal, France and Africa. Do you believe that there are prospects for a rapid realization of this triangular cooperation?

[Answer] I not only believe but find that there are already several actions to that end. President Mitterrand also said that France's cooperation with Africa would pass through Lisbon: In some instances that will be the case; in others there will be direct action by France, as is clear, but there is every advantage in France and Portugal coordinating efforts for specific projects, provided that that is the wish of the state in which the project is carried out. That triangular cooperation will undoubtedly have mutual advantages, but it is not only with France that we envisage it. We also envisage it with Britain, with Sweden -- with which, moreover, there are already specific actions -- and with other countries too.

[Question] President Jose Eduardo dos Santos recently spoke of normalizing relations with the United States. Secretary of State Haig received Jonas Savimbi in Washington a few days ago. Can any change in the White House's attitude toward the Luanda government be expected?

[Answer] I must tell you that there is no new element in President Jose Eduardo dos Santos' statement. Angola has never refused to have relations with the United States. The Angolan Government has always expressed readiness to maintain diplomatic or other relations with the United States. The new element to be noted is especially President Jose Eduardo dos Santos' visit to Cape Verde and his meeting with the president of Senegal, which -- and this is no secret to anybody -- will culminate in the establishment of diplomatic relations between Angola and Senegal, which have not existed since Angola's independence, and this in itself indicates Angola's desire for an opening toward the entire West. But, as I was telling you, there has never been a refusal to establish relations with the United States on the part of the Luanda government. It is the U.S. Government which since Angola's independence has not maintained diplomatic relations (and has maintained few other relations) with the Luanda government), especially because of the presence of Cuban troops on Angolan territory. However, there has already been a meeting this year between U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and Angolan Foreign Minister Paulo Jorge. And I must tell you that although Portugal is not a very important factor in these matters, Portuguese diplomacy was bold enough to assist the holding of that meeting.

[Answer] It will become known through DIARIO DE NOTICIAS. At the same time, just a few days ago, senior U.S. officials received Dr Jonas Savimbi, but they stated at the same time that they were also maintaining contacts with the Luanda government, and this does not seem to indicate the choice of one interlocutor to the detriment of another by the United States. I will also point out that, contrary to what has been heard, the Clark amendment has not been repealed. In fact the U.S. Senate declared itself in favor of the repeal of the Clark amendment, which banned assistance for movements inside Angola -- which could be interpreted as a stance unfavorable to the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola -- but the legislative process was not completed, and the Clark amendment remains in force. So the situation has not changed substantially. We hope -- and Portuguese diplomacy did something to this end, when requested by the states concerned -- for some results. We have attempted to open up points of communication between the Angolan Government and the U.S. Government. We believe that it is in cooperation with the Western countries that Angola can -- if that is its choice -- find the most advantageous paths for the economic development of its potential and for resolving the problems of its economic and social underdevelopment.

Angola's southern border has been frequently violated by South Africa, and this does not facilitate, of course, the resolution of its internal problems. The Portuguese Government has on several occasions expressed the opinion that it is through some security for Angola's southern borders that the reorganization of the Angolan state can be strengthened, with the essential departure of the Cuban troops from Angola's territory. No state wishes to have foreign troops on its territory.

And I am convinced that the Angolan Government would approve of the Cuban troops' departure from its territory. Moreover, they constitute an onerous financial burden. So it is through Namibia's independence, and if that independence is viable, secure and guaranteed by the Western powers -- which will also represent a guaranteeing of security for Angola's southern border -- that the stabilization of the situation inside Angola, and hence the Cuban troops' departure, will take place. So I repeat once more that the two actions -- Namibia's independence and the Cuban troops' departure from Angola -- are both desirable and both should be carried out. And it is the Portuguese Government's conviction that we are heading in that direction.

[Question] Have you already experienced points of conflict with the president in the conduct of Portuguese foreign policy?

[Answer] The term "conflict" would not be the most appropriate. Moreover, I must say that personal reasons play a part here, and both the president and I myself -- if you will allow me to make a personal allusion -- are too polite for a situation of conflict to arise. The constitutional situations are different. The president is the foremost Portuguese citizen. Moreover, he is a president elected by universal suffrage. He has the duty of representing the country abroad. The conduct orformulation of foreign policy does not rest with him. These are elements which form part of the country's overall policy, whose conduct rests with the government. Hence these two ideas -- the country's representation, which also rests with the president, and formulation of foreign policy, which rests with the government -- require prior consultation between those state bodies in order to work, just as they work in other countries. This consultation would entail a more precise definition of the limits, which are not always easy to lay down, between what is representation abroad and what is formulation and conduct of foreign policy. In my opinion, that task of definition, which is human handiwork, suffers from human shortcomings. In my opinion, the sharing of powers between the two state bodies is not as yet sufficiently clearly defined. So the term "conflict" would be excessive. However, I believe that there is a certain degree of vagueness. But I must say that I am aware of these difficulties and have succeeded, under the prime minister's guidance, in undertaking the conduct of Portuguese foreign policy. And the broad outline of the policy which has been followed during this year of 1981 is always, under the prime minister's guidance, my exclusive responsibility and nobody else's. Obviously, I do not forget that there are certain actions envisaged in Article 138 of the Constitution -- the appointment and accrediting of ambassadors -- which are the president's responsibility, always at the government's proposal. The essential power in the conduct of foreign policy rests with the government, with a single exception: Article 307 of the Constitution assigns not only to the government but primarily to the president, assisted by the Council of the Revolution, the duty of guaranteeing East Timor's independence. This specific power is guaranteed in the constitution. It is not disputed on the part of the president, of course, or by the government.

EUROPE'S VIEW ON POLAND COULD BOOST WEST'S IMAGE

[Editorial: "The EEC and Poland"]

[Text] There are many messages in the communique issued after the EEC foreign ministers' meeting on Poland in Brussels -- the most important are addressed to the United States and the Soviet Union and are concerned with making the superpowers adhere to the new efforts at detente begun in the TNF talks in Geneva. Europe demands -- the world demands -- that the Soviet Union and the United States remain on speaking terms and do not cool relations with a new Ice Age in world politics as a consequence.

NATO is not being split by the open demonstration by the European partners of their disagreement with the new U.S. administration. On the contrary, the lesson to Reagan and his people could help to create greater respect for the West's policies -- both inside and outside the NATO nations themselves. And in the message to Poland the EEC foreign ministers' stance is shown at its most defensible and responsible -- the Poles will be given the opportunity to find their own way. It is they who best understand the balancing act needed and who will be most affected by the consequences if this fails. Europe will continue to be willing to give humanitarian and economic aid, but if martial law and the gross infringement of human rights in Poland continue, the European democracies will be forced to reassess their policy.

SOVIET CSCE DELEGATION ARRIVES IN HELSINKI

[Text] The Soviet CSCE delegation arrived in Helsinki a moment ago, led by Deputy Foreign Minister Leonid Ilichev. Finnish and Soviet CSCE delegations will begin talks this afternoon on prospects for the Madrid follow-up meeting. The Finnish delegation is led by Secretary of State Matti Tuovinen, and head of the Finnish CSCE delegation Ambassador Richard Mueller will also attend the talks. The talks are to last until Thursday.

On Thursday, Deputy Foreign Minister Ilichev will have talks with Foreign Minister Paavo Vaeyrynen. Representatives of the Finnish Foreign Ministry will hold consultations also with representatives of Belgium and with the FRG and Norwegian delegations before the resumption of the Madrid conference on 9 February. Neutral and nonaligned countries will have a joint meeting in Vienna on 25 January.

Ilichev Delivers Warning

[Excerpts] The Soviet Union warns the NATO countries against discussing the events in Poland at the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference. Chairman of the Soviet CSCE delegation, Deputy Foreign Minister Leonid Ilichev said today to the radio news service that the draft final act propsed by the neutral and nonaligned countries before the Christmas recess would be a good basis for the continued talks.

In Ilichev's opinion, the Madrid meeting will be successful unless Poland is included in the agenda or the NATO countries provide other obstacles. Deputy Foreign Minister Ilichev said the Soviet Union is hopeful, but at the same time he warned that there are still great difficulties to come and that the list of these difficulties is long. Ilichev said he had come to have talks with the Finns about the CSCE follow-up conference. The delegations have cooperated in Madrid and we shall continue the cooperation here, Ilichev said. Deputy Foreign Minister Ilichev's visit to Finland is to last 3 days.

SCHMIDT-REAGAN MEETING 'GOOD NEWS' FOR NATO

[Editorial: "Schmidt Sharpens His Tone"]

[Text] There is nothing new in the fact that differences of opinion arise between NATO member nations and that the disagreements are most often greatest between Bonn and Washington. But the alliance has always overcome its internal discord, and after the meeting in Washington between President Ronald Reagan and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt it is clear that the leaders of the two most important NATO nations understand each other better. As yet the U.S. President and the West German Government head are not on the same wavelength as far as the assessment of the situation in Poland is concerned, but the distance between them has decreased. This is good news for the rest of the Western defense alliance.

As expected President Reagan was not given a promise by Federal Chancellor Schmidt that West Germany would follow the U.S. example and implement sanctions against the Soviet Union. But it is worth noting that during his stay in Washington Schmidt for the first time accused the Soviet superpower of being responsible for the tragic development in Poland. The chancellor was not as unsubtle in his choice of words as the President, but Reagan can nevertheless be happy that Schmidt is "on the move" in his view of Moscow's role in Poland. It is a view of which those in power in the Kremlin will take note. Their hope that talks between Reagan and Schmidt would lead from bad to worse relations between the two allies was not fulfilled.

Reagan and Schmidt represent the two extreme views within the Western alliance of the tactics which should be adopted to bring about the lifting of the state of martial law in Poland. In Washington Schmidt discussed the Polish drama with his U.S. host on his own terms. He arrived in Washington for a long-planned visit, and was not acting on behalf of the other Western allies. It is striking that the federal chancellor sharpened his tone toward the Soviet Union a few days after the EEC's foreign ministers had done the same in Brussels. Moscow cannot escape the view that a common Western front is in the process of formation and that this front will resort to tougher action than mere rhetorical condemnations, if the democratic reform process under the leadership of Solidarity does not start up again.

President Reagan and Federal Chancellor Schmidt were agreed that the Polish crisis could have the most serious consequences for the international situation. General Wojciech Jaruzelski gives them every reason to harbor fears for the future. At his meeting with the EEC's ambassadors in Warsaw the junta leader was unwilling to say anything about when it might be possible to reintroduce 'normal' conditions in Poland. A long-lasting state of martial law would inevitably lead to a deterioration in the relations between East and West. And if those in power in the Soviet Union understand the most recent signals from the West correctly they should not be in any doubt that as long as they allow the army to continue there will be greater cohesion and readiness to act in the West.

LARS WERNER CENSURES POLISH 'DICTATORSHIP'

[Text] The Left Party-Communist [VPK] is escalating its dissociation from the events in Poland. "We are now seeking cooperation with like-minded communist parties in West Europe for joint action," VPK leader Lars Werner said.

The VPK has already dissociated itself from Jaruzelski's take-over in Poland, and Lars Werner today draws a parallel between Jaruzelski in Poland and Pinochet in Chile.

"The difference is that Jaruzelski says that he is protecting socialism, whereas Pinochet is acting against it. But I see no differences between their day-to-day exercise of power," the VPK leader said.

At a meeting Monday [4 January] the VPK Executive Committee appointed Lars Werner chairman of a working group to prepare a statement directed against the military government in Poland and the policy which led to Jaruzelski's dictatorship for the 6-7 February meeting of the VPK Central Committee.

[Question] Does this mean a break between the Swedish VPK and Soviet communism?

[Answer] There are no formal ties to break. We work with other progressive parties in other countries if we share a common view. At present we see our contacts with communist parties in West Europe like the Italian party -- with whom we are in full agreement -- the Netherlands, the Spanish and the Finnish parties as the most valuable, and our contacts with progressive forces in the Third World. [answer ends]

In Lars Werner's view the communist party in Poland must first show its colors before it can have the support of its Swedish brothers: "We will have to see what sort of party it will be. If it supports the military dictatorship then we are not interested," Werner said.

At a press conference in the Riksdag building Monday the communist leader was asked to define communism...."It is about socialism," Lars Werner replied, "not some sort of social democracy. Communism is a higher form of socialism, but no society today is able to produce an example of it."

Lars Werner mentioned Hungary in 1956, Czechoslovakia in 1968 and now Poland as events which bring questions surrounding socialism to a head: "We had already chosen our path in the mid-sixties," Werner said, "when we decided to follow the path of pluralism, a multi-party system." "It is the 'third path,' as the Italians call it. And we say the same thing -- a third path between the dictatorships in East Europe and social democracy."

FRG POLICY OVER POLAND SEEN AS 'CONTRADICTORY'

[Editorial: "Poland -- and the Western World"]

[Text] President Ronald Reagan and West German Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt were only just able to hide the divisions over the question of what the Western world can do to prevent continued Soviet oppression of Poland.

At their talks in Washington they were able to agree that it is now necessary for the West to agree on a joint line of action, but this agreement is fragile as long as the views of what is to be done are so disparate.

One result of the talks between the two was that Schmidt altered his previously harshly criticized view that events in Poland were an internal Polish affair. Nevertheless, the West still seems to be divided and those in power in the Soviet Union can console themselves with the thought that while their own system and their domination over East Europe is being hit by a fundamental crisis, this has led to a situation in which the Western alliance is also facing a crisis.

More than one party is responsible for this.

In West Germany the view is that the criticism of the Bonn government's view of what is happening in Poland is unjust, but to a large extent the Germans only have themselves to blame.

Brezhnev has given Bonn a "mediating role" between East and West and even if Schmidt defends himself against this description, it could still be something which imposes obligations. However, West German policy on Poland is contradictory. At the same time as it claims to respect the principle of noninterference, Bonn demands -- most recently in the communique from the Washington meeting -- that the state of martial law in Poland be lifted and that the liberalization process be allowed to continue.

The West Germans claim -- and in this they have the other European nations with them -- that there is little point in joining in the U.S. decisions on economic sanctions against the Soviet Union. Even in Washington there can hardly be anyone who imagines that the communist superpower would call a halt because it has been denied access to Western credits and U.S. technology.

The sanction weapon is not effective, but it is not an insignificant reminder to Moscow that detente is lucrative for the Russians, who in recent years have been able to take advantage of the political climate which came into being after the CSCE conference.

President Reagan could be said to have been too hasty in his actions, when he decided to punish the Soviet Union economically for its role in the Polish tragedy without consulting his European allies.

But there is more at stake for the United States than for the West Europeans. In the continuous rivalry between the superpowers Washington here sees an opportunity of weakening the Soviet Union's influence over East Europe.

The repressive regime, led by army officers, in Poland represents much more than neutralizing the most radical elements within Solidarity. The Polish Communist Party and its protectors in Moscow are faced with a revolt much more far-reaching than anything in East Europe in the past. They have more or less lost the confidence of the whole people. The party has -- according to what Deputy Premier Rakowski revealed to his compatriots when he visited Bonn recently -- lost its young people, workers and intellectuals at the same time as the Catholic Church has become an increasingly significant force.

Against this background it is understandable that Moscow is not permitting any deviations from the orthodox communist system and this could also lead to a situation which is extremely dangerous for the whole of Europe.

It also makes it more difficult than ever to influence developments in Poland while preserving peace. Nevertheless such a joint policy must be forged and it is important for the Western world not to be frightened by the Soviet warnings delivered with growing loudness. Nor is there any point in threatening Moscow with cancelling a planned meeting between the two superpowers' foreign ministers and breaking off the nuclear arms talks in Geneva. It is now more important than ever to force Moscow to make concessions which could decrease tension and the fear of war in Europe.

CP OFFICIAL HITS 'HYPOCRITICAL SANCTIONS'

PM121305 London MORNING STAR in English 12 Jan 82 pp 3-4

[Text of CP International Department head Gerry Pocock speech to CP Executive Committee; date and place not given]

[Excerpt] Far from being seen as extending democracy, the party and the government of a socialist state has become identified, in the eyes of millions in Poland and elsewhere, as opposed to the demands and independent activity of working people. For the first time a military government has taken over in a socialist state, with the party in a subordinate role. The developments are unprecedented in the history of the socialist states. Even at the most critical moments of the Russian revolution and the wars of intervention, the supremacy of the party was maintained and the military kept subordinate to it.

These developments have serious implications for all communists. In making known its views on developments in Poland, the British Communist Party has consistently based itself on its belief in the crucial need for trade unions to be independent of the state and free of control by political parties. We also have based ourselves on the inviolable rights of democratic institutions, above all parliament. In Poland, too, the Sejm is the supreme state organ.

Both these principled positions stem for the British Communist Party from the firm belief that socialism can only develop with the active support of the majority of the people, that policies cannot be imposed, and that the party has to continually fight to win the respect and following of working people. Here in Britain these principles find expression -- in accordance without specific traditions and circumstances -- in the British Communist Party's long-term programme, the British road to socialism.

We do not in any way suggest that our programme for Britain can be applied in Poland or anywhere else. But there are certain principles that we believe are essential to socialism, and it is these that have been violated in Poland. Events in Poland have been used as a pretext by imperialism for a renewed anti-communist offensive and hostility toward the socialist world in which the justified concern of millions of people at the fate of Poland is used to make further attacks on detente and co-operation between European states, and to denigrate and undermine the achievements, ideas and ideals of socialism. These are the motives behind Reagan's hypocritical sanctions.

This unilateral imposition of sanctions is in stark contrast to consistent U.S. and British Government blocking of sanctions against South Africa in violation of the wishes of the overwhelming majority of UN states.

Far from opposing the brutal military coup in Turkey which has led to mass imprisonments, torture and the threat of death sentences against 52 trade unionists, the U.S. has stepped up its arms shipment and aid to the generals' regime there. Important differences exist between the U.S. and some EEC governments on Poland, though these West European differences do not go as far as rejection of the dangerous U.S. sanctions policy. Nor do these governments link their alleged concern for Poland with efforts to bring about an end to the arms race and the division of Europe.

An important element in the historical development of the Polish situation is the division of Europe, engineered by the U.S. and the European capitalist powers. NATO and the EEC were both set up to further this policy of division. This policy is a major source of tension today along with the ruinous cost of arms expenditure and the threat to station new U.S. missiles in Europe.

The defence and extension of democratic rights goes hand in hand with the fight against cruise missiles, for disarmament, and against the division of Europe. This division of Europe is itself a threat to sovereignty and to democratic rights.

We reject the activities of those who exploit Polish developments in order to discredit the achievements of socialist Poland and the other socialist states, and to whip up anti-communist feeling. It is vitally important to counter these campaigns. We welcome the initiative of many in the labour movement who, while refusing to be drawn into anti-communist statements and campaigns, have made known their disagreement with the clamp-down in Poland. In making known our demand for the full restoration of democratic rights in Poland and an end to martial law, we also pledge to intensify our efforts to ease tension in Europe, to oppose the arms race and the stationing of cruise missiles in Europe, and to develop co-operation between states in Europe in line with the Helsinki agreements.

DAILY TELEGRAPH VIEWS NATO DECLARATION FAVORABLY

[Editorial: "NATO Lines Up"]

[Text] The declaration by NATO on Poland yesterday should go far towards calming the dissensions which surfaced this past week between European members of the alliance and the United States. The declaration provides the "framework for action" which Mr Haig said America was seeking. Specifically, it lays blame squarely on Russia for supporting the "systematic suppression" of civil liberties in Poland, and it outlines a number of concrete measures either to be taken now or contemplated for the future. Taken as a whole, the declaration is a much crisper and more forthright assertion of the West's condemnation of Russian and the Polish military crackdown than the statement issued by EEC foreign ministers a week ago.

What appears to have happened is that both the United States and the European NATO countries, in particular West Germany, have moved closer towards understanding each other's positions. At the time of Chancellor Schmidt's journey to Washington last week to meet President Reagan these appeared to be far apart. The Reagan administration felt itself under great compulsion to react as strongly and publicly as it could to the Soviet-inspired crack-down in Poland. The Europeans, while also condemnatory, were being portrayed in Washington as being "soft" because they were unwilling at this stage to take economic measures against Russia. Herr Schmidt's visit did a lot to correct this view. At the same time, Bonn has clearly been alerted to the need for more active alignment with Washington.

Closer alignment of American and European attitudes is shown by the reference in yesterday's declaration to future consideration of restrictions in the area of energy and of export of agricultural products. This takes in the Siberian gas pipeline deal, which America wants to stop, and American grain exports to Russia, which Mr Reagan signally failed to include in his sanctions (23 million tonnes still being shipped under this year's agreement). It is to be hoped that this special NATO meeting will put an end to the inter-allied backbiting of the past week. The squabbling has had the unfortunate effect of diverting attention from the very real crisis now facing Russia and the whole future of communism, both in Eastern Europe and in Russia itself. Economic sanctions in themselves are irrelevant to this great tidal movement.

TURKMEN INTERVIEWED ON POLAND, DEFENSE MOVES

NC130934 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 7 Jan 82 pp 1, 12

[Correspondent Nilufer Yalcin interview with Foreign Minister Turkmen in Ankara]

[Excerpts] We drew Foreign Minister Turkmen's attention to the tendency in some European countries to compare developments in Poland to those in Turkey and asked him if he thought this tendency was influencing the EEC governments. Turkmen replied: "It is impossible to draw a parallel or establish a link between Turkey and Poland because Poland is not free to choose its own regime. The developments we see in Poland are not directed toward parliamentary democracy, but toward the suspension -- clearly resulting from outside interference -- or efforts intended to soften the regime.

"The situation in Turkey is precisely the opposite: The Turkish nation is absolutely free to determine its own regime. In this atmosphere of freedom it has identified itself with parliamentary democracy. The sole aim of the intervention carried out in Turkey was to allow for the development of democracy in a stable environment. Therefore those who try to draw a parallel between the two countries contradict themselves. Those who are trying to establish such a parallel are leftists, and this in itself exposes their intentions and thoughts."

Replying to another question, Foreign Minister Turkmen repeated that "from the standpoint of the defensive steps Turkey might take in the area outside NATO's responsibilities, the United States has no demands whatsoever on Turkey." He went on to say that the modernization of certain military airfields in Turkey is being carried out within the framework of NATO defense plans and added: "All the allies agree that any threat developing outside the NATO area, particularly a danger occurring in southwest Asia, is bound to affect NATO. This thought is also reflected in the communiques of the council. NATO, however, has no plans at the moment to take collective action against such developments. Some NATO countries, and particularly the United States, are taking certain measures. They are, in fact, cooperating with some non-NATO countries in the application of these measures. Moreover, there is a tendency to reinforce individual defense forces in the area.

Foreign Minister Turkmen said that it was only natural for Turkey to take every possible measure necessary for its defense within the framework of Turkish-U.S. defense cooperation. In replying to our questions in this regard, he said: "1981 was a year which witnessed an increase in international terrorism. This manifested itself particularly in East-West relations. Foci of conflict and tension also appeared in the Middle East. All these developments have naturally increased the need for solidarity within NATO. In our relations with our allies we proceed from this point.

Turkmen went on: "Undoubtedly there are groups who are trying to tear Turkey away from Europe. It is true that those who seek Turkey's disintegration are instigating such an attitude. But with Turkey's influence in international and regional policy, its importance in NATO, and its loyalty to democratic principles, all that the Armenian terrorists and certain Greek political forces can do is create temporary difficulties."

Foreign Minister Turkmen stated that he would not bring us the question of the Rogers plan at the NATO Council meeting on 11 January since only Poland was on the agenda. He added that Turkey too desired to see the continuation of the talks on Polish developments. He said outside intervention could lead to creation of a serious situation.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE GROUP ENDS CONTACTS IN ANKARA

[Text] The Council of Europe consultative assembly delegation has concluded its contacts in Ankara. The delegation met this morning with Labor Minister Turhan Esener. During the meeting Esener briefed the delegation on the shortcomings regarding the implementation of the trade union law and the laws on strikes and lockouts prior to 12 September 1980. Noting that especially after 1970 the number of workers participating in strikes and lockouts increased greatly each year, Esener also dwelt on the economic loss created by these activities. He added that during the period prior to 12 September various individual unions demanded wage and benefits increases of over 200 percent and that they resorted to strikes and lockouts because of minor differences.

Esener said these actions, together with other conditions, brought Turkey up to the period prior to 12 September. He added that after 12 September the laws in question were suspended and collective wage contracts that expired were renewed by the abritration council to avoid the loss of workers' rights and benefits based on the collective wage contracts. He said bills on the issue, prepared with the contribution of workers, employers and experts, have been submitted to the National Security Council.

The delegation later met with Minister of State Ilhan Oztrak. In a statement at the beginning of the meeting, Oztrak said Turkey is part of Europe and that it should not be doubted that a free parliamentary democracy will be established as soon as possible. Noting that Turkey is currently going through an extraordinary period, Oztrak added that this fact should be received with understanding, bearing in mind the pre-12 September situation. Oztrak, in another statement to journalists after the meeting, said he briefed the delegation on judicial policy in Turkey and its implementation. The delegation will leave Ankara for Istanbul in the afternoon and will continue contacts there as well.

ARRESTED LEFTISTS PLANNING ATTACKS ON OFFICIALS

[Text] Ankara, 12 Jan (AFP) -- About 20 members of the far-left underground Dev-Sol organisation have been arrested recently, officials said here today. They said the group was planning attacks against political leaders. Those on the "hit list" included Social Security Minister Sadik Side and Minister of State for Economic Affairs Turgut Ozal.

Documents seized indicated that sabotage plans included an attack on naval installations at Golcuk, on the Sea of Marmara, during a meeting to be attended by senior navy officers, officials said.

Dev-Sol claimed responsibility for the killing in 1980 of former Prime Minister Nihat Erim, a former customs minister and an extreme right-wing party official.

GOVERNMENT ADOPTS ECONOMIC PROMOTION PROGRAM

AU121334 Vienna ARBIETER-ZEITUNG in German 12 Jan 82 pp 1-3

[Summary] At its caucus on 11 January the government adopted a special employment program designed to keep unemployment in 1982 below the 3 percent mark by providing for 19,000-23,000 additional jobs. At a Vienna press conference on 11 January, Chancellor Krieisky declared that the Vienna UN Conference Center project will be implemented and he was in favor of holding a new referendum -- after the next elections -- on putting the mothballed Zwentendorf nuclear powerplant into operation.

The special employment program presented to the cabinet by Finance Minister Salcher provides for the construction of an additional 5,000 apartments, housing modernization allotments in the amount of 1 billion schillings; a 1.5 billion-schilling allotment for road construction before the end of this month, the placing early this year of public works orders scheduled for the second half of 1982 to help the ailing construction industry; a 500 million-schilling increase in the funds earmarked for the promotion of "top investments" -- investments of great significance for economic structure and balance of payments improvement -- raising them to 1.5 billion schillings this year; a 6 percent investment bonus for low-profit small and medium enterprises in 1982 and 1983; tax privileges for private venture capital made available for investments in industry, small business and tourist trade; raising interest subsidies for small business promotion loans by 1 percent, and agricultural investment loans by 1 percent, and agricultural investment loans by 2 percent; an additional allotment of 100 million schillings for new products research; and continuation of the iron and steel industry structural improvement program. With the incentives provided by budget allotments of between 2 and 2.25 billion schillings, investments totaling more than 10 billion schillings will be launched.

CANADA

PRIME MINISTER ANNOUNCES CABINET CHANGES

LD122134 Montreal Domestic Service in English 1900 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Text] The prime minister of Canada has announced changes to the federal Liberal cabinet, which falls short of a cabinet shuffle. Pierre Trudeau has dismembered the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and appointed the minister in charge, Herb Gray, as the head of a new, enlarged portfolio, responsible for regional development and industrial expansion. The minister responsible for trade, El Lumley, retains his portfolio but will also become a minister of state for external affairs, with responsibility for international relations. The move is aimed at dealing with Canada's ailing economy and giving the Department of External Affairs more power in the field of trade.

[Summary] Vienna (AZ) -- Following a decision of the Austrian Socialist Party [SPOE] National Executive Committee, Deputy SPOE Chairman Karl Blecha declared on 12 January that the next parliamentary elections will be held on schedule in the spring of 1983, and that this decision should put an end to all speculation about an earlier election date. Blecha named April 1983 as the date of the elections and declared that six months before an SPOE party congress would adopt an election platform and nominate the candidates. He added that Chancellor Kreisky would decide on his own candidacy in May this year.

[Fritz Pesater report on speech by Chancellor Kreisky, given at a meeting of the Council of Elders, an organization affiliated with the SPOE, in Vienna on 13 January -- Kreisky recorded remarks in quotation marks]

[Excerpts] In his report, in which he naturally also did not ignore the main domestic policy issues -- nuclear energy and the conference center -- Kreisky had very sharp words on the topic of Poland. The date was aptly chosen. Precisely 1 month after the proclamation of martial law in Poland, Chancellor Kreisky stated today before socialist pensioners why things in that communist state had to go the way they did. Even though he repeatedly compared the aspirations of the Polish workers with those of the Austrian Social Democrats in the thirties, Kreisky subsequently referred to a specifically Polish variant of the aspirations to more democracy. The dispossessed peasants had brought their traditional Catholic creed into their new enterprises, something which also explains the position of the church in Poland. Kreisky then critically stated this very position of the Catholic Church:

"These vast masses of Polish workers -- once put into motion -- in their helplessness first and foremost depended on the advice the Roman Catholic Church would give them. And the Roman Catholic Church cannot be blamed that it did not know how to give the best advice in such situations because, properly speaking, this is not what the church is for. The church has other tasks. And I saw this coming, how they shuttled from one place to another -- the bishops -- and how they continuously busied themselves and yet did not busy themselves, how they assumed responsibilities and yet did not assume any responsibility." In addition, there existed radical currents among the workers and the trade unions which again and again wanted to display their power to the rulers. But there were no rulers who ruled, Kreisky said, and no government which governed. Another mistake of the Polish workers, according to Kreisky, was that: "People there cherished the illusion -- or they succumbed to the illusion -- that if only the Polish proletariat really strikes out for the big struggle -- this struggle will be responded to by the struggle of the workers in the other communist states."

The chancellor then examined the problem of how Austria and Austrian social democracy should respond to the situation in Poland. One of his answers was: "This is why socialists must demand that this regime release the people from the prisons, and that we will only begin to talk with it when it releases the people from the prisons."

The chancellor's rhetoric took him from Poland briefly to the United States where he reproached President Reagan's economic policy for prolonging the current world economic crisis.

REAGAN, AMBASSADOR'S TALKS ON REFUGEES REPORTED

AU132143 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 2050 GMT 13 Jan 82

[Text] The Polish refugees in Austria were the subject of talks in Washington today between U.S. President Ronald Reagan and the newly appointed Austrian ambassador to the United States, Thomas Chlestil. Chlestil was given the assurance that the United States wants to continue negotiations about its aid to the Polish refugees in Austria. In addition, The U.S. authorities want to adjust, at an accelerated pace, immigration practices according to the requirements of Polish refugees in Austria.

TERRORISTS SAID PLANNING ATTACK ON POWERPLANT

AU131240 Vienna KURIER in German 13 Jan 81 p 13

[Ernest Bieber report]

[Summary] On Tuesday KURIER had to pass on to State Security Police a report it had recieved from Yugoslavia, which claimed that a group of terrorists have planned a bomb attack on an Austrian powerplant. According to the report, the terrorist group is headed by the Venezuelan Ilich Ramirez Sanchez, known as "Carlos." The source, which on an earlier occasion had provided sound information, did not speak of any specific power plant but cited some technical data about the plant earmarked as a target for the attack, which made it possible to identify the plant concerned as the Kaprun hydroelectric plant in the Salzburg Tauren region. According to a Kaprun powerplant spokesman, the cited data apply to the main stage of the power plant as well as to the generator unit supplying the power for the plant's own use. He added, however, that under the current weather conditions an attack on important technical installations in Kaprun is virtually inconceivable, and that only less important parts of the powerplant would be accessible to a potential attacker, although their destruction would also affect the power output to some extent. KURIER informed the Interior Ministry, which immediately instructed Salzburg State Security Police to take additional measures to protect the Kaprun Mountain region.

According to information from Yugoslavia, the terrorist group has been staying for days at a hotel unit in southern Yugoslavia especially rented for the purpose. "Last Monday, the group was reportedly joined by notorious terrorist leader 'Carlos,' who is to head the 'bomb commando' for Austria. The attack is scheduled for 7 February, it was stated.

"The organization, financed by Libyan chief of state Al-Qadhdhfi, has hired a Frenchman as an explosives expert, who is apparently also a trained mountaineer. He was reportedly offered a 'contingent fee' of DM300,000." According to an Interior Ministry source, State Security Police experts are considering the possibility that the planned attack might be connected with the trial of the terrorists due to be tried next week for the attack on the Vienna synagogue.

REFUGEES 1981 -- According to a statistical report released by the Interior Ministry, 27,492 refugees were registered in Austria on 1 January 1982, including 23,419 -- or 85.2 percent -- refugees from Poland. At present 4,958 refugees are staying in seven camps, and the rest are accomodated in small hotels and homes rented by the authorities. The capacity of the camps is completely exhausted. In 1981 700 million schillings were spent on refugee care. Only 9,072 refugees were able to emigrate to another country from Austria last year. [Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 13 Jan 82 p 2 AU]

SCHMIDT ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG ON POLAND, U.S. TALKS

DW141419 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1303 GMT 14 Jan 82

[Government statement read by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt to the Bundestag in Bonn -- live]

[Excerpt] Mr President, ladies and gentlemen: I ask your understanding for being a few minutes late due to an accident in traffic. I am grateful, though, for the acclamation of the opposition on that occasion. [applause, laughter]

I would like to inform you today about my talks with President Reagan and with President Mitterrand. Colleague Genscher, who represented our country at two important foreign ministers conferences during the past 10 days, will also take the floor during today's debate.

Just as 5 weeks ago, this statement is again marked by the fate of Poland. We want to live up to the interests of our Polish neighbors not only in our feelings and hopes but also in our political action. [applause] The Polish crisis has quite justly elicited profound emotion among the people and the governments in Europe and the United States. The events in Poland once again show the rigidity of the communist regimes in the Warsaw Pact in allowing peaceful change in the face of challenge. They thereby impose great sorrow on their peoples and jeopardize the confidence in cooperation between East and West.

The Federal Government and the Bundestag, because of their national responsibility as well as of their responsibility for peace policy, have quite expressly and publicly pronounced their concern over the Polish crisis. On 16 December the Bundestag was the first parliament in the world to express its solidarity with the Polish people, to demand the resumption of the dialogue with the Catholic Church and with the trade union Solidarity and to ask for the release of all people held under arrest.

With regard to the Helsinki Final Act, the Bundestag resolution said in patt: It is with great concern that the German Bundestag observes the growing propagandistic dragnet against the Polish reform course and the open or veiled threats of force against Polish independence from the outside. Mr Barzel read this text at the time, and you will find in the Bundestag minutes that all factions of the Bundestag applaud at that point. Everybody was aware that it was not just anybody but the Soviet Union which was meant with the expression of concern about open or veiled threats of the use of force against Polish independence.

On the basis of the Bundestag resolution, I wrote to General Jaruzelski and also to General Secretary Brezhnev along similar lines on Christmas Day. As far as I can see, aside from President Reagan, by writing such a letter to the Soviet general secretary, so far I have been the only Western head of government who publicly noted the responsibility of the Soviet Union for the Polish developments. Today, 4 weeks later, I state that it was important and necessary for German policy to be supported by the entire Bundestag, especially in connection with the Polish crisis.

In light of the history of German-Polish relations, which have been so full of sorrow and burdened with guilt, any plot against the human dignity and national independence of the Poles concerns the German people in a special way. The new mutual and neighborly understanding between millions of Poles and millions of Germans, which has grown on the basis of the Treaty of Warsaw, must not break apart. [applause]

Even at that time, a decade ago, Willy Brandt's Treaty of Warsaw met with but little criticism in the FRG, unlike the Treaty of Moscow and the Basic Treaty [with the GDR] because even then the desire for reconciliation with the Polish nation was in keeping with a profound feeling everywhere among Germans. The same determination is being expressed today by the Germans' spontaneous readiness to help.

In late 1981 our citizens sent about 2 million packages to Poland. In the short period since the beginning of the year, it is already 94,800 packages -- currently over 10,000 a day. This readiness to help deserves my special thanks. [applause]

I add this must be continued. On this occasion I would like to draw attention once again to the large-scale aid actions for Poland, first, by the German Red Cross under the title "Aid to Poland" and similar to that the action of the Workers' Welfare Organization; second, by the protestant church in Germany under the title "Aid to Poland;" third, by the German CARITAS Organization under the title "Aid to Poland;" and fourth, by the German Trade Union Federation under the title "Solidarity with Poland." Surely everyone can easily telephone and learn the account numbers of these organizations, unless he wants to send his own personal package.

It was only yesterday that the French president and I stated that the humanitarian and food aid to Poland must be continued. [applause] Francois Mitterrand and I also were agreed in what I said here in the Bundestag on 18 December: With all our hearts we are on the side of the workers, and we wish with all our hearts that the martial law in Poland will be lifted as soon as possible. [applause]

The developments in Poland do not concern the Poles alone but also all other peoples because the continuing suppression of basic rights of Polish citizens has serious consequences for international relations, for stability in Europe and for cooperation between West and East. For this reason the Federal Government together with our allies, appealed to the Polish Government to lift martial law, release the detainees, and resume the dialogue with the church and with the elected representatives of Solidarity. We also appealed to the Soviet Union to respect the will of the Poles for national independence and internal renewal and reform. This will springs from the human rights of the Poles. It is legitimate, justified and morally imperative. [applause]

I cannnot but state today that developments in Poland have so far not turned to the better. To this day we have not received any adequate political signals telling us that the military council in Poland -- as according to its own promises -- is returning to the course of renewal or reform. Because of their special role in that country and because of their responsibility there the Catholic Church in Poland and the pope have a better picture of the developments in Poland than many others do. Their concern has evidently increased since December. We in the Federal Government will seek direction from this, just as we have done for weeks.

I share and understand the passionate outrage of many people in Germany and throughout the world -- in France, Italy, the United States, everywhere -- and I add: Our goal is not limited to outraged confrontation per se, nor is what matters to us a mere public expression of our moral outrage; what is of crucial importance for us is to have a positive influence on the actual situation of the people in Poland and on the improvement of that situation, [strong applause] and an actual influence on the improvement in the situation and on the establishment of human rights.

Together with our allies, we are seeking an effective policy which will contribute to Poland finding its way back to the course which was started with the Gdansk agreement of 1980. This alone evidently would be in keeping with the wishes of the Polish people, and this would also correspond to the promises which the military government has made to its own people as well as to us and the governments of other Western states through diplomatic channels.

Our demands on General Jaruzelski are based on his own promises of which we have been notified. We see quite clearly the framework within which he must work -- the Warsaw Pact and CEMA. But our demands regarding the responsibility of the main power of these two systems -- the Warsaw Pact and CEMA -- are based on the Helsinki Final Act signed by all; they are based on international law. The Soviet Union is not allowed to either obstruct or prevent the necessary social adaptations and evolutions in the states of its alliance systems.

Public outrage over the events in Poland has led to misinterpretations of our attitude in the media of some friendly countries. [laughter] Well, some of those who are laughing provided the necessary cues, to make this absolutely clear. [applause] In many cases they failed to take note of what we, the government and the Bundestag, have said and done, and in part they misunderstood the reserve which, viewed against the background of German-Polish history, is quite appropriate to any German whenever Poland is involved. [applause]

But nobody should be mistaken: We Germans are no migrants between worlds. I was able to rely on the overwhelming majority of the German people when I said on the occasion of New Year's Day: In situations of crisis, the states of the European Community and of the Atlantic alliance stand by each other firmly and with determination. This, after all, is the basis of the security of our peace and also the security of Berlin. End of my own quotation. [applause]

I was in agreement with President Mitterrand and President Reagan that now, in an hour of peril, the unity of the alliance must not be jeopardized. The allies may rely on us, just as we may rely on them. We refuse to be made to believe that there is a crisis in the alliance when in truth a crisis in the communist system is involved. [applause]

By the way, it is not just our allies who rely on the firm cohesion of the alliance. The neutral states of Europe, which also depend on the balance in Europe, rely on it as well as do even communist governments and many millions of people in East Europe. The Soviet Union and its allies know that we will continue to pursue a steady policy of cooperation and of dialogue on the basis of a balance. However, they must also know that such events as the state of martial law in Poland cannot remain without consequences. This is the unanimous approach of the West.

President Mitterrand pointed out last night a passage of a speech which French Premier Pierre Maruoy gave on 23 December to the French cabinet. I quote: On the basis of the geopolitical situation in which Poland has been since World War II, everybody knows that the Soviet Union is involved in everything pertaining to East Europe. In view of this situation, the French Government has the responsibility of pointing out as accurately as possible how it views the problems. The Polish people are today victims of the measures enforced by their own army. We condemn this situation and we will not stop pointing out that an end must be put to it. I am still quoting. Even if the interference of the Soviet Union is a fact, there is still a clear difference between the current national suppression and a more massive direct outside action. The French Government must take this difference into consideration. That was the government statement by the French premier the day before Christmas in the French cabinet.

President Mitterrand told me yesterday in the presence of Mauroy that this clarification is very important for him. We discovered that our assessments and policies do not deviate substantially. There were different presentations -- I will discuss them -- but there were no different assessments, goals and means. Both governments worked on preparing the decisions of the European Community's Council of Ministers and of the North Atlantic Pact, and they have agreed to both of these decisions.

My visit to Washington was originally planned in connection with my vacation and was to be an informal exchange of views. Originally I wanted to deal with the international economic crisis and international unemployment. The Polish crisis gave special significance to a visit which had been previously planned.

Our Washington talks produced pleasant agreement between the U.S. President and secretary of state, on the one side, and myself and the foreign minister, on the other. In contrast to the criticism of some media, I can state with satisfaction that the indispensable German-U.S. cooperation is proving its value at present.

Together we have made an important step toward what is necessary. The action of the United States in coordination with the European allies and the joint statement of President Reagan and myself -- which was produced at lunchtime against all diplomatic customs -- both show the things Germany and United States have in common and the great significance of coordination and consultation among allies.

On the eve of my talks with President Reagan the foreign ministers of our European Community partners had worked out a common decision on developments in Poland. Colleague Genscher informed his U.S. discussion partners immediately and directly, and the Brussels decision by the Europeans provided the foreign minister and myself with a good basis for our talks in Washington. In our joint statement, President Reagan adopted significant parts of the Brussels decision and agreed to it explicitly.

We agreed during the talks on the assessment of developments in Poland, and we also agreed that without strong Soviet pressure these events would not have taken place. This does not mean that we disregard the responsibility of the current rulers of Poland who have said themselves that they would return to renewal.

My U.S. discussion partners explained that they consider their measures of 29 December to be a strong political signal to the Soviet Union and that they believe that a permanent suppression of basic rights and liberties in Poland would have grave consequences for international relations. I agreed with this interpretation.

Our talks with the U.S. President, vice president, secretary of state, and secretary of defense, and with senators, trade union leader Lane Kirkland and many old friends gave me the opportunity for a deep and impressive exchange of opinion on the entire scope of relations between the big powers, between the United States and West Europe, and between West and East Europe. We discussed the basic political trends of our countries and the long-term perspectives of international peace policy. We also discussed political realities in Europe which have been discussed a lot in past weeks under the simplifying key word Yalta, such as the speech by Pierre Mauroy I just quoted and later in President Mitterrand's new year's speech. President Mitterrand said that everything that permits us to overcome Yalta would be good with the provision that we never confuse our wishes with current reality. I agreed with this remark and said that slicing up the world into spheres of interest cannot be accepted morally. [applause] Those interpreting my statements on this issue differently have misunderstood or misinterpreted me, -- this is my interpretation of the matter. [applause]

We Germans experience daily the dividing line drawn through Europe. We share the interest of innumerable people in Europe in making this dividing line more penetrable and in overcoming it. However out of insight and conviction we insist that violence cannot be a means of policy. We seek a policy of peaceful changes in Europe. [applause]

The Western response to the challenge created by the Polish crisis is therefore not a return to Cold War or even to military confrontation. Based on the careful preservation and strengthening of the military balance, we want rather to use a carefully balanced policy to prompt the Soviet Union and the current rulers in Poland to follow their signatures on the Helsinki Final Act with action, doing this also in their own interests.

On the issues of balance and dialogue, our Washington talks led to three important clarifications:

First President Reagan again told us that he wants to continue the Geneva negotiations on reducing medium-range nuclear weapons. In the joint statement, arms control is termed an indispensable element of common security. The 18 November negotiation programe presented by the President, which we greatly welcomed at the time and with which the alliance partners have identified themselves -- this negotiation programe on arms control continues to be valid and unchanged.

The Geneva negotiations on medium-range nuclear weapons have been under way again for 2 days, and this should be welcomed also by the opposition. [applause]

Second, we agreed that the CSCE process should be carried on. The Helsinki Final Act is an important basis for our demand that the current Polish regime return to the reform course. This is not interference in the internal affairs of Poland. All signatories of the Helsinki Final Act, including the Soviet Union, have expressely accepted that the Madrid follow-up conference should assess the actual effect achieved in the meantime by the Helsinki Final Act. President Reagan and I agreed that the crisis in and around Poland must be the subject of thorough discussion at a foreign ministers' conference at the Madrid follow-up conference.

Third, President Reagan and his government agree with us that it is particularly important during times of crisis to maintain contacts. Against the background of my experience gathered during talks with General Secretary Brezhnev here in Bonn I pleaded for a meeting between the U.S. President and the Soviet general secretary at the proper time. The correct assessment of each other by world powers in their future action is much more important than our German-Soviet talks.

The difficult Polish economic situation naturally played an important role in Washington. Together we want to continue the humanitarian aid which helps the Polish people directly, but we want to hold state economic aid to Poland open as long as the oppressive measures continue. We also discussed the possibility of assisting Poland financially under the usual international conditions if Poland returns to the way of renewal and reforms.

President Reagan and I agreed that further measures regarding Poland or the Soviet Union must be thoroughly discussed and jointly in the alliance. The meeting of the alliance's foreign ministers set clear political signals a week later in Brussels. The allies have reacted firmly but with a sense of proportion.

First, the alliance achieved a joint assessment. It is jointly assessed that developments in Poland are of great importance for the development of security and cooperation in Europe. Continous repression in Poland undermines the political basis for progress in East-West relations.

Second, it is the common aim of all alliance members to contribute jointly to a resumption and continuation of the renewal and reform course in Poland. We cannot and we may not accept without question violations of the UN Charter of the general declaration of human rights and of the Helsinki Final Act. We cannot continue the policy of cooperation with those bearing responsibility for the situation in Poland as if nothing had happened.

Third, the alliance has worked out a catalogue of political and economic measures to convince the military council in Poland and the Soviet leadership of the seriousness of Western concern. The members of the alliance will mutually coordinate their action to be taken in line with developments in Poland. The respective national measures need not be identical. That has been made clear by the common decision, but they should not undermine each other either. Everybody can understand that.

It was against the background of this agreement by the partners of the North Atlantic alliance that my visit with Francois Mitterrand took place yesterday. In the very detailed and very frank and friendly talks we had, we were fully agreed in substance. There is nothing disputable about this. You also see however, as I have already indicated, there have been differences in our two countries in the presentation of political reactions to the Polish events. This is because our historic experiences and traditions and thus also the atmosphere in which feelings are expressed are not identical.

But like ourselves our French friends, the president and the premier, are counteracting the wrong impression that there is in fact disagreement. We are grateful to French External Relations Minister Cheysson for having made clear statements on this in a television interview last Sunday. Asked by a French journalist whether the federal chancellor is a neutralist, Cheysson said, it seems remarkably assurd to say such a thing. I don't see Mr Zimmermann; perhaps this is specially suitable for him. [applause] It is remarkably absurd to say such a thing. Just look at what he has done, Cheysson added, what he has supported. For instance regarding the issue of the reaction to the Soviet arms superiority threatening Europe, the federal chancellor is at the head of those who take a stand. That's true indeed. [shouts] It is permissible to endorse the public statements by the foreign minister of a friendly power, that certainly is permissible. [applause]

There was in the interview another point where a few journalists were trying to invent disagreement between Paris and Bonn. [shouts] The BAYERNKURIER is also meant here. Cheysson said about the gas deal with the Soviet Union -- I quote -- I think it would be totally absurd if France gave an opinion alone, because there are three buyers of Soviet gas. And, second, we should not punish ourselves with sanctions because there are developments in East Europe that cannot be accepted. We need this gas. I am saying this only to let people know what has not been reported at all by some German newspapers.

Regarding the practical measures aimed at Poland or the Soviet Union the French Government and we are agreed. What matters to the French as well as to us is credibility and effectiveness. I don't want to anticipate colleague Genscher's report on the meeting of NATO's Council of Ministers, but I want to stress at this point that we, the Germans, the Federal Government, have never committed ourselves thoughtlessly to such measures.

I remind you of the sanctions which had been demanded and pledged internationally following the hostage affair in Tehran; I remind you of the sanctions following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan; I remind you of the U.S. appeal to boycott the Moscow Summer Olympic games. At the time we undertook great efforts to convince our national sports associations of the sense of such solidarity with the United States as well as of the moral justification of staying away from the Olympics. But then we Germans fulfilled this commitment and did not only pay lip service like some others. [applause] In the end it was only Norway and, if I may leave out Monaco, Turkey and the FRG which participated in this sanction against the Moscow Olympics. It is no coincidence that these three countries, which really carried out what had been announced before, are directly adjoining the Soviet sphere of influence. We have never committed ourselves thoughtlessly, but if we pledge ourselves we stand to it and carry it out.

In Washington and Paris we naturally also discussed the problem of the world economic crisis. This holds true in particular to the talks with President Reagan a large part of which was dedicated to this issue. I emphatically pointed to the strategic importance -- as I termed it -- that the curbing of unemployment has for the political and social stability of the Western industrial countries. I said that ever since the end of the war such a high interest level has never been maintained worldwide, reaching far into recession and that what matters above all therefore is to come to a marked and above all lasting reduction of interest rates worldwide. I said that another increase in interest rates in 1982 could spell disaster for investment activities and thus for labor markets in industrialized and developing countries. A reduction of interest rates, I told the President, would be possible only if the United States assumed a leadership role in this respect because of the outstanding role of the dollar on the common, the only credit and capital market in the world.

My talks with President Mitterrand saw that the French position is identical with ours in this matter. By the way President Reagan and I not only stated our agreement in the combatting of trade protectionism and the upholding of free world trade but above all we both agreed that the goals of our economic policies is the reduction of the interest rate through the curb of public deficits.

It is important that we combat inflation and overcome the recession. Such international implications obviously are unknown to some people. Dr Kohl is still seeing only a connection between the Schmidt era -- as you termed it, Mr Kohl -- and unemployment in Germany, as if there was only unemployment [interrupted by applause] you don't give your intelligence good marks, ladies and gentlemen, [shouts, applause] as if in the present world there was unemployment only in Germany, Mr Kohl! As if it were not the FRG which is still better off in this respect than all the other members of the Western alliance! [shouts, applause] Those who dispute this should read a decent newspaper besides BAYERNKURIER. [laughter, applause]

I want to draw the attention of the opposition and the Bundestag as a whole to the fact that a total amount of over DM26 billion will be earmarked for the strengthening of the economy up until 1985 through investment and tax policy measures that we got underway in connection with the 1982 budget, through selective investments, through a capital increase at the bank for reconstruction and development, through tax improvements of depreciation possibilities. In addition, this year's annual economic report will be at hand early in February. Then, following the adoption of the 1982 budget we will also -- and I quote and agree with colleague Mischnick here -- have detailed talks on further employment initiatives on the basis of the latest economic data. [applause]

I said already that in bilateral as well as in multilateral talks the German position benefitted from the fact that it was based on the Bundestag 18 December resolution. According to the communique of the alliance's Council of Ministers it is clear that the Polish crisis cannot be developed into a crisis of the Western alliance. Reading the Soviet press and referring to the party press of other communist states you find there the attempt to sow dragon's teeth between Bonn and Washington or between Bonn and other capitals. I must say that Soviet or communist propaganda has never impressed me and this will remain so in the future.

But -- and I am addressing the opposition now -- the Bundestag groups and parties should mind very much that with their language they do not seed dragon's teeth or sow discord in the alliance. [applause] When I reacted a bit sharply to an interpellation earlier the CDU/CSU criticized me for this by making more interpellations. But, ladies and gentlemen, if members of the Bundestag talk about an affront to the alliance by the Federal Republic, if they talk about the federal chancellor appearing as the advocate of Yalta, if they declare our whole country an insecurity factor [shouts] -- they talked about the Federal Republic, and the insult is equally bad in both cases, don't deceive yourselves, no matter whether you say Federl Republic or Federal Government. [applause] I understand your excitement, but I have to give you one more quotation. When the Bavarian minister president talks about the Federal Government cowardly cringing in the light of political blackmail by the communist rulers, I must once again -- in agreement with Wolfgang Mischnick -- urgently warn against this demagogic competition. [applause]

Such language which has been used for 2 weeks now is bound to lead to misinterpretations by other countries of our situation here. [commotion, applause] Or, Dr Kohl or Dr Zimmermann, is it supposed to lead to such misinterpretations? [commotion, applause] You have roused voices which I had wished would never be heard again, [applause] not only in foreign media but also here in Germany. The result is that one gets letters from old nazis who now live as pensioners among us, which say many bad things about the Poles, the Russians and the Federal Government in one breath. This is the seed that is being sown with such language. [commotion, applause]

[Bundestag President Richard Stuecklen calls for order in the house, asking that the house allow the statement to be read to the end without interruption] I think the Bundestag will agree with me that the chancellor has the right to say in the Bundestag what he deems appropriate. [commotion, applause]

Abroad and at home I desisted for many weeks from rejecting the abuse leveled at me. Just for once, at this place here, it ought to be my right to do so. [applause] To this day nobody heard a harsh word from me because [commotion] I agree with what the governing mayor of Berlin said when he urged careful use of political utterances concerning the Polish crisis. Mr von Weizsaecker surely did not just mean careful choice of vocabulary with respect to the political adversary at home or to the Federal Government. Surely he also meant the careful use of language toward neighbors and friends in both directions. Mr von Weizsaecker, in any event, knows what none of us must ever forget: no harshness of language, no abuse can change the fact that [commotion] the Soviet Union is and remains a world power, that it remains the powerful neighbor not too far away from us and that it maintains mighty troops in the other German state in which many millions of Germans are living. Therefore it remains necessary to advocate our German interests vis-a-vis the Soviet leadership in a clear and unmistakable language, yet also with the readiness on our part to listen and to use a pleasant tone toward another state, whether human rights or human alleviations are at stake, whether Afghanistan or Poland are involved, whether the Soviet medium-range missiles threatening us are at issue or disarmament or arms limitation negotiations. To this day no leader of the opposition has ever represented our interests toward the Soviet Union in the Kremlin of Moscow or in the redoute of Godesberg in such internationally audible and at the same time unequivocal and determined way -- but simultaneously with such bindingness and receptiveness to dialogue -- as have colleague Genscher and I. [applause]

We will do the same in the future as well. [replying to unintelligible interjection] Keep in mind, ladies and gentlemen, what impression you are making on your voters tonight [laughter, applause]. The Federal Republic of Germany, the Federal Government, will not be dissuaded from the course of its policy. This course does have a solid orientation, and whoever in Europe wants detente, detente policy, in East or West, whoever wants to consolidate and continue detente policy, needs balance for this purpose, military as well as the political balance. He needs, therefore, the alliance of the Western defence community; he needs the Brussels dual decision which really was what led to making the medium-range missiles threatening Europe suited for negotiations at all to both sides. The approval of both -- not just by you, Mr Marx -- cannot be mere lip service; rather this approval emerges from the realizations and the conviction which result from the situation of our country.

The Soviet leadership on its part, in any event, has accepted the inner logic of the dual decision, much as it is fighting it in its propaganda. A solid alliance alone will give the West European states a voice for action in foreign affairs. President Mitterrand and I were agreed in this conviction without any restriction. We are just as agreed that the substance of our policy of dialogue, moderation and reasonable harmonization of interests must be preserved. This policy also serves all of us. It is part of the common policy and decisively important for our security and that of Berlin.

No honest person, ladies and gentlemen, can ignore the fact that the Federal Government's foreign and security policies meet with broad approval among our people. This approval does not come only from the Federal Republic; I also receive many letters from the GDR expressing this approval. Many Poles now coming from their homeland likewise encourage the Federal Government to pursue its course. But above all this course is based on an overwhelming majority among the citizens of the Federal Republic. [applause]

Three-quarters of our fellow citizens advocate a solid mooring of the Federal Republic in the Atlantic alliance, a close contact with the policy of the United States. In this respect, 20 percent hold a different view. Nothing is changed in this by the fact that well over 50 percent of our fellow citizens does not regard the social and economic conditions of the United States as a model. It is only a relatively small minority which does the latter. But there is no doubt at all that Europe and the United States are not twins who should display identical behavior all the time and everywhere. They are partners with common ideals, with common central interests, but also with very divergent ideas and interests in individual cases. They are partners who need to coordinate their attitude time and again and who can do so, too, because they are closely allied not only historically and politically, not only economically and militarily, but also because they are allied through the common concepts of values concerning democracy, personal freedom and peace.

We Germans have to thank the United States for quite a lot; that we got back on our feet after the war politically and economically, that Berlin did not have to surrender to communist threats, that we can live without fear of an aggression such as a state in western Asia experienced 2 years ago. And we owe gratitude -- gratitude is not an easy virtue and sometimes it is hard for young people. There is about 1/5 of our citizens who advocate German neturality. There are other states in the West showing higher percentage figures. As I said, an overwhelming majority advocates this alliance, but at the same time an overwhelming majority also advocates a policy of arms control.

Naturally nobody can be enthusiastic if we might be forced to deploy new missiles on German soil. There are some people who want this in any case; this is a rather small minority, 20 percent. The vast majority of the Germans, by contrast, advocates a policy which derives its orientation from the dual decision. The vast majority, hence, is for the alliance and for our contribution, and it is also in favor of our Bundeswehr which, despite some public chiding, under the political leadership by Dr Apel has become one of the most popular institutions in our country.

There are voices abroad which blame the Federal Republic -- voices which deem it suitable for leveling such charges at the Federal Republic -- that pacifism is spreading in Germany. While in foreign countries I reminded the people, by contrast, that in former years the young Germans had been chided abroad for the exact opposite, namely, for militarism. That should not be forgotten. But here in our own country I wish to state the following, for the record, to some speakers of the peace movement: They should not pretend that existing Soviet SS-20 missiles trained also on targets in Germany are less dangerous than U.S. missiles which are not even here yet. [applause]

I asked General Secretary Brezhnev and President Reagan not to mistake such faux pas as being symptomatic of the basic attitude of the German people. Such a misunderstanding may well lead to serious misunderstandings, to wrong decisions with serious consequences, in either capital city. Perhaps I may add one thing yet: People who address themselves to the West with loud protests but have no word or demonstration to spare for the people in Poland, do not at all impress me deeply either morally or politically. [applause]

I regret that there will be two separate resolutions adopted today. I am sorry to see that the opposition takes offense if I, for a change, reply after weeks of malicious chiding. But the opposition will know, as does everybody who speaks to people in the street, while shopping, or at the place of employment -- something I have done in my last vacation days -- [shouts] and I have felt what you do not want to admit, but what you also feel: The vast majority of Germans, regardless of whether they have voted for the FDP, SPD or CDU, strongly support our policy of balance, moderation and a sense of proportion. [applause]

In this spirit and with regard to our foreign and security policies and because of peace I passionately advocate reason. A Polish author, Nobel prize winner Czeslaw Milosz, described the passion for reason as follows: Human reason is beautiful and invincible; it can neither be hurt by prison bars, barbed wire or deportation. He goes on to say: The vision becomes more sublime than reality, a friend of hope but a foe of desperation. Indeed, reason is a friend of hope. [prolonged applause]

Kohl Responds

[Excerpts] Bonn, 14 Jan (DPA) -- The first speaker in the debate on Schmidt's government statement to the Bundestag, opposition leader Helmut Kohl sharply attacked the chancellor for his attitude on the Polish question. He said that the weakness and opportunism of Schmidt's policy over the last few weeks and months has led to the fact that in delivering his report to the people the head of government has only been able to manage by means of pure aggressiveness and insults.

"Your speech reflects hubris and weakness together," the CDU chairman said to the applause of his parliamentary group. When Schmidt is not able to go any further he strikes out in all directions no matter what he destroys. Kohl expressed gratitude and recognition to the people of the Federal Republic for their solidarity actions for their Polish neighbors. He said that over the past few months the citizens of the Federal Republic have donated more than DM30 million for Poland, which is more than all the donations from the rest of Europe. Kohl appealed to the people not to waver in their readiness to help. He urged the Bundestag to endorse the CDU/CSU's motion for parcels to be sent to Poland free of postage.

In his sharp criticism of the attitude of the Federal Government to Poland, Kohl accused the chancellor of "the bankruptcy of your policy in your own Social Democratic Party." In a long list of quotations, namely from the Western press, he stated that Schmidt has not been able to uphold his earlier judgement about Moscow's role in the Polish crisis. As late as 30 December Schmidt had said that the Soviet Union is not to be regarded as the instigator. But then the Federal Government "from statement to statement" had to concede more and more clearly Moscow's responsibility in order not to isolate itself even further in the alliance.

Kohl described the picture of the present policy as "depressing." He accused the Free Democrats of insulting the CDU/CSU deputies as cold warriors. "Things have come to a pretty pass with the liberal principles of German politics," Kohl complained about the FDP attitude. Pointing to the Soviet Union, Kohl said that peace in Europe remains threatened as long as Moscow sees military overarming as the only means for suppressing the reform movements in the states of the Warsaw Pact. He said that in the event of a continuation of the Soviet policy of aggression and of the attempt to stifle the Polish process of reform Moscow will have to pay a high political, economic, moral price internationally.

Bundestag Resolution

[Summary] Bonn, 14 Jan (DPA) -- The Bundestag tonight passed the motion of the SPD-FDP coalition parties supporting the government's policy on Poland and in particular its "prudent attitude." At the same time the house rejected the motion of the opposition which had contained sharper formulations and called for "suitable political, economic and financial measures also against the USSR" while the present conditions in Poland continued.

GENSCHER: POLAND CONTINUES AWAY FROM REFORM PATH

DW131427 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0615 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Report on Limberg interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; date and place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] The United States, which has worked out a rather concrete program of sanctions, may have wished more from its partners. Is yesterday's 16-point program the lowest common denominator?

[Answer] It is certainly more than that. It is the expression of a political strategy of the Western alliance's members -- a political strategy aimed at getting the process of reforms and renewal going again in Poland while implementing the three demands raised here in the Federal Republic from the very beginning, namely lifting martial law, releasing those arrested, and resuming the dialogue between the leadership in Poland, the Catholic Church and the Solidarity union. It is obvious that the hopes that the declaration of martial law in Poland would be just a temporary measure have not been fulfilled so far. On the contrary, everything indicates that a long-term development is being introduced leading away from the reform course.

[Question] You said that we should not count on the situation in Poland improving in the near future. Under what concrete circumstances would the Federal Government consider imposing sanctions?

[Answer] I did not say that we should not count that -- our political statement is the opposite of such considerations -- I said that unfortunately the hopes raised by the Polish leadership that they would very quickly return to the normal course have not materialized so far. Yesterday's statement gives the members of the Western alliance the opportunity to react properly if a further worsening of the situation occurs. We must keep one thing firmly in mind: Everything we do must be viewed from the standpoint of whether it will help the Polish people or not. This is why we strongly emphasized yesterday that humanitarian aid and private aid for the Polish people must not just be continued but if possible increased. We also said that food supplies should naturally be continued by our states. In doing this we must ensure that this food really gets into the hands of those who should get it, namely the people of the Polish People's Republic.

[Question] But export credits are to be discontinued if no food is involved, and negotiations on rescheduling debts will also be discontinued. Won't all of this force Poland into further dependence on the Soviet Union?

[Answer] No, we must very carefully examine what effect this will have and how the Polish leadership will react to the expectations of the West. By the way, this question was decided by the FRG not yesterday, but in the 18 December Bundestag resolution. I strongly hope that we will persistently continue our policy which is aimed -- I must say it again -- solely at helping the Polish people in their goal of renewal and reform. This is not a matter of noisy statements but of political strategy, and here lies the actual significance of yesterday's meeting. Such a political strategy was outlined yesterday within the alliance. It is now a matter of pursuing it persistently and soberly.

[Question] In connection with the events you mentioned -- the 18 December Bundestag resolution, the statement of the European Community and that of NATO -- do you believe it is necessary to adopt a new resolution -- as is planned by the CDU/CSU -- announcing sanctions in the event the Polish situation does not improve?

[Answer] I cannot anticipate what opinion will be formed by the Bundestag. But as a member of the government and of the Bundestag, I can say that I would welcome it if the Bundestag abided by what the European Community, the alliance and the Bundestag itself expressed on 18 December, and if the Bundestag abided by what is contained in the joint statement of Federal Chancellor Schmidt and the U.S. President. This statement indicates that the policy of the FRG is aimed, together with the allied partners, at persistently supporting the reform course. I believe that this is important for the time when the strategy with regard to Poland, which we want to pursue together, is actually implemented.

[Question] And this prerequisite would be fulfilled by the resolution planned by the CDU/CSU?

[Answer] I am not familiar with the CDU resolution, so I can't say anything about it. But actually I have already said what I think of it.

[Question] The federal chancellor will go to France tomorrow for talks with President Mitterrand. The French press has strongly criticized the Federal Republic's Polish policy. Is the meeting being held to quickly manage a crisis?

[Answer] No, most certainly not. I think, however, that these two states, which always believed it important to cooperate in problems related particularly to Europe, have good reasons for a meeting between the French president and the federal chancellor. The French foreign minister and I met yesterday as well as on 4 January. Such a meeting is important in a difficult international situation -- not to eliminate French press speculation, but to discuss joint action for which an important basis was established by yesterday's statement.

You must remember that it was a long time until some Western states realized that grave responsibility exists on the part of the Soviet Union for developments in Poland. The Federal Republic supported this opinion from the very beginning. This explains why at a very early time, namely before Christmas, the federal chancellor as well as the U.S. President approached not only Jaruzelski but also Mr Brezhnev in connection with developments in Poland, and that is where our demand is addressed. On the basis of the Helsinki Final Act, and of a statement by the Polish leadership to us and the Polish people, the way to reform and renewal must be finally cleared.

TRADE WITH EAST TO BE UNAFFECTED BY SANCTIONS

[Text] Bonn, 13 Jan (DPA) -- Existing trade agreements with the East will not be affected by already imposed or future U.S. economic sanctions, said Government Spokesman Kurt Becker after the cabinet meeting today. Addressing the Federal Cabinet, which discussed in detail the 11 Jan NATO foreign ministers' conference in Brussels and the situation in Poland, Federal Economics Minister Otto Lambsdorf commented on the economic measures and outlined the areas which could be affected by trade sanctions between the major Western countries and the East.

Using the example of the European-Soviet gas pipeline deal, Becker made it clear that it could not be affected by the alliance's commitment not to undermine U.S. measures. Since the United States is not the main supplier in this deal but is only to supply some parts, the agreement could not therefore be put in question. Becker refused to specify whether this formulation cleared the way for the missing U.S. parts to be supplied from third countries.

After almost identical reports on the situation by the federal chancellor and the foreign minister, Schmidt stressed "complete accord" to the cabinet. The federal chancellor warned against the danger of diverting the Polish crisis into an alleged crisis in the Western alliance. The federal foreign minister then said that he was grateful to his French counterpart Claude Cheysson, who defended the federal chancellor against French press criticism that he was a neutralist.

DRESDNER BANK ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON POLISH DEBTS

[Text] Bonn, 12 Jan (AFP) -- Poland has every intention of negotiating the rescheduling of its massive debts to Western bankers, the West German Dresdner Bank announced in a communique issued here today. The communique follows the visit of a Dresdner Bank delegation to Warsaw yesterday headed by the bank's president, Hans Friderichs -- the first Western bankers to enter Poland since martial law was imposed there last month.

The communique said that Polish Finance Minister Marian Krzak and the President of the Handlowy Warsaw Bank, Marian Minkiewicz, stressed Poland's wish to sign an agreement rescheduling its 1981 debts to Western banks. But it also noted the insistence of Western banks that Poland pay off its outstanding 1981 interest bill for $350 million before the agreement is signed. Last month, before the imposition of martial law in Poland, Western banks agreed to give Poland another seven years to pay the $2,400 million debt due for repayment last year. But they made the signing of the agreement conditional on payment of the interest bill. This stipulation was confirmed by a meeting of bankers in London last week.

Poland is particularly eager to sign the agreement because it will then be able to start negotiating postponement of more payments due this year and over the next few years. Warsaw owes a total of about $26.5 billion to the West -- about $16 million to [words indistinct] governments. West German banking sources have confirmed that Poland has already paid about $50 million of the $350 million interest bill.

The Dresdner Bank delegation was in Warsaw yesterday at the same time as ministers of the Atlantic alliance in Brussels decided to suspend talks on rescheduling Poland's debts to Western governments. But the West German banking sources added that the NATO move would have little practical effect since Western governments had never intended holding talks with Warsaw before the banks had signed their own debt rescheduling accords. Meanwhile, banking sources in Vienna denied reports that Warsaw's main Western creditors were due to meet representatives of the Handlowy Bank in the Austrian capital tomorrow. But they added that the meeting could be held soon.

CARDINAL ACCUSES POLISH REGIME OF 'DECEPTION'

[Text] Bonn, 13 Jan (DPA) -- The chairman of the German Catholic Bishops' Conference, Cardinal Joseph Hoeffner, has accused the military regime in Poland of "deception." Despite an alleged slight easing of conditions, the situation in Poland had worsened during recent days, he said in an interview with DEUTSCHE WELLE. The trials of Solidarity members especially show that the protestations of the military regime, that there will be an early return to the conditions existing before 13 December, "were clearly a deception intended to divert attention from the real plans."

Hoeffner emphasized that anybody now talking of a purely domestic event "sacrifices the will for freedom of an entire people to an imaginary policy of detente." The Polish people have a right to expect our moral support and clear attitude. The cardinal announced that an hour of prayers for Poland combined with a collection of donations will be observed in all Catholic churches in the Federal Republic next Sunday.

Hoeffner's statment has been prereleased to DPA by DEUTSCHE WELLE.

GENSCHER RECEIVES GDR REPRESENTATIVE MOLDT

LD131640 Hamburg DPA in German 1459 GMT 13 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 13 Jan (DPA) -- The GDR has continued the intra-German correspondence on the subject of disarmament and arms control. Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher yesterday received head of the GDR's permanent mission in the FRG Ewald Moldt, the Foreign Ministry announced today. During the meeting, Moldt handed over a letter from GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer in reply to a letter from Genscher. Genscher's letter was handed over at the intra-German meeting in December on Lake Werbellin by Federal Minister Egon Franke.

WISCHNEWSKI RECEIVES SALVADORAN OPPOSITION LEADER

[Text] Bonn, 13 Jan (DPA) -- SPD Deputy Chairman Wischnewski had a talk in Bonn today with Guillermo Ungo, leader of the El Salvador opposition party FRD [Revolutionary Democratic Front] and other leading members of the FRD about the situation and the civil war in El Salvador. According to the SPD the talk was concerned with efforts "to pave the way to democracy and internal and external independence for the afflicted country and population." The FRD delegation is visiting several West European Countries.

COMMENTATOR VIEWS NATO MINISTERS' STATEMENT

[Ruediger Moniac commentary: "A Strategy of Peace"]

[Text] NATO needed 4 weeks to react to the Warsaw shock. Jaruzelski's military regime, established on 13 December in Poland, is now being clearly condemned by the alliance -- late but the more strongly -- and accused of imposing martial law, violating human rights and thus standing in sharp contrast to the UN Charter and the Helsinki Final Act. The results of the special meeting of the NATO foreign ministers, expressed in a 16-point statement, have significance and weight in several respects.

1. After a year of Reagan's foreign policy, the United States has found the right approach to its European allies. Washington is heading the alliances again without playing the tutor. The Brussels statement can be taken as good evidence in this respect. Its coming about would have been impossible without the persistent work of U.S. diplomacy on which Haig brought decisive influence to bear. Genscher's loyal support of Haig contributed to it also. It seems to be a happy coincidence that the former NATO commander in chief, who has learned to think and feel like many of his European partners, has become the head of the State Department.

So the administration was not asking too much of its allies on this side of the Atlantic in its response to the Polish events. But it was still so much that the result of the meeting can be assessed in the way Haig engineered the birth of a political strategy of the West vis-a-vis the aggressive Soviet Union.

2. After the Atlantic confusion of voices regarding the assessment of responsibility for the Polish crisis, NATO has taken a clear position in Brussels in the meantime. It considers the Soviet Union as the wirepuller of the Warsaw events, even if that takes place behind the screen, and it clearly condemns Moscow for it. The statement of the 15 says that the Soviet Union does not have the right to determine the political and social developments in Poland. By the way: the federal chancellor had to go a long way until he knew this and until he had his foreign minister support it in Brussels.

3. This clarity of the Western alliance's statement can be understood as a clear condemnation of the Brezhnev doctrine. NATO even has, if you will, for the first time opposed the Brezhnev doctrine with its own doctrine of freedom. It says: Every nation, every country, even if it is in an alliance with the Soviet Union, has the inalienable right to settle its internal affairs itself. And -- this is the second aspect of the NATO position -- the West will try with regard to the Soviet superpower with the proper means of its developing political strategies to guarantee or make available this self-determination right to all countries in the shadow of Moscow.

4. The Brussels statement eventually has the effect of a touchstone of the political process in Poland. The condemnation of Moscow as the one responsible for the actions of the military regime, makes Jaruzelski and the forces supporting him the helpers of Brezhnev in the eyes of the Polish nation. This draws a sharp line between the regime and the people. That is of great psychological significance. The Poles can in this indirect way for the first time feel that real help for reforms in their country cannot be expected to come from Jaruzelski but from foreign Western countries which definitely insist on adherance to the Helsinki Final Act with regard to the current rulers in Warsaw.

In view of such effects, weaknesses of the Brussels NATO statement do not fade away, but they disappear very much in the background. The agreements of the 15 are obviously rather vague regarding the possibilities of concrete and effective sanctions with regard to Moscow and Warsaw with the aim of giving a new impetus to the Polish reform process. But after all, the United States' partners, except Greece, agreed for the first time not to completely ban the means of "punishment" of the originators of the Polish tragedy from the arsenal of their political arms.

This is a special kind of novelty. It shows after all that the United States' way of thinking is gaining ground gradually with regard to peaceful regulation or even containment of Soviet aggressive policy. Seen in this light, the alliance has made a great step toward awakening hopes for a new period of solidarity in action.

PAPER VIEWS SIGNIFICANCE OF TAIWAN ARMS DEAL

[Commentary signed SCHR.: "Reagan Is Thinking of Beijing"]

[Text] Perhaps it is premature to speak of a new Reagan, yet the man lately has proven several times that he is more flexible than his adversaries believe and not at all a puppet of the powerful conservative wing of the Republican Party. Not only has he largely abandoned the idea of linkage, that is, the connection of arms control talks with Soviet good behavior; not only has he dropped one of his loyal conservative followers, his former security adviser Richard Allen; he even antagonized Taiwan and its U.S. lobby the other day. His decision not to deliver any modern fighter planes to Taiwan is extra proof that the influence of Secretary of State Haig has in fact increased, because it has Haig who was against the Taiwan deal out of regard for Beijing.

Reagan's decision is of both internal and external political significance. It indicates that the President begins to repudiate some rigid positions he had advocated during the election campaign, and that he will not be stopped from doing so even by the grumbles of his old conservative friends. Even the President cannot ignore what is simply fact. Risking the relations with Beijing -- which were so laboriously resumed by Nixon and which still are difficult -- out of an old love for the heirs of Chiang Kai-shek would have been pure folly and, besides, would not have strengthened Taiwan's security. The mutual interest between China and the United States out of fear of the Russians still is Taiwan's best guarantee.

This is why it is improbable that Beijing will seize the island by force, and not because its airplanes are even older than those of the hostile brothers. And yet Beijing protests, albeit mildly, against other U.S. arms deliveries to Taipeh. There are domestic policy compulsions in Beijing as well.

MITTERRAND, SCHMIDT HOLD TALKS ON POLISH EVENTS

[Text] Paris, 13 Jan (AFP) -- West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt arrived here today for an evening of talks with French President Francois Mitterrand. Mr Schmidt began his visit with a meeting with Mr Mitterrand at the Elysee Presidential Palace. He was later to be the guest at a dinner hosted by Mr Mitterrand and attended by French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy and External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson and West German Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Berndt von Staden and Secretary of State to the Chancellor's Office Manfred Lahnstein.

Agree in Assessment

[Text] Paris, 13 Jan (DPA) -- The French leadership and the Federal Government are agreed in their assessment of the situation in Poland and the reaction of the West. This was stated by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt late tonight at the end of his 3-hour meeting with President Mitterrand in Paris.

Schmidt said that the two governments also have agreed that the head of the Polish military government, Gen Wojciech Jaruzelski, must implement the aims he has announced for his people. Schmidt mentioned the lifting of martial law, the release of internees and the resumption of the dialogue with the people and the workers.

Schmidt went on to say that both politicians realize that public opinion in their countries reacted differently to events in Poland. Mitterrand showed much understanding for the German attitude which was determined by the fact that the Federal Republic, situated as it was at the junction with the East bloc, reacted somewhat differently.

Schmidt pointed out how strongly German sympathy with Poland manifested itself by the sending of parcels. He announced that both governments intended to continue their humanitarian help for Poland.

Mitterrand began by rejecting the view that there is insufficient common ground and coordination between Bonn and Paris over the Polish crisis. He drew attention to many contacts between the two governments. Bonn and Paris will continue their coordination "if there is a serious problem for the two countries or if it is a question of the equilibrium in the world."

MARCHAIS REVEALS CONTENT OF JARUZELSKI LETTER

[Text] Georges Marchais has just made public the letter that General Jaruzelski sent him. The general affirms that the state of emergency is a transitional stage and that it is the only solution. He declares himself ready to create a broad platform of national accord which would bring together all the forces which are in favor of the main principles of the Polish Constitution. Truly independent trade unions will have a place there. Lastly the letter stresses the Polish nature of the problem and the danger of the U.S. reaction.

More Details

[Excerpt] General Jaruzelski stresses the Polish nature of the problems which have arisen several times -- problems that only the Poles can resolve, he writes. He expresses a wish to create, based on a frank and open dialogue, a wide platform of national concord. The opportunity for concord remains open, he writes. On the other hand, he appears a little more restrictive on the activities of the church, by recalling simply that its rights are guaranteed by the constitution, as for other faiths. Lastly, there is a sentence which illustrates the uncomfortable position of the PCF: It is my conviction that we can count on the understanding of the PCF despite the difficulties that your position as a governmental party involves for you.

ADMIRAL CONCERNED AT SIZE OF NAVY BUDGET

[Text] In an editorial published by the weekly COLS BLEUS of 2 January Adm Jean Lannuzel, chief of the Navy General Staff, discloses what he calls the navy's "temporary difficulties," a result of its inadequate budget and undermanning. However, the admiral expresses his confidence because, he writes, "It is a fact that the building up of a navy depends on continuity, determination and tenacity."

Discussing the navy budget for 1982, the general staff's weekly states that program authorizations amoung to Fr12,490,000,000 -- a 12.2 percent increase compared with the previous year. "This relatively small increase is causing concern," COLS BLEUS observes, "because the navy needs to order in 1982 an attack nuclear submarine, two antisubmarine corvettes, two minesweepers, two Super-Patra patrol vessles, two 400-ton Public Service Vessels, two survey vessels and one mine warfare research vessel."

"Since the program authorizations for the strategic ocean-going force and aeronaval construction projects -- the launching of the so-called ANG program for a new navy patrol aircraft -- have respectively been increased 30 percent and 43 percent, it is the sphere of the navy's new construction," COLS BLEUS believes, "that is to bear practically on its own the brunt of restrictions."

In any case, the navy weekly remarks that the first of the two nuclear aircraft carriers whose construction was decided in 1980 to replace the Foch and the Clemenceau should have been ordered in 1981.

"With respect to the navy budget for 1982," Admiral Lannuzel writes, "the small scale of program authorizations, whose 12.2 percent increase is smaller than price increases, is alarming. Now the future depends on authorization programs. Provided it is exceptional and applies to 1982 only, the small size of program authorizations will have no irreversible consequences. My most ardent wish is to see them increase to a level compatible with the objectives of a navy of the year 2000."

Recalling his hope that the plan for an increase in the navy's manpower by some 5,000 men would be implemented, the admiral writes: "By creating 408 posts, as provided for in the 1982 budget, the navy has ensured that this plan is beginning to be implemented. Nonetheless the main problem facing the navy remains the fact that it is undermanned as a result of the historical fact that the overall payroll strength has not changed since 1965.... This undermanning has had some negative consequences, and I am well aware of the fact that on board some ships it has been necessary to institute a watch and watch system [regime du quart par bordee] which has led to a 12-hour day." However, the admiral believes that "these are temporary difficulties which have not shaken my confidence with respect to the future."

LE MONDE VIEWS IMPLIED CRITICISM OF CHEYSSON

[Maurice Delarue report]

[Text] The statements made by [Elysee secretary general] Beregovoy Tuesday 12 January following the inner cabinet meeting devoted to the international situation and especially to Poland "surprised" the Quai d'Orsay since they were aimed at [external relations minister] Cheysson (that was stated in confidence but clearly) and seemed to call into question the pledges made by France at Monday's Atlantic Council meeting. However, the Elysee secretary general's statements have not been clarified.

Mr Beregovoy stated: "The president recalled France's position and recalled that external policy is his direct responsibility and that it is up to him to ensure that France speaks with one voice on these problems."

According to the president's entourage this rebuke was sparked not only by the argument over Poland between Mr Poperen (PS number two who is not a government member) and Transport Minister Fiterman, but also by External Relations Minister Cheysson's stances, also on Poland. Foreign Trade Minister Jobert, who advocated the repudiation of the Helsinki accord and the boycotting of the Madrid conference, which the government intends to make use of, is apparently also a target. Moreover Mr Jobert is now showing a great deal of discretion.

Two parts of recent statements by Mr Cheysson on the [apparent line drop] in force in East Europe and on aid to Poland are involved.

-- Before stating on the Radio Luxembourg-LE MONDE Grand Jury program Sunday that the main aspect of the East-West conflict is "the struggle against totalitarianism" and that it is necessary to "demonstrate" its "real nature" and to "reveal" its "mechanisms," the minister had secured the adoption of a statement by the European Ten condemning "the incompetence of totalitarian systems and of those in East Europe." Mr Cheysson is criticized less for the substance of his remarks than for their form, which the Elysee regards as pointlessly provocative toward the communist ministers.

-- With regard to Poland Mr Beregovoy stated after the interministerial meeting: "France has already said what it thinks of economic sanctions (in Brussels -- LE MONDE note). It has stated that it would continue its economic cooperation (with Poland -- LE MONDE note) unless there were some change in the situation. Look at what is happening in East Europe, there is no change for the time being."

Taken literally these remarks mean that France is hostile to any sanctions against Poland unless the situation deteriorates, and that is not only contrary to what Mr Cheysson said to the "Grand Jury" but also to the Brussels Atlantic Council communique to which France subscribed. That communique announces the suspension: 1) of "future trade credit on goods other than food products," and 2) of the negotiations on the rescheduling of the Polish debt.

Indeed, according to the best sources, the government is in no way going back on these decisions, but Mr Beregovoy spoke in terms which might lead to confusion (what do the words "sanctions" and "cooperation" mean?) In practical terms the decisions of the Atlantic Council, by which France abides, mean that in present circumstances: 1) No new commercial contract (other than on food) will be concluded with Poland but contracts already signed will be met; 2) The Atlantic allies will not negotiate the rescheduling of the Polish debt with Warsaw, but that will not prevent them discussing it among themselves.

NATO DELIBERATIONS ON POLAND: LIMITED SUCCESS

[Editorial]

[Excerpt] A "satisfactory" meeting but a "less forceful" statement than the one which had been adopted by the Ten 1 week earlier: that comment by Mr Cheysson on the Atlantic Council's ministerial session held in Brussels on Monday on the situation in Poland reflects the different nature of the two meetings. The median linking the European Ten and the alliance fifteen cannot be straight. It also reflects the Greeks' continuing rejection. The Athens delegate had been sacked by his government 1 week ago for signing the Ten's communique. Today, the minister sent by Mr Papandreou struggled so fiercely to defend his viewpoint that, for the first time, his reservations were noted in a NATO "declaration."

The fact remains that the "condemnation" of Polish martial law drawn up by the fifteen mentions the "total disapproval" expressed by the Ten and the reference to Soviet pressures "which must stop" echoes the "concern" shown by the Europeans on the same subject. The call for an early meeting of the Madrid conference at ministerial level takes up the proposal put forward by the Europeans.

The Atlantic alliance also subscribes to the Ten's view that the "inability of totalitarian systems to accept the necessary adaptations" could eventually "seriously affect international relations." The only difference is that the fifteen preferred to condemn the "inflexibility" of the said regimes rather than talking of "totalitarianism."

With regard to sanctions, the fifteen were more specific in listing the measures envisaged but were just as vague as the Ten about implementing them. The Atlantic statement mentions the suspension of trade credits and of negotiations on settling the Polish debt in 1982, the possibility of "measures which might be applied to imports from the Soviet Union" and stresses the "importance" of the measures already announced by Washington in this connection, without expressing approval of them.

But each country will act "according to its situation and its own legislation," and that considerably limits the scope of possible sanctions and does not settle the disagreements. The Greeks, who think that their main adversary is Turkey, refuse to support anything resembling an overall condemnation of Poland and rejected any sanction. The Germans are still more cautious than their partners although they supported the two Brussels statements.

The "great success for the alliance" of which Mr Haig spoke in Brussels, has, therefore, been limited. Nonetheless the United States can consider that its allies have pledged to take action, at least eventually, and to gradually establish a mechanism of sanctions against Warsaw and Moscow should the situation in Poland not improve and more especially should it deteriorate. But more consultations will certainly be necessary to produce results.

RED BRIGADES PLANS FOR FUTURE ACTIONS UNCOVERED

[Excerpts] Rome, 14 Jan (ANSA) -- The kidnapping of Fiat manager Cesare Romiti, an assault on the Fossombrone jail to free a group of terrorists and a military action against the national headquarters in Rome of the Italian Christian Democratic Party were all part of Red Brigades offensive planned for the coming months in Italy before a police crackdown on the urban guerrilla organization led to 15 arrests and the discovery of 5 hideouts. All of the targets were Italian and were planned by the "Movimentisti" wing of the Red Brigades as a counter to the international offensive launched December 17 with the kidnapping of U.S. General James Lee Dozier, a NATO officer, by the northern "Militaristic" wing. From the mountains of documents police found in the groups' hideouts, it appeared that the "Movimentisti" were planning a wave of terrorist actions over the next few months, directed exclusively against Italian targets.

In the meantime, no progress has been announced in investigations into the kidnapping of the NATO officer. Meanwhile, it was learned that the three persons arrested in Verona Tuesday had nothing to do with the Red Brigades. Apparently they were common criminals preparing for a robbery at the time of their arrest.

SPADOLINI DEMANDS END TO MARTIAL LAW IN POLAND

[Text] Rome, 13 Jan (ANSA) -- Premier Giovanni Spadolini asked for an end to martial law in Poland, the release of "all persons arrested or detained" in the country, and the resumption of "an authentic dialogue between the government and the church and popular forces" in his reply to the letter he received earlier this month from Polish Premier Wojciech Jaruzelski. In his message to the Polish leader, made public today, the Italian head of government also referred to the "anxiety and concern" and the "unanimous condemnation" of the government, Parliament and Italian political and social forces of "the harsh restrictions imposed on civil and human rights and on the Polish people's trade union liberties."

Spadolini went on to insist that Italy's Government, Parliament and political and social forces "equally deplore all types of outside pressure applied to hinder and impede the reform and renewal process underway in Poland" before the December 13 martial law clampdown. "These pressures are in open conflict with the conduct which should be followed by the signatory countries of the Helsinki Final Act," the premier said in his letter. The head of government went on to confirm that "whenever there are tangible signs of the reestablishment of the conditions for democratic life in Poland (the Italian Government) will favorably reexamine ways and means for the resumption of Italian economic support" for the country. In conclusion, the Italian premier assured General Jaruzelski that, in agreement with the other nations of the European Economic Community and the Atlantic alliance, Italy will not interrupt the flow of humanitarian aid to Poland "so long as there are guarantees that this aid is, in fact, being received by those persons for whom it was intended."

BERLINGUER WINDS UP PCI CENTRAL COMMITTEE SESSION

[Text] A short while ago the text of the speech with which Berlinguer wound up the proceedings of the PCI Central Committee was released in the press room of the Chamber of Deputies. The debate and the reflections initiated under the thrust of the events in Poland, Berlinguer said, must continue and expand outside the PCI. Berlinguer said the discussion conducted within the Central Committee expressed much agreement with the document submitted by the directorate and with the introductory speech.

Addressing himself to Cossutta, who, as we know, failed to agree with the PCI leaders' analysis of the events in Poland, Berlinguer said he had continued to evade an examination of the facts, preferring instead to use expressions which in themselves mean little and are ambiguous in certain parts. Still speaking to Cossutta, Berlinguer said further: If we were to hold a referendum, only an insignificant minority of Italian workers would say they aspire to live in a type of society similar to that existing in the Soviet Union and the other East European countries.

Berlinguer Closing Report

[Text] Rome, 15 Jan (ANSA) -- A harshly worded criticism of pro-Soviet analyses of the Polish situation was the keynote of the closing report which Italian Communist Party (PCI) Secretary Enrico Berlinguer delivered at the Central Committee session on the declaration of martial law in the East European state Wednesday evening, according to the text of Berlinguer's speech released here. The PCI's Central Committee met for three days on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday to debate the Polish crisis. Berlinguer opened the debate and his final speech was released to the press yesterday evening.

In substance, the party secretary replied only to Senator Armando Cossutta for the criticisms and reservations of a pro-Soviet stamp which he has advanced against the positions so far adopted by the rest of the party's leadership on the crisis. In an article published on an inside page of the party daily, L'UNITA, and during the Central Committee session, Cossutta defended the Soviet Union's role as a "reference-point" for all communist parties.

According to Berlinguer, however, Cossutta has continued to "evade an examination of the facts, preferring to use expressions which in themselves say little, and which in part seem ambiguous." Berlinguer identified one of Cossutta's "ambiguous" expressions as being his idea of the Soviet Union as a "reference-point." He said that the senator has completely ignored the "starting-point for all the thinking" that has been going on in the PCI since the declaration of martial law in Poland in mid-December. According to Berlinguer, Cossutta had made "no effort to explain" why the Polish crisis had broken out, nor why there had been other, earlier crises in Poland. Nor had he tried to explain "other phenomena of involution in other socialist countries and the Soviet Union itself," the party secretary added.

But the position documents issued by the party leadership and his own report to the Central Committee tried to carry out this analysis, Berlinguer said. According to Berlinguer, there is no difficulty in recognizing the "role and significance of the Soviet Union, the October Revolution and the beginning of the building of socialism in Russia, in the life and development of the world and humanity." But the situation is quite different today, Berlinguer pointed out in an implicit reference to a recent interview in which he said that the Jaruzelski government's declaration of martial law marked the end to an historical epoch that began with the October Revolution.

Even though admitting that, "in the complex of world equilibria, the Soviet Union represents a "counter-weight to American imperialism's strength and aggressivity," Berlinguer did not draw back from his criticism of Soviet policies. "It is a fact," he said, "that, especially since 1965, we have been, and still are, faced by political positions and concrete facts effected by the Soviet Union which have not represented, and certainly do not constitute, a help for the struggle of the peoples against imperialism, and have not even favored, but rather have hindered, the process of detente and the struggle for peace."

'Distancing' From USSR

[Text] Rome, 14 Jan (ANSA) -- The Italian Communist Party has formally sanctioned distancing itself from the Soviet Union, according to the thrust of editorial comment in the nation's dailies today on three days of debate conducted by the party's Central Committee, which ended yesterday, on the situation in Poland and Soviet responsibility for the proclamation of martial law in the Eastern European country on December 13.

"The debate was intense and there were times when it was bitter, not so much as regards the quality of the condemnation of the Polish military regime but on criticism of the 'Soviet model' and on extending autonomy from Moscow," CORRIERE DELLA SERA of Milan said. The paper went on to note that the thinking of Secretary Enrico Berlinguer on the "Soviet responsibility" for the military coup in Poland and the view that "the drive of the 1917 Bolshevik revolution has exhausted itself" achieved consensus "of unforeseen dimensions with only one vote cast against his report and two abstentions filed."

The Rome journal LA REPUBBLICA told readers that the Communist Party's new policy line, "born with considerable difficulty, will now begin its far from easy course in daily political reality." The comment then speculated on what the future would hold for Berlinguer's "third way" for Italian communism and said that the first trial would be represented by dealing with the nation's Socialist Party, the third largest in Italy, which has been sending out indifferent signals to the communists of late.

According to IL MANIFESTO, the paper for the forces to the left of the Communist Party, "this Central Committee meeting was really something new and important" because the Communist Party made a "choice which was, in some ways, painful." The editorial identified the choice as "the search for socialism" without remaining anchored to "new oppression." So the "anchor line" to the Soviet Union is now broken, IL MANIFESTO said, "and now the Italian party is in high seas in search of a course to follow."

IL GIORNALE NUOVO of Milan, a right-of-center daily, questioned whether Italy's Communists still consider valid the four fundamental principles of Marxist-Leninism, "the dictatorship of the proletariat, the elimination of class enemies, the collectivization of the means of production and the absolution of the free market." The paper then said, "So long as Italy's communists are silent on these points, we do not understand why our diffidence should be stopped."

Papers View Differences

[Text] Rome, 13 Jan (ANSA) -- The deep differences which have emerged during the three-day meeting of the Italian Communist Party Central Committee, scheduled to come to an end today, between Secretary Enrico Berlinguer's attack on the "Soviet model" of socialism and the pro-Soviet wing, led by Senator Armando Cossutta, came up for front-page analysis in the nation's dailies today.

CORREIRE DELLA SERA of Milan launched the forecast that, "Everything points to this Communist Party Central Committee meeting as one which will mark a decisive time in the life of the party," the West's largest Marxist alignment. "The issues brought up by the secretary general's report" -- indicating that the "drive of the 1917 Bolshevik revolution had exhausted itself" with the declaration of martial law in Poland and referring to a "third phase or third way" for the construction of socialism -- "will have important repercussions within the party and will become matters for problematic and intense consideration," CORRIERE added.

LA REPUBBLICA of Rome said that, "Armando Cossutta returned to the attack by accusing Berlinguer of judging the countries of real socialism through an 'enlightened and sociological' perspective and of seeking to break with the Soviet Union in order to 'correct the course' of the Italian party line." The radical-socialist daily took the view, however, that, "despite the depth and seriousness of the dissent, this will not induce Senator Cossutta to provoke a split of the pro-Soviet wing of the party he leads." LA REPUBBLICA added, "Unless there is a spectacular and highly unlikely development, the secretary will emerge with a crushing success."

The authoritative financial daily IL SOLE 24 ORE of Milan said that, "While the Communist Party condemns without reservations the Polish coup and the Soviet Union, the isolation of Cossutta's pro-Soviet wing of the party is significant at a meeting which, with delays and hesitation, appears to mark a change." The paper speculated that, "a possible gap between the leadership and the militants might explain the insistence with which Cossutta again challenged Berlinguer's position as regards real socialism."

According to LA NAZIONE of Florence, "No one wants a split. Berlinguer does not want to break with the Soviet Union and Cossutta does not want to break with the party but there is a lot of mutual suspicion." The Florence daily noted that, "The debate is focused entirely on relations with the Soviet Union. Cossutta is isolated to a certain degree in that he has gathered some support from the two hundred members taking part in the meeting and signs of willingness to accept his ideas have come from even those who support Berlinguer."

CZECH EXILE PELIKAN SUBJECT OF 'PROVOCATIONS'

PM140859 Rome AVANTI in Italian 9 Jan 82 pp 1-2

[Excerpt] Intimidation and provocations have been directed for some weeks against Czechoslovak political exile Jiri Pelikan. The authors of these provocations and intimidations are easy to identify: the Czechoslovak secret services. Pelikan himself says he is convinced of this. For some time letters bearing Pelikan's name at their head and signed by the exile have been circulating in Italy. Of course both the letterhead and the signature are false. The letters are addressed to certain sections of the Italian social movement and of the "proletarian line" in Milan. In other words, the extreme right and extreme left. In these letters the fale Pelikan rails against the addresses, describing them as terrorists and threatening them with lequidation.

What is the aim of the letters? It is clearly to provoke violent reactions in their addresses against their author. This is not Pelikan, however. He immediately reported to the police the underhanded maneuver of which he is the target.

According to Pelikan, the following two facts prove that the provocation originates from the Czechoslovak secret services: 1) A similar action has been set in motion in other Western countries to the detriment of other Czechoslovak exiles, to discredit and intimidate them, 2) for several weeks Prague radio has been broadcasting a special program in which illegal recordings of telephone conversations between Pelikan and Czechoslovak exiles resident in other Western countries are played.

SOARES VIEWS POLISH, EC, DOMESTIC PROBLEMS

PM131537 Rome AVANTI in Italian 27-28 Dec 81 p XII Current Affairs and Culture Supplement

[Alberto Ninotti undated interview in Rome with Socialist Party Secretary Mario Soares: "Soares Does not regard Polish Events as Domestic Matter"]

[Text] [Question] First, Poland. What is your verdict on this crisis, which has dashed so many hopes and which is perhaps eliminating some people's final illusions?

[Answer] I would like to state clearly that I totally condemn what has happened in Poland. I believe that what has happened there cannot be dismissed as a domestic matter, because at stake are human rights and certain very important aspects of conscience as a whole, such as public freedoms, respect for the individual and essential democratic values.

What has happened is really terrible and demonstrates what we already knew, namely, that communism really is incompatible with freedom. As Maurice Duverger has pointed out, the next step from communism is military Bonapartism. It is of extremely serious significance. I believe that the myth of communism waned in Poland after what happened in Hungary, East Germany and above all Czechoslovakia.

[Question] You yourself say that what is happening in Poland cannot be dismissed as a domestic matter but in fact concerns us all as democrats. So what response should be issued as Europeans -- how specifically can we react?

[Answer] Perhaps the most pathetic aspect of the matter is that we, as Westerners, can do very little. The world is cruelly split into blocs and nobody in the West is lifting a finger to defend the Poles' freedom. All this is tragic but at the same time understandable, because we have always said that it is impossible to gamble with world peace. But in my opinion what is really important is to understand that the Polish events means that detente too is about the end or is at least in jeopardy. Everything that was laboriously built from Helsinki through Madrid, and perhaps even that which it is intended to build in Geneva, also seems seriously threatened. The Soviet must understand that as far as the West is concerned the Polish events means the end of the spirit of Helsinki.

[Question] Let us talk about Europe and the matters that concern it on the internal plane. Some 4 years ago you, as prime minister, submitted portugal's EC membership application. All this time seems to have gone by almost in vain. From now on what are Portugal's chances of joining the EC?

[Answer] It certainly cannot be said that the problem will not be resolved. Rather, we must say that there is a delay in negotiations. We have gone beyond the prenegotiation phase, after which we entered the real negotiation phase and now the deadline for membership has been set as January 1984.

I believe that Europe must make an effort to facilitate Portugal's entry into EC and that its application should be examined independly from Spain's. This is a sovereign country's right. This does not mean that Portugal will fail in its solidarity with respect to Spain. We are also in favor of Spain's EC entry. It is inconceivable for Portugal to join the EFC and for Spain to remain outside. But Spain's case is much more complicated than ours. We must therefore take at least one step forward by securing Portugal's admission to the EEC as soon as possible.

Recently an encouraging sign has come from France, whereas previously it raised certain difficulties and seems reserved toward us. This sign has come from President Mitterrand's spoken words, when he told me that France will support Portugal's EC entry as soon as possible.

I have also talked with the foreign ministers of several EC countries and they assured me that they are willing to take all the necessary initiatives to accelerate negotiations. I know that there are still many difficulties, but I believe that the politicians have the will to resolve and surmount the economic difficulties. In Italy above all, all the various sectors of the public and of the political parties are in favour of Portugal's EC entry, as President Pertini himself declared on his recent visit to Lisbon. But the real problem facing us concerns Europe and what it will become. There is at present a tangle of problems in the Europe of Ten, and this all makes it easy to understand how difficult it is to expand the EC and at the same time improve its institutions.

[Question] Portugal today. Since the installation of a moderate government that should have resolved all the problems, inflation has risen and is now running at over 20 percent a year, while unemployment has risen above 10 percent. Social and cultural problems have become exacerbated. What will be the outcome of the Portuguese crisis?

[Answer] Very recently I delivered a speech to the National Assembly defining the opposition stance on the problem of the state plan and budget, and on that occasion I said exactly what I think. First, I would point out that we are facing a terrible economic, social and financial crisis. But I do not believe in the inevitability of the crisis. I believe that the coalition that has governed the fate of the nation for almost 2 years with its three governments is responsible for many of the problems now burdening Portugal. When the phase of socialist governments led by me came to an end the balance of debts was almost zero, the volume of exports was rising again and we had established a record in tourists' visits and remittances from emigres. Even the growth rate was fairly high.

After 2 years of rightwing governments -- because that is what the Democratic Alliance coalitions are -- we are faced with a balance of payments deficit of 2.2 billion escudos, and this is a figure that Portugal has never reached before. Unemployment figures have risen and we now have 400,000 unemployed. Imports continue to grow despite all the protectionist measures adopted, while exports are falling. The growth rate is virtually zero; at first the government envisaged a 4.8 percent growth rate, then it revised its dreams and settled on 1 percent. But I believe that in fact we have reached zero growth. This government has not increased agricultural production or fishing output, which is an important resource for my country. It has increased industrial output by a very small amount, while tourism and emigres' remittances have fallen slightly. These observations lead to the conclusion that this rightwing coalition is completely incompetent and unable to govern. It is surprising that three successive rightwing governments in 2 years have launched three different economic and financial policies -- all, however, characterized by very demagogic policies, apart from some personal exceptions in the case of a few ministers. But in fact these governments have kept none of the promises made to the Portuguese people.

This is very serious. There is a strong climate of tension and social protest in the country. However, I would like to say that despite all this and despite the problems affecting labor legislation in particular, the difference with respect to the previous regime is total. Today the workers are citizens, whereas then they were objects. Today we have democratic freedoms and living standards too have experienced an improvement that is being maintained, thanks to a series of laws that remain the guarantee of the workers and citizens as a whole.

In this framework we Socialists propose an alternative policy, indeed, we are the only real alternative to reactionary governments. I believe that we could make major progress at the next elections, which could be held earlier than they would normally be scheduled to take place, because the social and economic crisis is great. The decision is up to the president, who is the only person with the power to dissolve the National Assembly, but it also depends on the stability of the ruling coalition. The rightwing parties that compose it are very divided among themselves and are grappling with very substantial contradictions. Early elections are therefore a very likely possibility, which could become a reality before the municipal elections scheduled for the end of 1982. If so, I believe that there will be a major Socialist advance, in line with what has happened in France and Greece and what will happen in Spain if elections are held there.

GOVERNMENT JUSTIFIES JOINT CHIEFS SHAKEUP

[Excerpt] Here is a note from the Ministry of Defense ahead of tomorrow's Council of Ministers' meeting to decide on changes in the present general staff of the armed forces: The prime minister, in agreement with the minister of defense and taking into account all the circumstances of the present time, when international negotiations of great importance are imminent, and which are vital to Spanish defense policy, taking account of the duration of the initial stages of these negotiations and the fact that the head of the joint chiefs of staff and the three chiefs of staff of the army, the navy and the air force will within the next few months have to pass into the active reserve by reason of age or for having served the maximum term as generals or admirals, considers it appropriate to put in their places men with a better chance of continuity and permanence in posts of such importance for the period about to begin.

Complying with the regulations, the higher councils of the army, the navy and air force met today and they have drawn up lists of generals and admirals who would be suitable for the posts of chief of staff for each of the three services. In accordance with the regulations in force, it will be the task of the government meeting tomorrow to appoint a head of the joint chiefs of staff, on the proposal of the prime minister, and chiefs of staff for each of the three services, on the proposal of the minister of defense.

New Joint Chiefs of Staff

POLL SHOWS 56 PERCENT WANT KOIVISTO PRESIDENCY

[TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA report]

[Excerpt] Helsinki -- Finnish Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto has consolidated his popularity in the coming presidential election according to the last major opinion poll before the election published in HELSINGIN SANOMAT on Saturday [9 January]. According to the poll, which was carried out in the last week of December, 56 percent of those interviewed would prefer to see Social Democratic party leader Koivisto as president. Finska Gallup's poll shows that Koivisto's personal popularity rose by a further 2 percent during December.

FINNISH-SOVIET CSCE TALKS END IN HELSINKI

[Text] Discussions between the Finnish and Soviet CSCE delegations on prospects for the continuation of the Madrid follow-up conference ended in Helsinki today. The Soviet delegation, led by Deputy Foreign Minister Leonid Ilichev, will leave for home this afternoon. In the talks, which began Tuesday, the Finnish delegation was led by Secretary of State Matti Tuovinen and leader of the Finnish CSCE delegation Ambassador Richard Mueller was also present.

Before his departure for home Deputy Foreign Minister Ilichev paid courtesy visits this morning to Deputy Premier Eino Uusitalo, and Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen. According to the Foreign Ministry, the Finnish-Soviet talks dealt among other things with the effect of current European events, chiefly the situation in Poland, and on the follow-up conference which will continue in Madrid in February. The talks also reviewed the points still open in the draft document submitted by the neutral and nonaligned countries before Christmas.

LD151032 Helsinki International Service in English 0930 GMT 15 Jan 82

[Excerpts] With more on these talks, (Eddy Hawkins): According to a Foreign Ministry communique, the talks held in Helsinki this week were undertaken with the idea that despite increased difficulties in the international situation a balanced and substantive final document can be achieved in Madrid on the basis of the mediation work of the neutral and nonaligned nations. The discussions [word indistinct] mainly dealt with the draft proposal presented by the neutral and nonaligned nations which Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Ilichev called a good basis for continuing negotiations. The head of the Soviet delegation did say, however, that if the West brings up the situation in Poland at the Madrid meeting when it reconvenes on 9 February, it could have a detrimental effect on the success of the gathering.

The European neutrals have also taken a cautious stand concerning the discussion of the Polish situation within the CSCE followup. On the other hand the neutrals have pointed out that nothing can be done to prevent the topic coming up if, for example, some of the Western countries wish to discuss it. The important neutral and nonaligned nations will be meeting to consider the significance of events in Poland at the Madrid followup in Geneva on the 25th and 26th of this month.

The head of the Finnish CSCE delegation, Ambassador Richard Mueller, will be [words indistinct] bilateral talks with representatives of a number of countries this month as well. Among those he will be meeting to discuss questions related to the Madrid followup are representatives of Belgium, the FRG and Norway.

Right now it looks as though the continuation of the Madrid meeting is in some difficulty because of, for example, the Polish situation. The neutral and nonaligned nations already before the holiday recess considered their own broad draft proposal as the only workable basis for the success of this [word indistinct] meeting. In their view, if this draft is not used as the basis for discussions, there is just no chance of success. On the other hand, none of the more controversial issues in the meeting have been agreed upon during the more than one year since its start. These mainly deal with the European disarmament conference and human rights questions. In neutral circles, the thinking seems to be that bringing up the Polish question at Madrid in February would not be very suitable in light of the known difficulties, if there is a desire to achieve substantial results in the CSCE followup.

Ilichev Comments

[Text] Leonid Ilichev, Soviet deputy foreign minister and the head of the country's delegation to the CSCE follow-up conference, has ended his 3-day visit to Helsinki. During his visit, Ilichev met Secretary of State Matti Tuovinen and the head of the Finland's CSCE delegation, Ambassador Richard Mueller.

To the question whether he is concerned about the success of the CSCE follow-up conference, Ilichev replied as follows:

[Begin recording in Russian fading into Finnish translation] The Soviet delegation at the Madrid conference observes a firm and resolute line to achieve a positive result. Many countries have the same attitude, not only countries from the socialist camp, but also neutral countries. But there are also delegations in Madrid which least of all want to achieve positive results. We are realists, and for that reason we realize that there will be difficulties in the concluding stage of the Madrid conference. Particularly the United States and the other NATO countries will no doubt attempt to divert the conference from its present course toward confrontation. [end recording]

Deputy Foreign Minister Ilichev was also asked whether he thinks that the proposal by the neutral and nonaligned countries for a final document can be accepted. The minister replied:

[Begin recording in Russian fading into Finnish translation] We, in the Soviet delegation, and in other delegations, too, think that the proposal by the neutral and nonaligned countries for a document will be and must be the basis so that useful results can be achieved at the Madrid conference. This draft is a good paper, and a good basis for achieving good results. For that reason we praise the active role of the Finnish delegation which, together with the other neutral and nonaligned countries, has brought about this useful document. It must be the basis and we shall make every effort so that with the help of this document the conference can be brought to a happy conclusion. [end recording]

SOVIET BORDER TRAFFIC PROBLEMS EXAMINED

[Excerpts] The bottlenecks in road and rail traffic between Finland and the Soviet Union have been scrutinized by a group of high-ranking officials who have recently been looking into the problems of border traffic. In a memorandum they have put forward concrete proposals for improvements.

The officials consider that the main railroad station in Lappeenranta should be enlarged so as to give some relief to the border station at Vainikkala. According to the group this station has too limited a capacity, and in recent years this has hindered railroad traffic.

The memorandum also mentions the shortcomings of the road link at Nuijamaa. Traffic has been slowed by the inadequate customs and flow arrangements and by the double checks on the Russian side.

The officials also consider that the canal port in Mustola must be expanded without delay. They also propose that a consulate be set up in Lappeenranta to deal with visa requests and problems as swiftly and as smoothly as possible.

ICELAND

MEASURES TO SOLVE FISH INDUSTRY DISPUTE VIEWED

PM141459 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 8 Jan 82 p 10

[Bergthor Kuaernested dispatch]

[Text] Reykjavik -- All Icelandic fishing activities are at a standstill and 900 fishing boats and trawlers are remaining in port. Some 13,000 people employed in the fisheries industry are more or less without jobs and 9,000 of them have been dismissed. Two-thirds of these are women. (Iceland's total population is 230,000.)

The banks' foreign currency sections have been closed since Tuesday [5 January] and will not be opened again in the next few days. Fishing companies and the seamen who supply fish to the fish-processing industry are asking respectively for a 23 percent and an 18 percent increase in prices paid by the fish-processing industry.

The fishing industry as a whole is making neither a profit nor a loss, while the fish-freezing factories themselves are operating with a loss of between 8 and 12 percent. Fishing boat owners report that the fishing fleet is operating with a roughly 23 percent loss, and fishermen state that they are around 16 percent behind general wage levels in the country. Here we have the Icelandic inflation carousel in a nutshell. If fish prices paid by the fish-processing industry are increased, the price of fish exported cannot be raised because of competition with other fish-producing countries. The only remaining possibility then is the devaluation of the Icelandic krona to save exports and this in its turn leads to wage increases to keep pace with the cost of living, new pressure for increased fish prices and a renewed need for devaluation in order to help the fish-processing industry's exports. The price of fish is fixed quarterly on 1 January, 1 April, 1 July and 1 October.

Since Iceland has hitherto not had any unemployment to speak of, state unemployment funds have plenty of money, but at present large sums of money are having to be paid out to a relatively large section of the country's labor force.

The opposition and industrial and commercial life are accusing the government of sitting and twiddling its thumbs and allowing the situation to develop into a deep economic crisis, which it will only be possible to solve with great difficulty. The government is trying, however, to push the responsibility onto the Fish Price Committee, formed up to now from fishing boat owners, seamen and fish purchasers (the fish-processing industry), with a chairman appointed by the government. Disagreements within this committee now go very deep and have led to a complete standstill in fishing activities.

This situation will very soon hit the whole of Icelandic society.

The government is expected to introduce temporary legislation, which would comprise a package fixing the fish price, devaluing of the krona by 10-12 percent, fixing the seamen's wage increases and including various measures to limit the effects of the devaluation on the present 40 percent inflation rate. The government plans to bring inflation down in 1982, but the present situation seems gloomy from the government's viewpoint. There have been recent rumors, which no one is willing to confirm, that the government will resign in order to ask for the a new vote of confidence from the electorate before it can adopt tough economic measures. The government has an uncertain majority of two or three seats in the Althing.

DEFENSE MINISTER VIEWS NUCLEAR SECURITY POLICY

[Text] "In the coming months we will be aware of which team we are playing on. Strong defenses within NATO are the only realistic defense and security policy solution for Norway today -- and, as far as we can see, tomorrow too Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad told the Oslo Military Society yesterday. West Europe and Norway are dependent on the U.S. nuclear umbrella. "If we break free from U.S. support or pursue a policy which leads to a situation in which the United States no longer considers that it derives any benefit from guaranteeing our security, we would lay ourselves open to political pressure which in the final analysis could threaten our existence as a nation," the minister said.

Leaders within the Soviet regime consider that it is possible to win a world nuclear war, Sjaastad informed his audience, referring to official Soviet literature, including an article by Soviet General Staff Chief Marshal Ogarkov in 1980. NATO is ready to meet a conventional attack -- but a potential attacker must nevertheless evaluate the possibility of being countered with nuclear arms, he pointed out.

The defense minister said that the so-called AWACS aircraft -- which will give NATO greater insight into Eastern military activity in the next 2 years -- will also operate from Norwegian territory. This harmonizes with Norwegian security interests and is in line with our contribution to joint defenses.

Minister Sjaastad described the grounded Soviet submarine off Landskrona [as published] in Sweden last fall as "irresponsibility in connection with nuclear arms. Let us hope and believe that the Soviet Union will reassess and tighten up its procedures for handling nuclear arms after this episode." The defense minister also stressed that the Soviet Union cannot defend its military control over the East European nations by pointing to its historical experiences in its dealings with Hitler's Germany. "We in the West must clearly dissociate ourselves from this," Sjaastad said.

In our part of the world there is a tendency to count on the results of disarmament negotiations in advance, the defense minister said, pointing out "The negotiations so far have not given us any reason to attach less importance to our own defense endeavors. On the contrary, the Soviet Union is continuing to rearm unabashed. And it seems clear that any possible future agreements on the reduction of nuclear arms in Europe will strengthen the need for conventional defenses in West Europe, unless the Soviet Union reduces its own conventional forces. In addition, Western determination to maintain sufficient defense capacity seems to be a necessary condition for bringing the Soviet Union to the negotiating table.

"Today modern Soviet nuclear forces are threatening every target in West Europe and North America, at the same time as the Soviet Union has increased its conventional superiority," Defense Minister Sjaastad pointed out. For this reason there are some doubts about whether NATO has a real chance of halting an attack through the use of nuclear arms. These doubts can be faced if NATO were to strive for a better conventional balance vis-a-vis the Warsaw Pact.

"But, " Sjaastad pointed out, "we must also avert a major new conventional war in Europe. Technology has produced conventional arms with fearful effects. For this reason the work to prevent a war breaking out at all between East and West must be our highest priority."

A solution coming from the new disarmament negotiations following President Ronald Reagan's proposal for far-reaching arms reductions would be a historic event, Sjaastad said, because here we would not just have arms control but real disarmament.

"The West's goal for the new negotations is military balance and stability at the lowest possible level. It is to a large extent dependent on the Soviet Union how large the arms stockpiles will be," the minister said.

Defense Minister Sjaastad summed up:"Cooperation within NATO and the U.S. nuclear umbrella are crucial prerequisites for us in the West to retain peace, personal freedom and national independence. Within NATO West Europe should, however, avoid shifting the burden for the maintenance of sound defenses onto the United States, and we should not put ourselves in the front ranks when it comes to receiving praise for disarmament initiatives. On the whole we should be careful not to behave like neutral referees of the relations between the superpowers, for we are not," the minister said. "Norway is involved in the West's cooperation and is so as a consequence of its own wishes."

"Our membership in NATO gives us opportunities to exert influence which is much greater than the size of our population or our level of strength would allow," Sjaastad went on. "It is important that we are aware of and exploit this fact. Norway must also make its contribution to the alliance's security policy debate. But we must do so in such a way that we promote the West's security and the efforts for disarmament."

In the new negotiations on arms control and disarmament the goal must be stability at the lowest possible strength level. Both the East and the West should have similar interests in achieving greater security at a lower price. "At the same time," Sjaastad said, "we must work for a more balanced conventional strenth relationship in Europe and in this way raise the nuclear threshold. However, we will continue to live with nuclear arms," the minister said.

COMMANDER IN CHIEF CITED ON AIR DEFENSE OPTIONS

PM141131 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 12 Jan 82 p 64

[Olav Trygge Storvik report]

[Text] "Ground-to-air defenses for our airbases are still a high priority, and there have been no changes in the priority given to them in recent months," Armed Forces Chief Gen Sverre Hamre told AFTENPOSTEN.

The armed forces' leadership will continue to back a balanced combination of arms systems for airbase defenses, Hamre said. This will chiefly cover missiles and the modernization of the L-70 antiaircraft guns. But airbase defenses must also been seen in the context of other air defense systems, passive measures ground-to-air missiles the army is going to buy, such as the robot 70 missile, and not least the F-16 aircraft, both our own and those of our allies which would come to Norway in a crisis situation. [sentence as published]

The commander in chief admitted that strict priorities have to be set when the armed forces are evaluating purchases of arms systems, as they are doing at present. New missiles and guns will mean spending billions of kroner. The armed forces' leadership is at present giving top priority to missiles for antiaircraft defenses, and secondary priority to the modernization of the L-70 guns.

A joint U.S.-Norwegian study group recently decided that the combination of arms for airbase defenses is well-balanced and has recommended the implementation of this priority. As far as missiles are concerned, the armed forces are now studying three alernatives -- the U.S. Hawk missiles, the British Rapier and the French-German Roland. A decision about which missiles system will be purchased has still not been made, but there have already been indications from Huseby that the Hawk is strongly favored. The commander in chief said that he is hoping for a decision on this issue soon, but that there are still a number of unclear points, such as how quickly Hawk batteries could be placed at the disposal of the Norwegian Armed Forces.

The reason why the commander in chief decided to cancel trial launches of the German Wildcat was that "the system is not one that would serve our purposes in a suitable way," according to Hamre. Therefore there was no real reason to carry out test lauches in Norway, he said. An important reason why the armed forces' leadership made this decision was because the United States had decided to choose a caliber of 40 mm for their antiaircraft defenses and were adopting the DIVAD system for the whole of their army. The German Wildcat has a caliber of only 30 mm and would not be powerful enough to meet the demands which would be placed on it, General Hamre said. In addition, the Wildcat was develped to meet the needs of mobile army units for antiaircraft defenses, and we have no need of such a mobile system in the defense of our airbases, Hamre said. Norwegian units today include two 40. mm guns of the L-60 and L-70 type. If the L-70's are modernized to give them a better fire control system and better ammunition, we would have much more modern artillery resources, in the view of the commander in chief.

COMMITTEE TO PONDER SANCTIONS AGAINST USSR

PM151401 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 13 Jan 82 p 8

[Text] Norway's political authorities will take their time in charting what measures might be taken against the Soviet Union and Poland, a Foreign Ministry spokesman told NORSK TELEGRAMYRA on Tuesday [12 January]. The so-called Poland Contingency Committee, chaired by Foreign Ministry Under Secretary Eivinn Berg, has begun work on the government's contingency plans for possible future sanctions. The committee can hardly be expected to report before next week. Therafter the government will discuss the matter before it is put to the Storting foreign affairs committee for consideration it was said. Sources in responsible political circles understand the communique from the special meeting on Poland of the NATO foreign ministers to mean that the alliance's individual member nations are not bound to implement sanctions.

NEW LIGHTWEIGHT TANK TERMED 'BREAKTHROUGH'

[Text] Hagglunds of Örnskoldvik and Bofors have produced in a record time a test model of the army's lightweight combat vehicle for the 1990's -- a billion kroner deal for the army in 10 years' time. The 24-ton articulated tank was presented as an idea 27 April 1981, and less than 8 months later it has been test-driven in deep snow. The XX-RIG, as it is called, has high maneuverability in difficult terrain and deep snow. A full assessment of its maneuverability will be made in continuous tests in the next 6 months. The tank's weight is half that of a normal tank.

Various dummy armaments and guns are also being tested on the prototype, including a 12-mm German tank gun, which is now being modified by Bofors. The vehicle is in two sections, with crew and armaments in the forward section and the engine and ammunition in the rear section. Its so-called double articulation is a technical breakthrough in terrain maneuverability. The tank's extremely tight turning circle and its satisfactory ability to cross deep trenches and high obstacles are some of the advantages of articulation. In the 1990's the army will need 1,500-2,000 lightweight combat vehicles. If the government and the Riksdag decide on purchase around 1985, the deal will total around 15 billion kroner -- the largest materiel purchase the army will ever have made.

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS AIRSPACE VIOLATIONS BY TURKS

NICOSIA ON 13 JAN INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS SESSION

NC131919 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 13 Jan 82

[Text] A new meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held this afternoon. A UN communique issued after the meeting says all four topics on the agenda were again discussed in rotation, as agreed last August. The discussion was also continued on points of coincidence [simptoseos] concerning the constitutional aspect of the Cyprus issue. The next meeting will be held next Wednesday.

In a statement prior to the meeting, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Gobbi, said the intercommunal dialogue is at a very crucial stage and described as a "positive development" the fact that the two communities, for the first time after 54 meetings, had agreed on a common methodology or a common document--the evaluation. Mr Gobbi also said the points of coincidence mainly concern the constitutional aspect of the Cyprus issue. He added, however, that there are also points of coincidence in the territorial aspect. He also said that at the previous meeting only points of coincidence in the constitutional aspect were discussed and noted that the same procedure is being followed as in the past. Mr Gobbi said: We are dealing in rotation with all four topics on the agenda, but with a different methodology in the constitutional and the territorial aspects.

Asked when he would expect tangible results, Mr Gobbi said the determination of a schedule is very difficult both in politics and in diplomacy. Referring to the message from new UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar, Gobbi said this was a new and positive development, adding that the Cypriot people know that Mr Perez de Cuellar is very interested in a solution of the Cyprus problem.

Answering a question on whether the United Nations has evidence of a military buildup on both sides of the confrontation line, Mr Gobbi said the United Nations has no evidence that the military situation in the area has changed.

The representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the talks, Ioannidhis, said the discussion in rotation of all four topics on the agenda was to continue. He added that, with regard to the constitutional aspect, the discussion would continue in an attempt to achieve points of coincidence. Mr Ioannidhis said he could not disclose the points of coincidence on the constitutional aspect which were discussed at the previous meeting. Mr Ioannidhis said that in the talks every effort is being exerted so that this procedure may not last very long.

The Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, Onan, stated that the points of coincidence in the evaluation were discussed at the previous meeting. Today, he added, discussion on these points was to continue. Mr Onan described the discussion as a useful exercise and a useful study in that both sides set out their views and tried to bridge their differences. Mr Onan also said it would be preferable at the present stage to continue discussion on the points of coincidence in the constitutional aspect and later discuss the points of coincidence in the territorial aspect. Asked of these points are substantive, Mr Onan replied: I would say they are enough. Allow me, he concluded, not to say if they are substantive or not.

VENIAMIN DENIES NATIONAL GUARD ON STATE OF ALERT

[Text] "There is no reason for panic and there is no danger of military clashes," emphasized Minister of the Interior and Defense Khristodhoulos Veniamin in an exclusive statement to O AGON. Veniamin pointed out that the people must remain calm. He added that the authorities are vigilant and know in detail the movements and actions of the Turks. The minister denied that the National Guard is on a state of alert. "There is simply," he added, "a certain vigilance due to developments in the occupied areas."

Other reports indicate that Turkish military actions are due to both the problems which exist and to the situation in the occupied areas. In relation to this, it was observed that with the tension it creates and the danger-mongering it has recently undertaken, Ankara is attempting to restore unity among the Turkish Cypriots and to end the "government" crisis which has existed for several weeks. In support of the above estimations are the strong messages sent to the Turkish Cypriot political leaders by the Turkish president, General Evren, and by Prime Minister Ulusu. In their messages both Turkish leaders wonder why there should be so many Turkish Cypriot political parties and warn that they will also enforce a dictatorship in the north.

In the meantime, Turkish military aircraft violated the airspace of the Republic of Cyprus the other day, flying over the confrontation line and other areas. Foreign Minister Nikos Rolandhis instructed the Cyprus UN representative to denounce these violations.

UN: NO CHANGES IN MILITARY FORCES ON ISLAND

[Excerpt] New York, 13 Jan (Special dispatch) -- A military-political conference held at the headquarters of the UN peace force in Nicosia dealt with reports and allegations in connection with the recent military buildup by both sides in Cyprus. The findings of the conference were included in a document sent to the UN leaders in New York. According to authoritative information, the report says the following:

No change has been noted in the military structure of either side in Cyprus. There was a rotation of Turkish troops in Cyprus -- that is, a rotation of these troops, or part of them, with fresh units from Turkey. In accordance with the general NATO plans for the renewal of the tanks that belong to the forces of the alliance, new engines were sent and installed in the Turkish tanks in Cyprus. According to the same information, military personnel from Turkey currently in Cyprus number 20,000.

The above was confirmed yesterday by Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, during a meeting with newsmen prior to the intercommunal talks meeting yesterday.

EDEK'S LISSARIDHIS VISITING UK, FRANCE FOR TALKS

NC111935 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 11 Jan 82

[Text] EDEK party Chairman Lissaridhis left for London today, where he will meet tomorrow with Mr Foot, leader of the British Labor Party, and discuss the Cyprus issue, the Middle East issue and other international problems as well as questions of mutual interest. On Thursday, Mr Lissaridhis will meet in Paris with Lionel Jospin, secretary general of the ruling Socialist Party in France and discuss with him the Cyprus issue and other international and bilateral questions. An EDEK statement says these meetings will be held within the framework of the party's campaign on internationalization of the Cyprus issue and development of close relations with socialist and other progressive parties of Europe.

STATEMENT REBUFFS PRESS ON ROLANDHIS REMARKS

[Text] The following official statement has been issued with regard to certain press reports on a recent statement by Foreign Minister Rolandhis:

Because of reports in a section of the press, it is clarified that the purpose of Mr Rolandhis' statement was to restore the truth about the specific meeting he had last Saturday with Soviet Ambassador Astavin, which was not concerned with a possible aggressive action by the Turkish troops.

The official statement adds: At the same time, Mr Rolandhis was indicating, among other things, that the government did not have concrete information about such a possible action. In no way, however, can it be interpreted that Mr Rolandhis, or the government in general, has overlooked the tension Ankara has recently created. Besides, it is pointed out that both in this statement and in the 4 January 1982 announcement Mr Rolandhis was referring to the tension caused by the Ankara activities, to which, moreover, he drew the attention of Security Council's permanent members.

The official statement says further: Under the circumstances, of course, it was very natural for both the Cyprus and Greek Governments to express their concern, as was also the case with other friendly governments. The government is following the situation closely and considers its duty to be to keep the people correctly informed. However, this does not presuppose the creation of unjustified panic, which only a loss can cause.

It is further stressed that the government, being fully aware of the crucial stage through which our national issue is passing now, is constantly vigilant and is proceeding with the appropriate activities to confront any eventuality.

SPOKESMAN REAFFIRMS SUMMIT AGREEMENTS' RELEVANCE

[Text] In answer to a question, the government spokesman has said the summit agreements do exist and what is needed is the finding of a solution in accordance with these two summit agreements and the UN resolutions -- a fact which virtually means their implementation.

The spokesman added: The Greek Cypriot side has repeatedly stressed this position. He went on: No question of interpretation of the summit agreements has been raised either officially or unofficially. Therefore, any clamor around this matter is absolutely unjustified and only causes confusion.

KLIRIDHIS' PARTY LEAVES HOUSE IN VOTE ON POLAND

[Text] The House of Representatives last night passed by 20 votes to none against and two abstentions a resolution on Poland welcoming all steps leading to restoration of normality in that country.

However the eight members of the rightwing opposition Rally party were not in the house when the vote was taken.

Headed by their leader Mr Glavkos Kliridhis they had left the house in protest against the refusal of the speaker to allow Mr Kliridhis to speak.

The resolution was tabled by the ruling Democratic Party and was supported by AKEL, securing the eight Democratic Party votes and 12 of AKEL.

The two abstentions were those of the EDEK party which yesterday had only two members. Their leader, Dr Lissaridhis, was away on a visit abroad.

The house had before it three resolutions: One from the Rally party which expressed solidarity of the Cypriot people with the people of Poland "for the prevalence of democratic principles" called for release of detainees and the lifting of martial law.

The second was from the socialist EDEK party which expressed concern for the events in Poland, called for lifting of martial law and condemned American intervention as "hypocritical."

The first to be put to the vote was that of the Rally party which secured only the 12 votes of the Rally.

The Democratic Party, AKEL and the socialist EDEK voted against it, and it was thus defeated by 12 votes to 22.

At this point a row occurred when Mr Kliridhis sought to speak to answer to comments by previous speakers.

The house president Mr Ladhas said he would allow him to speak. After objections, Mr Ladhas said that he would put the matter to the house to decide.

At this point Mr Kliridhis declared that his party would abstain and he and the rest of the Rally deputies walked out.

The walk-out was condemned by the spokesmen of all the three other parties in the house: Mr Papaioannou for AKEL, Mr Omirou of the EDEK party, and the house president.

But when Mr Kliridhis returned to the house he explained that his walkout was only a sign of protest on a specific issue.

While the Rally abstained the house proceeded to put to the vote the EDEK resolution which secured only the two votes of EDEK while 20 members of the Democratic Party and AKEL voted against.

Finally the Democratic Party resolution was approved with the votes of the Democratic Party and of AKEL while the two EDEK members abstained.

Unlike the Rally and the EDEK resolutions which called for the lifting of the martial law, the Democratic Party resolution -- which secured AKEL's concurrence -- calls for "non-intervention in the internal affairs of Poland" and specifically stated it opposed the imposition of sanctions on the Soviet Union or Poland "because that would lead to direct confrontation and endanger the cause of detente and international peace and security."

During his address in the house, the AKEL leader Mr Papaioannou strongly supported the Polish authorities' action as defence against subversive elements abetted by imperialists and compared the "Polish reactionaries" to the Cyprus subversive "EOKA B" who were both, as he said, paid with plenty of dollars.

Although the Democratic Party's resolution, passed by the house, omits any reference to martial law, the party's spokesman Mr Galanos in his address said "we shall be immeasurably happy if the military law were lifted" and he expressed appreciation for Lech Walesa.

But he expressed wonder as to why the case of Poland found its way to the house (originally through a Rally party resolution) while human rights are violated by many dictatorships.

There were repeated warnings from the speaker that he would order the house to be evacuated when people from the galleries applauded one or the other speaker.

The AKEL leader Mr Papaioannou strongly protested and called the applauders "rally stooges", but a spokesman for the Rally queried the identity of the applaudees.

KKE-INTERIOR SUPPORTS POLISH WORKERS' STRUGGLE

NC131611 Athens I AVYI in Greek 13 Jan 82 pp 1, 6

[Text] The executive office of the KKE-Interior has issued the following statement:

The heroic struggle of the Polish workers is continuing under the yoke of the military dictatorship. It is the duty of all progressive, democratic forces, of all the forces of the communist revival, to explore their solidarity and make it more effective to end the tragedy of Poland as soon as possible.

For us the military coalition of NATO -- where U.S. imperialism is the ruling power, a power which supports military juntas friendly to it throughout the world, a power which has as its partner the dictatorship of Evren, which it repeatedly bolsters -- is not the agency that can make decisions on the Polish issue. For this reason we consider the reservations expressed by the PASOK government as justified. At the same time, however, its signing of the NATO communique was, by contrast, totally unjustified.

Today condemnation of the military dictatorship and support for the Polish workers must also be expanded in a concrete way in our country in multiple forms, and specifically:

-- Through participation of all progressive forces (political, trade union and others) in the solidarity movement. It is not permissible that PASOK should remain out of it.

-- Through expression of multilateral support to the victims of the dictatorship (economic, political, moral and so forth).

-- Through initiatives from the Greek support movement for international meetings at the European level of all progressive forces to support the struggle of the Polish people.

-- Through denunciation of the dogmatic forces which support and cover the coup, as well as in other fruitful methods.

The wider the struggle and support of the progressive forces in Europe toward supporting the Polish people, the easier it will be to repulse the aspirations of the international reactionary forces which are trying to utilize the Polish crisis and the obvious responsibilities of the Soviet Union to suppress the movement of socialist revival in Poland for the benefit of their own cold war plans.

The struggle against the dictatorship in Poland, for a return to normal conditions, for democratic and socialist revival of the country, is related to the struggle of the European workers, of the democratic and peace-loving forces, for a Europe without military blocs, self-supporting and separate from the superpowers, for a Europe of the workers.

EAST GERMAN DAILY INTERVIEWS KKE-EXTERIOR'S FLORAKIS

AU121845 East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 6 Jan 81 p 6

[Report on interview with Kharilaos Florakis, secretary general of the KKE-Exterior Central Committee; date and place not given]

[Text] How do the Greek communists assess the present situation in their country? What do they regard as the most important next few steps to realize the people's hopes for a democratic breakthrough? What new possibilities for developing their own ranks result from the KKE's significant success at the parliamentary elections on 18 October last year? These questions were central to an interview which Kharilaos Florakis granted to our correspondent, Michael Mueller.

For a starting point in his evaluation of Greece's political prospects, the secretary general chose the program declaration of the new Athens government under Prime Minister Papandreou.

The KKE, he said, "evaluates the declaration from the viewpoint of the change which the country needs, from the viewpoint of applying another policy, a policy of national independence, peace, and democratization, of eliminating the arbitrariness of the monopolies and of improving the people's living conditions."

Positive Starting Points in the Government Declaration

It is true that the KKE held more far-reaching, comprehensive views concerning the great topic of change than those which became evident in the declaration submitted by the leader of the Panhellenic Socialist Movement [PASOK], Panandreou, but it does contain a number of positive theses. In this context, over and above the announcement, Florakis underscored that "the government wants to work for detente and peace, that it will undertake initiatives for a Mediterranean without foreign fleets and nuclear weapons, and particularly its decision -- which is specific -- of wishing to remove nuclear weapons from Greece and to promote in practice the idea of the Balkans being free of nuclear weapons."

Broaching the domestic policy part of the government declaration, the KKE secretary general stated: "We also positively assess announcements such as the 'socialization' of a number of Greek enterprises, for example mining enterprises, enterprises of the cement and pharmaceutical industry: the introduction of an adjustment of wages and salaries to the existing price index) the abolition of discrimination against citizens because of their political convictions and the securing of trade union liberties."

Florakis stressed his party's view that the elimination of U.S. military bases in Greece, and particularly the withdrawal of the country from NATO, are in the national interest and that this requires a clear, unambiguous attitude. Greece's uncompromising separation from the EEC is a basic requirement for the independent development of the country. The fashioning of democratic conditions requires containing the arbitrariness of big capital, first and foremost of the foreign monopolist capital which is exploiting Greece.

"Naturally our party's attitude on the program declaration of the government is not dictated by some addition or subtraction to its negative or positive aspects, but is contingent on the extent to which its entire content actually agrees with the spirit of that change the country needs," he stated.

The KKE has not concealed the fact that the communists' expectations concerning the government program have not been fulfilled to the full extent. To add emphasis to their demands, the party members have abstained during the vote of confidence in parliament for that reason.

Asked about how the problems of NATO membership and U.S. bases are presented in Greece today, Florakis replied that this topic was at the center of the debate about a new course for the country. The KKE warns against ignoring the role of NATO, which is aggressive by nature, the antinational role it is playing at our cost, as well as of the extensive dangers resulting from our country's remaining in that alliance. Greece's withdrawal from the North Atlantic alliance must not be made contingent on whether NATO guarantees the country's eastern border -- the border with Turkey -- or not.

Security Requires Withdrawal From NATO

"Our people have bitter experience with NATO's interference in our domestic policy developments, with the role NATO played in setting up the military dictatorship and in the tragedy of Cyprus," Florakis explained. The KKE emphasizes that "withdrawal from NATO is the only solution that protects the security of our country and that agrees fully with our national interests.

"Our attitude toward the problem of U.S. military bases is also quite clear. These not only do not serve national interests at all, not only wreck the defense capability of our country, but also constitute a danger involving our country in adventurous U.S. military operations against friendly Arab countries.

"We also underscore that there can be no serious talk about control over these military bases. The only effective solution is their elimination."

The KKE points out the dangers resulting from the concept that the military bases could be abolished in keeping with a timetable which should be defined in pertinent negotiations. If such a timetable is not timed for a short period and in a binding manner and if it is not specific, it must be feared that "the U.S. military bases on our territory are to be actually perpetuated with all the dangerous consequences I have pointed out," the secretary general stated.

Active Contribution Toward Securing Peace

Then he discussed the immediate connection between this problem and the main question of our time -- securing peace. "We regard our party's contribution to further developing the movement for peace, against nulcear weapons in our country, as a task of extraordinary and urgent importance," Florakis stressed, and continued:

"The efforts for a new Greece outside NATO, without foreign military bases and nuclear weapons, which represents a factor of peace and cooperation in the Balkans, in the Mediterranean area and in Europe, cannot be advanced unless the people's movement gains more and more in strength and width on the basis of these goals.

"Despite the strong resistance the government has to face on the side of the imperialist circles and which it will have to face in the future, the elimination of nuclear weapons from our territory as announced by the government is now a task of utmost priority. Moreover, we regard it as important to speed up the idea of a nuclear-free Balkan peninsula as a project of general importance for the securing of peace.

"Great popular demonstrations are being prepared in Athens and Thessaloniki in support of the implementation of these goals, the nondeployment of the U.S. Pershing II missiles and cruise missile in Western Europe and substantial negotiations between the United States and the USSR on the missiles in the European arena on the basis of equal security. Our party supports these marches for peace without reservation. It is actively participating in them and helping to secure their success."

Policy of the Right Clearly Rebuffed

Discussing the change of the political situation in Greece after the parliamentary elections and the possibilities resulting from it for the KKE's struggle, he said: "In the 18 October elections a great victory was gained by the democratic forces, which support a completely different policy from that which the right pursued, a policy of detaching our country from the tutelage of the United States and NATO, a substantial democratization and an economic development for the benefit of the people. To put it more specifically: in the elections, the right lost the majority in parliament. PASOK got 48.1 percent of the votes and thus the majority in the parliament, and it formed the government.

"The KKE was able to increase its parliamentary strength by getting 11 percent of the votes. The victory of the democratic forces shows that great obstacles and difficulties can be overcome after hard efforts and the path to an anti-imperialist, antimonopolistic Greece can be taken, the prospect of which is socialism. The KKE concentrates all its efforts on such a development."

With Optimism for the New Tasks

Florakis stressed that today the KKE is a political factor which can play a bigger role in the further development of the country. Although the election campaign took place under complicated conditions, the party emerged strengthened from the elections. "The party was able to increase its potential of voters despite the strong pressure which originated from the widely held idea that it would be 'more useful' to vote for PASOK to guarantee its election victory over the 'New Democracy.' The party gains strength from the fact that today it is the third biggest party, from its firm alliance with the working people, from the broad response its policy is finding in the people and which is much broader than the percentage of votes won."

Under the new conditions, Florakis stressed, the party is paying particular attention "to developing the broadest possible workers' and people's movement against the right, against the economic oligarchy and the regime of dependence, to the solution of the pressing problems of the working people, the promotion of the deep anti-imperialist, antimonopolistic changes the country needs."

TURKMEN RETURNS FROM BRUSSELS NATO CONFERENCE

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who participated in the NATO Ministerial Council's special session on Poland which was held in Brussels, has returned to Ankara. In a statement at Esenboga Airport, Turkmen expressed the belief that the NATO Ministerial Council's communique on Poland was constructive and of a character conducive to developments. Noting that the NATO alliance attaches great importance to security and the development of cooperation in Europe, Turkmen recalled that the U.S.-Soviet talks on arms limitation have resumed within this framework.

He added that the existence of mutual trust and tranquillity between the parties and the observance of the Helsinki accords are necessary to develop these relations. Noting that the recent developments in Poland are not merely domestic issues, Turkmen said it is clear that these developments have occurred as a result of various factors. He said the United States has imposed certain sanctions on the Soviet Union following these developments and that the NATO communique proposed that the allies investigate taking measures in accordance with their own means.

Turkmen continued: We have approved the NATO communique. We have expressed our support at the council. On the other hand, we did not refrain from noting Turkey's special characteristics on certain issues. A major characteristic is Turkey's economic conditions. Turkey is a developing country. Therefore, the economic measures Turkey can take are very (?few). On the other hand, Turkey is a neighbor of the Soviet Union. The existence of a certain stability in relations between Turkey and the Soviet Union is important for the alliance.

Turkmen said he also held various contacts in Brussels concerning Turkey's relations with the EEC. In reply to a question, Turkmen recalled that while Greece included a dissent within the NATO communique, it did not refer to Turkey. In reply to another question on Greece's attitude toward NATO, Turkmen said: The Greek Government cannot adjust its philosophical and political stands to NATO membership. Turkmen added that this was sad from the viewpoint of NATO solidarity but that Greece's stand would not affect the alliance's strength as a whole.

ULUSU RECEIVES IRANIAN INDUSTRIES MINISTER

[Excerpt] Iranian Industries Minister Mostafa Hashemi, who is on an official visit in Ankara, is continuing his contacts. The visiting minister was received today by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu. In a statement, Ulusu said Turkey-Iran relations in all fields were progressing but that some circles are disturbed by this development. Ulusu recalled that these circles were spreading rumors to the effect that preparations are being made in Turkey for a plot against brotherly Iran. Ulusu said reports to the effect that plots were being hatched in Turkey against another country are completely unfounded. Noting that certain circles were exerting efforts in a bid to undermine the existing friendly relations between Turkey and Iran, Ulusu said Iranian citizens asking for asylum in Turkey were not being returned to Iran in accordance with international and Turkish laws and traditional practice, but that efforts were being made to send them to other countries.

The Iranian minister said that they did not pay any attention to rumors but were seeking the truth. He added that cultural and economic relations between Turkey and Iran were progressing steadily. Pointing out that Iran did not have aggressive intentions against any country, Hashemi said his country was defending itself against aggression.

Trade Protocol Signed

ATHENS, NICOSIA STEP UP EFFORTS AGAINST TURKEY

NC151033 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 12 Jan 82 pp 1, 11

[Ziya Akcapar report]

[Text] Nicosia (HURRIYET) -- While the NATO foreign ministers were gathered in Brussels to discuss "the Polish affair," the Greek Cypriot National Guard was put on "alert" as of the other night and reinforcements were rushed to all positions along the border. It has been ascertained that several Greek staff officers have arrived to reinforce the Greek Cypriot National Guard command. They have now assumed duties at the general headquarters and at various key locations.

Meanwhile, according to official information reaching the Kiprianou administration from Athens, Greek Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos will inform the other foreign ministers in Brussels that his country insists on its "rights as a guarantor state." At the NATO foreign ministers meeting Kharalambopoulos will also accuse Turkey of "creating artificial crises in Cyprus and in the Aegean and of making threats."

In parallel with Greek efforts to draw attention to Turkey and Cyprus -- at both the NATO and the EEC foreign ministers meeting in Brussels -- Greek Cypriot Foreign Minister Rolandhis has also been continuing his efforts "to squeeze Turkey into a corner." After making representations to five members of the Security Council, accusing Turkey of "increasing its forces on the island," he is now concentrating his efforts on making similar representations to the nonaligned countries. Acting in accordance with Papandreou's wishes to prove the invalidity of the intercommunal talks, Rolandhis is trying to take the Cyprus issue to the UN General Assembly in February.

KREISKY CRITICIZES REAGAN, CATHOLIC CHURCH

AU151506 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 15 Jan 82 pp 2-3

[Text of foreign policy part of Chancellor Bruno Kreisky speech at Austrian Socialist Party (SPOE) lower party officials rally at the Vienna Stadthalle on 14 January]

[Excerpts] Thus we have shown the Austrian workers a good road. And that is why we regard it to some extent as hypocrisy if today all kinds of Catholic politicians display such sympathies for the workers movement in Poland, an attitude differing strikingly from that taken by politicians of the same camp toward the workers movement in Austria where the same things happened in the 1930's.

The protest movement in communist Poland was caused by the exploitation of working people. There is no getting away from that. This must be held against the communists again and again. Naturally the Polish working people discovered that protests alone produce no results. Naturally they then discovered that they would have to build up an organization for themselves. But if such an organization is set up by people who do not have the experiences of a century that we have had, people who have not experienced victories and defeats, who are not aware of all the implications, who do not know what the real strength of organization consists of, then many speak up who think that all this is much easier than it is, who believe that the only way to achieve things is to march or to strike, who do not know that there are weapons that have to be handled very cautiously if the state is to be preserved.

And thus this new Polish workers movement has obviously been politically leaderless. That is not suprising. The Catholic Church is a great moral authority, no one will contest that, but it has never been known to be particularly qualified for leading a great workers movement.

And thus a protest movement was allowed to develop, it was given moral support, but these people were never told, I think, what they would have to do in addition -- namely, to organize the state in such a way that it functions for the working people. Someone has asked me from where I got the authority to speak in this manner. Well, dear comrades, we organized this state while we had in our country those of whom it is now feared that they might move into that country. [Poland] Why did not a representative of the Katowice miners say: We want to accompany Mr Karski to Austria when he goes there to negotiate on loans and grain and other things? We want to know what is going on, we want to participate in governing. How could one demand of a government which no longer was a government, from a party which no longer was a party, that it should put everything in order and merely always say that if this or that does not happen, we will strike? I am certainly not against such threats. Only, they must serve a purpose. They must bring some successes, because nothing is more dangerous for the workers than to use weapons which then prove ineffective.

Today we must demand of the Polish regime what was similarly demanded in 1934 of the Austrian clerical-fascist regime: Release the prisoners, release the representatives of the Polish trade unions. As long as they are imprisoned we cannot do anything but to raise this demand. And if we are organizing aid for Poland today, aid for the Poles as an act of international solidarity, then the cooperation with the Roman Catholic Church is certainly important in the initial stage because it alone has organizations which can help in this respect. But the time must come when, similar to what happened with ourselves in the past, we find the direct approach to those who are oppressed and arrested.

And one more thing: Marshal Jaruzelski has sent me a letter (as he did to other government chiefs).

He argued that if they had not acted as they did the result would have been chaos and for intervention and then everything that was planned in the nature of reforms in the past few months would have been jeopardized.

Here one can only say: You have publicly promised that there will be a whole number of freedoms, you have promised that there will be a renewal of Polish society, that the fate of Polish workers will improve because they will get a greater measure of freedom of action. What about it? It is important that we demand this of them at this time -- although I am not indulging in any illusions as to our chances of success in this respect.

But here is another thing: If one saw a few months ago the pictures of the handcuffed trade union representatives of the U.S. air controllers, one can't believe in the sympathy of the gentlemen in the United States for trade unions. One should certainly not let oneself be deceived by the boundless hypocrisy that is practiced again and again at times like these. I have reminded you earlier of how cold and unfeeling was the nuncio's reporting in 1934 about what was happening in Austria. And we know how much sympathy has been shown now. Certainly -- there is an internal development within the church, one should not deny that. And surely the Americans are living in a great democracy and surely we are immensely indebted to this democracy, but that must not mean that we accept all this without criticism.

We must give the signals that are necessary now, because we can claim for ourselves that never in our history have we persecuted people because of their views. We are the only ones who can claim that we have never departed an inch from the path of democracy and we need not take any special lessons from anyone.

The problems confronting us are not as simple as some believe. It may well be that there can be a different development -- to put it plainly, that it comes to a military intervention by the Soviet Union and its allies as we have experienced in Hungary, in the CSSR and, in a modified from, in Afghanistan. Much as we are opposed to what is happening now in Poland, much as we must demand of those in power there today that they fulfill the demands we have submitted to them, we must also make every effort to prevent matters coming to a military intervention from outside, because then the policy of detente will be dead. That looks different for us in Vienna, for those who live in Copenhagen or Helsinki, from what it does for those who live in Houston, Texas.

We are profoundly interested in a continuation of the policy of detente. In the event of such an intervention, the policy of detente will be dead. Then those for whom there is never enough armament, can put through their reckless armament policy, and they will not be stopped by any majority in any Western parliament, because they would ask: Do you want to suffer the same fate as the Poles?

That is why we are warning: Beware of exacerbating things to the point where the forces of peace and controlled armament are so weakened that an arms race is touched off, the end of which is unpredictible. Surely tremendous mistakes have been made, also in the West, and that is precisely why I regard it as my duty from this forum to thank a man who has taken over a tremendous task in this respect for us all: FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. Through him, many things have changed for the better. He was courageous and determined at a time when there was irresolution and hesitation in quite a few places. For this, he deserves our thanks.

Reactions to Criticism

AU151505 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 15 Jan 82 pp 1, 4

[Special DIE PRESS report]

[Summary] Vienna -- Chancellor Kreisky's criticism of the role of the Catholic Church in Poland has led to reactions by Vienna Archbishop Cardinal Koenig and by Austrian People's Party [OEVP] Chairman Mock.

According to a Catholic press agency release, Cardinal Koenig declared: "The criticism of the Polish Church and its bishops is incomprehensible, especially in this difficult situation when the whole world knows that the church in Poland stands at the side of the people and of the workers and possesses their unlimited confidence. Moreover, as is known, the freedom of action of the church is restricted, so that one cannot impose on it a responsibility which it does not hold at present."

At a press conference on Thursday OEVP Chairman Alois Mock called Kreisky's critical remarks about the Polish Church a "monstrous blunder." For a democrat, it would have been more appropriate to criticize the communist system which has eliminated all basic rights and freedoms rather than to defame the Catholic Church, Mock said and expressed the suspicion that Kreisky's attacks were motivated by the Solidarity trade union's being imbued with Christian ideas. "The OEVP chairman expressed concern over Austria's image in the world which, he said, was being 'distorted' through Kreisky's statements. Austria is still part of the free Western social system. Nothing can be altered about this even by the disparaging remarks of the government chief about the U.S. administration, Mock said."

WALDHEIM ARRIVES; WILL TALK WITH KREISKY, PAHR

[Summary] Former UN secretary general Kurt Waldheim arrived in Vienna on 14 January for talks with leading political figures about his future activities. He told journalists that he had received a number of offers for leading functions by international as well as by private organizations in the United States but that he would like to make himself useful for Austria, preferably in the field of international relations. Waldheim is scheduled to meet with Chancellor Kreisky today, with President Kirchschlaeger tomorrow, and with Foreign Minister Pahr on Monday. In about a week he plans to go back to the United States to fold his tent there, and in February he intends to return to Austria for good. Asked about the controversial project of a UN Conference Center in Vienna, Waldheim said if Austria wanted to remain an international center it was certainly justified to build the conference center.

TERRORIST ATTACK STORY CALLED 'CANARD' BY POLICE

[Summary] With its sensational opener about a planned terrorist attack on the Kaprun powerplant, the Vienna daily KURIER on Wednesday published a canard supplied by a swindler who first let his false report "leak" to the authorities and then offered it as "strictly secret" to various newspapers, until the KURIER fell for it. According to state security police sources, proceedings have been launched against the swindler who is believed to have supplied KURIER with false reports before. The authorities already know his identity but will not reveal his name as the investigation is still pending.

TRIAL OF SYNAGOGUE TERRORISTS TO START 18 JAN

[Text] With unprecedented security precautions the trial of the two synagogue terrorists Husham Rajih and Marwan Hasan will open in Vienna today. Rajih is also charged with having murdered Vienna City Councilman Heinz Nittel on 1 May 1981. During the terrorist attack on the Vienna synagogue two persons were killed and over 30 were injured.
The presumed case officer of the two, the Arab student Bahij Yunis, will be tried separately. The trial is scheduled to last for at least 6 days.

GENSCHER ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG ON FOREIGN POLICY

DW151245 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1546 GMT 14 Jan 82

[Speech by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher at Bundestag debate in Bonn -- live]

[Excerpts] Ladies and gentlemen, the process of inner renewal and reforms initiated in Poland by the Gdansk agreement of August 1980 was interrupted abruptly by the assumption of power by the military council, and the expectations of the Polish people regarding the promises made by the Polish leadership have not materialized to date -- the return to the process of reforms and renewal. The whole world has been waiting in vain for signals from the Warsaw military council that the course of reforms will be resumed. We can't ignore the fact that developments have not changed for the better. On the contrary, many things indicate that a long-term development is to be initiated which moves away from the course of reforms and renewal.

In its assessment of Polish developments the Federal Government attached from the start importance to the assessment of the Catholic Church. You mentioned this Dr Kohl. The Federal Government shares the deep concern over current developments which was movingly formulated by Archibhsop Glemp in his sermon on 6 January and which also was expressed by the pope in his address last Sunday. At the same time, although not on the same day the Federal Government expressed the same concern as Archbishop Glemp. But I have always been aware that it is much easier for us here to give our opinion on Polish events than for those who have responsibility there and are among the few who -- as the primate is -- can speak frankly.

Isolated alleviations of martial law do not lessen our concern. The preparedness of the military leadership for a genuine dialogue is also called into question as a result of talks with unidentified and obviously unauthorized representatives of the Solidarity trade union -- unauthorized representatives. Ladies and gentlemen, our people followed events in Poland with special sympathy and hope until 13 December 1981, and since then they have followed developments with great bewilderment and emotion. There is no doubt about where we stand with regard to Poland. The federal chancellor has expressed this repeatedly. We side with the Polish citizens for whom a free trade union is an expression of their desire for reforms and renewal. We Germans are deeply aware of the tragic Polish fate. Poles and Germans are connected by an eventful history, and after the tragic past, Poles and Germans have come to a mutual understanding which is characterized by our efforts to come to terms and achieve reconciliation. I would like to add for those who can hear us in Poland and elsewhere that in the Bundestag there were passionate debates on the treaties with the East, but despite these passionate debates, we should not forget to say that the question of reconciliation with Poland has never been a problem for the overwhelming majority of the German people as well as for the Bundestag members on all sides. [applause]

The desire to help the Polish people as well as firmness and circumspection have marked the Federal Government's policy following 13 December. Our demands are clear. They are the lifting of martial law, release of the internees, and resumption of a real dialogue by the Polish leadership with the Catholic Church and the Solidarity trade union. These demands are not interference in Poland's internal affairs. They are based on the Helsinki Final Act. Every signatory state has the right regarding every other signatory state to point to the necessity of observing the obligations contained in this act.

In its policy the Federal Government has not confined itself to statements. Through direct talks and contacts it has tried to exert influence. We have not interrupted our dialogue with the Polish leadership. We have sought the possibility of taking the military council, which promised to return to the course of reforms, at its word. This was the purpose of my talks with Deputy Premier Rakowski and also the reason for the letter the federal chancellor sent to General Jaruzelski.

The resolution by the EC foreign ministers of 4 January 1982, the joint statement of the federal chancellor and the U.S. President of 5 January, and the result of NATO's foreign ministers meeting of 11 January prove the West's cohesion and its ability to pursue common interests. The demands for the lifting martial law, release of the internees and the resumption of the dialogue are included in the common EC and NATO statements on our initiative and have been endorsed by the federal chancellor and the U.S. President. Ladies and gentlemen, at NATO's foreign ministers meeting, the West's common policy was developed into a clear political strategy. This common strategy we have to discuss here is supposed to do what is possible for us to open up the way to renewal and reforms. This statement could be very important because an endorsement of the alliance's statement by all Bundestag parties will show that we agree in these goals. This also applies to the resolutions and proposals of the alliance in the economic field. It must be quite clear here that the point is not only the continuation of humanitarian aid — as you, colleague Lenz, rightly said -- but also the intensification of humanitarian aid.

Ladies and gentlemen, everybody must be aware that the continuation of the state of affairs in Poland may involve the danger of growing repercussions on the overall structure of our relations with the Soviet Union and all the other East European states. It is for this very reason that we are watching the lasting serious pressure by the Soviet Union on Polish internal developments with special concern. The Federal Government together with its allies will continue its policy aimed at a positive influence on the situation in Poland.

When the Madrid CSCE negotiations are resumed Poland will be a priority topic on the agenda. All states are bound by the Helsinki Final Act. This should not be underrated by Moscow and Warsaw. The continuation of repression of the Polish people constitutes a serious setback in confidence building between the East and West. Therefore, the Soviet Union bears great responsibility for what is happening in Poland. Colleague Ehmke very rightly pointed to the inability of renewal because it goes far beyond the interests of one nation affected by it and because this inability of complying with aspirations for renewal increasingly becomes a destabilizing factor in international relations.

The Federal Government's awareness of the Soviet responsibility was also expressed in the federal chancellor's letter to General Secretary Brezhnev. People outside and in the Federal Republic often say that the federal chancellor did not want to see this responsibility of the Soviet Union. For all my respect for what others say, I wish the federal chancellor had not been the only one to contact not only Mr Jaruzelski but also Mr Brezhnev in December 1981 because of Poland. [applause] He did not do it because Mr Brezhnev has nothing to do with it but because he pointed to his responsibility in his letter. There is no doubt that events in Poland reveal the failure of the communist system.

But diplomatic inactivity, mere protests and the interruption of talks would have no effect at all. It would be immobility. [applause] Only those who very consistently and aggressively come out for cooperation and detente and for the dialogue will have possibilities and instruments to help the Polish people, as difficult and problematic as it may be.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is also our concern about East-West relations, detente and cooperation -- and this must be taken very seriously in Warsaw and Moscow -- which makes us voice the appeal to see the dangers resulting from the interruption of the process of reforms and renewal and to let this process take its course again. It is in this sense that our three demands and expectations for the Polish people must be understood. They are raised for this afflicted nation as well as for stability, cooperation and detente in Europe. Everything we do now and will do in the future must be judged solely by whether it serves this goal or not.

Ladies and gentlemen, carrying through our goals requires a high degree of agreement in our own country, in the European Community and in the Western alliance.

We call upon the responsible people in Warsaw and Moscow to return to the basis of the Helsinki Final Act and to make sure that the process of cooperation between the East and West is not affected. The Geneva talks on medium-range missiles have been resumed as planned. Considering the great importance of arms control and disarmament on our highly armed continent we are resolved together with our alliance partners to continue our policy aimed at concrete and effective arms control agreements. In this respect the basis of confidence could be improved through a return to the course of reforms in Poland.

But, ladies and gentlemen, something else has become clear in the past weeks. Europe can fulfill its peace task only if it is closely bound with the North American democracies. The balance necessary for peace in Europe and the world can be safeguarded only in alliance with the United States and Canada.

CDU'S KOHL RESPONDS TO SCHMIDT, GENSCHER

DW151037 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1405 GMT 14 Jan 82

[Statement by CDU/CSU opposition leader Helmut Kohl at Bundestag debate in Bonn -- live]

[Excerpts] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen: Before turning to the actual subject of the debate on the government statement may I be allowed to express cordial gratitude and recognition also on behalf of the CDU/CSU faction, to many of our citizens in the Federal Republic who during the past few weeks have generously helped our Polish neighbors in many actions of solidarity. [prolonged applause] And this is why I am asking the house to endorse our motion which is to ensure that for the next 6 months relief parcels be sent to Poland free of postage, as this is made possible now in Sweden and in Austria. [applause] We all know that additional fund-raising actions are forthcoming and I hope that we are agreed in this at least that there exists now a unique chance for us, the Germans in the free part of our fatherland, to demonstrate solidarity, European solidarity, German-Polish solidarity.

Ladies and gentlemen, let me now revert to the government statement. Mr Federal Chancellor, the weakness and opportunism of your policy over the last few weeks and months have led to the fact that in delivering your report here to the German people you are only able to do so by means of pure aggressiveness and insults in your speech. [prolonged applause] "Your speech reflects hubris and weakness together. [shouts, applause] Hubris if you state point blank that he who attacks and insults the Federal Government insults the Federal Republic.

And now to the subject [shouts], to the subject, ladies and gentlemen, which is depressing enough, because the policy you are currently pursuing in the long run will lead us nowhere. Under the headline "Poland Also a Western Tragedy," NEUE ZUERCHER ZEITUNG several weeks after General Jaruzelski's military coup in Poland raised the question about the situation of the Western countries. Ladies and gentlemen, the answer to this question today is unequivocal: What has happened within the alliance during the past 4 weeks is indeed a tragedy, and this is also the responsibility of the Social Democrats and you, Mr Federal Chancellor. [shouts] In the more than 30-year history of the Federal Republic of Germany, there has never been such an unequivocal and strong criticism of the policy and person of a German federal chancellor and of a government as we have experienced over the past few weeks in Europe and in the United States. And if you say, Mr Federal Chancellor, criticism in some of the media, then you will have a hard time trying to find any positive voice at all. I simply want to state here that because of your opportunist policy our country has lost much of the capital of trust that we had gained with difficulty over 30 years. [applause] This is a bad development, because there is no country in Europe which is so dependent as we are on the trust in the solidarity of its friends. Nobody, and certainly not us, will gloat over this development because the consequences will be shared by all of us together in Germany.

Ladies and gentlemen, our problem is not Federal Chancellor Schmidt, but how things will progress with the FRG? This is why we must ask ourselves: What has caused the alarming loss in trust in allied and friendly countries regarding the credibility, steadfastness and predictability of German foreign policy? Mr Federal Chancellor, there would not have been such a decline in trust if you yourself had not made statements after the military putsch in Poland -- statements which raised questions in the capitals of our allies and elsewhere about the actual goal of German foreign policy.

In statement after statement over the past 30 years, including the current government statement, you have had to modify and change your position. In the meantime you have been condemning Soviet responsibility, but Mr Chancellor, do you seriously believe that the devastating political and moral effects your public statement had on free Germany -- namely that the Soviet Union is not responsible for developments in Poland -- have thus been eliminated? You have damaged the reputation of the country with these statements. [prolonged applause]

A clear picture can be seen: You accepted tensions with our protective power the United States and rifts in the alliance in order to keep relations with the Soviet Union as free of tension as possible. You must deal with the question of what you and your party, the SPD, consider the FRG to be. Is it still a clearly integral part of the Atlantic alliance [unintelligible interjection] -- I believe you my colleague, but you are not so typical of German Social Democracy [prolonged applause] -- or already a state with the role of mediator between East and West because of its special location? Mr Federal Chancellor we maintain that, this special role of mediator would certainly mean the end of our freedom.

I can just ask you, Mr Chancellor, not to simply ignore foreign criticism which comes from experts and has a great effect on the people of these democratic states, but to disprove it with action. If you don't owe it to yourself, Mr Federal Chancellor, you owe it to the German people. [applause]

Mr Chancellor and also Mr Genscher, you have frequently quoted in past weeks the approach of the Polish church and the Polish pope. I ask you, why didn't you at least participate in the silent demonstrations suggested by the church? Mr Genscher, I ask you: Why does the FDP secretary general pass a general judgement on everyone who urged the maintenance of solidarity, insulting them as cold warriors? The liberal principles of German politics have come to a fine point. [applause]

The brutal action of the police and armed forces against trade union members and intellectuals expressing criticism in Poland forbids any interpretation of the military regime as an emergency brake or as the lesser evil in view of possible Soviet invasion. Ladies and gentlemen, the restraint you suggest with regard to the Polish military dictatorship cannot be justified by anything. Those who believe that the Jaruzelski regime should be tolerated because this would help prevent worse developments are wrong with regard to the dynamics of a dictatorship. This is not something I have said, Mr Chancellor, it is a quotation from -- listen carefully now -- the group of democratic socialists who usually do not think along our lines. The fact that intellectuals of German Social Democracy speak like that demonstrates the bankruptcy of your policy in the SPD. [prolonged applause]

The alleged threat of anarchy and Poland's disappearance from the map if the Polish Army had not imposed martial law are not the results of the democratic movement. Those who say that are spreading Moscow's theories. The mismanagement is solely the consequence of a communist dictatorship, of outdated planned economy methods and the continuous threat of the Soviet Union's interference. Ladies and gentlemen, it is a fatal illusion if they believe that such a fundamental structural crisis in the communist system can be eliminated by using the same methods which have led the Polish state to this crisis which threatens its existence. With the help of tanks, the Polish military and its interference from outside the Soviet Union may achieve so-called normalization in Poland.

But by doing this, the Soviet leaders would make the historical mistake of believing that they could thus eliminate the political, economic and spiritual-ideological crisis which involves not merely Poland but also the Soviet Union and its alliance partners in the GDR and the CSSR where it is particularly evident. The security interests of the Soviet Union cannot be guaranteed in the long run with tanks and bayonets. The Soviet leadership must eventually understand that peace and security in Europe can be safeguarded permanently through reforms, democratic reforms, in the Warsaw Pact countries. [applause]

Peace in Europe will remain endangered as long as the Soviet Union considers its excessive military armament the only means with which it can suppress the reform movement in the communist states, and as long as its preparedness continues to include the use of its excessive armament to allegedly maintain its security also with regard to the free world. We all must repeatedly make it clear to the Soviet Union that we believe the other way to be the right one. There are possibilities in this respect.

First, we remain prepared for cooperation and detente also with regard to the countries in Central and East Europe -- with the communist states. Our preparedness continues to exist with regard to controlled and balanced arms control and disarmament. We remain interested in progress of the Geneva negotiations.

Second, we must mobilize the public opinion of the free world against all violations of peoples' rights for self-determination and human rights by the Soviet Union and its brother communist parties. All civil rights advocates tell us over and over again that this is insignificant with regard to the Soviet Union. Grigorenko writes in his memoirs: The Soviet leadership reacts most sensitively to international public opinion, even simple publications have their effect. If we keep quiet, we do not use the chance of mobilizing the public opinion of the world. [applause]

Third, if the Soviet Union continues with its aggressive policy violating human rights or trying to stop the reform process now in Poland, it must know that it will have to pay a high international political, economic and moral price.

But, ladies and gentlemen, what are the realities in the Western alliance after the military coup in Warsaw? The free world has no answer, let alone a common answer, to the structural crisis in the communist states. The alliance is drifting toward a development which has a vacillating effect nationally as well as internationally. Most of all -- and this is the starting point of today's debate -- the alliance is lacking a common analysis of the Soviet Union's policy. Such an analysis would be the prerequisite of common action. We, the West, had to expect for a year and a half an aggravation of the Polish crisis and a possible Soviet intervention. Nobody can rule out such an intervention even today. And yet the Western world looks helpless in its quarrels.

The confidence crisis of such important alliance partners as the United States and France with regard to the Federal Republic is an existential danger for German interests. Ladies and gentlemen, we are not just about to become internationally isolated, we are losing confidence capital which can be most dangerous in a national crisis, such as in a Berlin crisis.

Mr Chancellor, what would we think if in an external threat regarding our country's existence, the world would just coolly speak of noninterference, of an internal problem of the Germans and of careful reservation? We would rightly be outraged, we would feel abandoned. Double standards would probably be the right term for such an attitude. [applause]

Developments after the Polish events show that there is increasing dissent between the United States and Europe and particularly between Washington and Bonn.

The increasing estrangement with regard to our most important alliance partner is demonstrated by the recent dispute about possible joint sanctions with regard to Poland and the Soviet Union.

Ladies and gentlemen, if Moscow can strangle the Polish reform movement, the free world cannot say: business as usual. If that were the philosophy of our democracy, this republic would already have come to an end. [applause] Detente is not divisible for us so that economic relations, credits running into billions and technical-scientific cooperation could be separated from political developments and pursued independently. The Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact states must know this. If it will be impossible in the next months to reexamine the instruments of coordination and cooperation in the alliance, if it will be impossible to develop a new concept of cooperation in the alliance, if it will be impossible to achieve a common assessment of Soviet political, military and economic policies, and if it will be impossible to demonstrate this common concept of action, it can be predicted that the Atlantic alliance will be in an existential crisis. Estrangement between the United States and Europe and particularly the Federal Republic will increase to an extent, ladies and gentlemen, which will fatally endanger the security interests of our country.

Mr Federal Chancellor and Mr Foreign Minister, this is not just our opinion. It is not only the opinion of the U.S. President and his administration. We know very well that this is the opinion of the two big U.S. parties in Congress and in the Senate and thus the opinion of broad parts of the U.S. populace.

It remains to be said, Mr Chancellor, that even if you wanted to, you would not achieve real agreement with President Reagan and his administration. As I have learned in the meantime, the concepts of your policy on which your thinking is based and that of our U.S. friends are obviously fundamentally different. They are too different to permit any harmony. Your foreign policy and that of the U.S. President cannot be brought into accord for very basic reasons.

Ladies and gentlemen, our political solidarity with the needs of our Eastern neighbors and particularly with Poland is a visible standard to measure the spiritual-moral situation of our people and the credibility of the politically active. Why do so many people keep quiet in view of the brutal suppression of the Polish people's longing for more rights and freedoms? [applause] Where is the spiritual and political unrest against the state of oppression, the state of no freedom and no peace? Ladies and gentlemen, we are not lacking knowledge with regard to developments in Poland. Reality in Poland has become so obvious that it cannot be interpreted any more. What we need is courage and consideration. Courage in order to resist cowardly opportunism, and consideration to gain strength for action out of European solidarity for our Polish neighbors. [long applause]

SCHMIDT WARNS AGAINST MISINTERPRETING STAND

[Text] Wuerzburg, 16 Jan (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, on Saturday at an extraordinary party conference of the SPD Franconia region being held in Veitshoechheim (Wuerzburg region), warned against falsely interpreting a moderation of language in speaking of the Polish military regime. Of course the government stands with all its heart at the side of the Polish workers, even if in view of the guilt-laden history of Germans and Poles it thinks that a little discretion as regards vociferousness is advisable. This moderation of the tone coupled with a clear rejection of the state of affairs cannot "be understood as a compromise of our fundamental rights and principles."

In addition to pressure on Poland and the Soviet Union, which bears a share of the responsibility for developments in Poland, economic incentives must be offered if Poland is to return to the path of reform.

Thus, over and above sending parcels and food, help must be given with the reconstruction of the Polish economy. The wave of helplessness which has spread so far from the FRG toward Poland apparently has been overlooked by the world outside.

On relations between the FRG and the United States the chancellor said at the extraordinary party conference that Europe and the United States were not twins but partners with differing interests. In the FRG, where too little history and too much sociology has been learned, one should not forget what is owed to the United States for its generosity after the war.

Schmidt appealed to the delegates to be aware of the fact that the majority of FRG citizens, "even those who vote CSU and will vote that way again," stand behind the peace policy of the government. The trust of this majority should not be shaken by boundless debate. It is not internal party wrangling but the debate with the political opposition which should be aggressive and audible.

On the question of state employment programs Schmidt said that these cannot be financed by means of new borrowing, but only soundly in cash. It was necessary to raise the number of those jobs which do not have to be subsidized, but which gave a return. Schmidt expressed optimism about the forthcoming round of wage negotiations. The German trade unions are the most sound in the world. Many envy the FRG for the perceptiveness of their trade unions.

[Excerpt] In spite of criticism from the West, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt wants to continue the circumspect policy toward Poland and the Soviet Union. At a regional party conference of the SPD of Franconia in Vietshoechheim, he said that the policy of dialogue, moderation and cooperation with the East European countries will not be abandoned. Only in this way can gradual change in the East be promoted. The Germans do not have the task of making the situation even worse by agitation.

BRANDT WARNS AGAINST ACTING 'RECKLESSLY'

[Excerpts] Kassel, 16 Jan (DPA) -- In the view of the SPD chairman, Willy Brandt, the regional elections in Hesse in September of this year will not only be important for the future regional government, but also for the Bundesrat "and probably to a high degree the future of the Federal Government."

Brandt described events in Poland and the frightening rise in unemployment as a "serious challenge" to the SPD. He appealed to his party to decisively support the course of detente of the Federal Government, especially its efforts towards a normalization in Poland.

Brandt expressly warned of reacting to events in Poland "recklessly or with blind anger." The SPD holds the view, as it has always done, that aid to Poland must not be stopped, because the population needs economic aid and food more than ever. Protests and resolutions will not make the hunger of the Poles go away, the SPD chairman said. The process of detente should not be harmed more than it already has been by the imposition of martial law.

BARZEL DEMANDS WALESA BE ALLOWED TO SPEAK

[Text] Berlin, 16 Jan (DPA) -- The chairman of the Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee, Rainer Barzel (CDU), has challenged the Polish authorities to give workers' leader Lech Walesa the opportunity to speak publicly on the events in his home country.

The union politician said in an interview with the radio station RIAS, that as long as Walesa is being kept hidden, the stance toward Poland can only harden further each day. "We want to see Lech Walesa, active, at least on television," Barzel said. In answer to a question on the role of the head of the Polish military council, Wojciech Jaruzelski, Barzel said the general is a military dictator who is doing what the communist leadership in Moscow is demanding of him. He is locking up people and trying to destroy the course of reform. The interview was made available to DPA by RIAS in an edited version.

STRAUSS SAYS WEST KNEW OF MARTIAL LAW PLANS

[Text] Bonn, 16 Jan (PDA) -- According to the CSU chairman, Franz Josef Strauss, the West was not totally unprepared for the imposition of martial law in Poland on 13 December 1981. Strauss said on Saturday in an interview with the BILD newspaper: "Our secret services knew that the notices to the Polish people on the imposition of martial law were already being printed in Moscow in September 1981." Apart from this he had reliable information, Strauss said, that the GDR State Security Service had made several hundred specialists available to support the Polish secret police already at the beginning of December.

BAUM CITES 'SPECIAL ROLE' OF FRG IN ALLIANCE

[Text] Bonn, 16 Jan (DPA) -- In the view of Federal Interior Minister Gerhart Baum (FDP) the FRG has a "special role" in the East-West relationship because of its position in the center of Europe and as a divided country. This means, he said on Deutschlandfunk on Sunday, "that we have to do everything to maintain the capacity for dialogue between East and West, to reduce tension or indeed prevent it arising in the interests of the people" not only in the GDR, but now also in Poland. Yet the FRG can only play this role if it holds fast to its "involvement in the Western alliance."

FDGB PROCLAIMS 30 JAN AS 'DAY OF SOLIDARITY'

LD151816 Hamburg DPA in German 1715 GMT 15 Jan 82

[Text] Duesseldorf, 15 Jan (DPA) -- "In view of the military dictatorship which continues to rule with undiminished severity" the FDGB proclaims 30 January the "day of solidarity with imprisoned Polish trade unionists." The FDGB news service stated today that this day would be marked jointly with the organizations belonging to the International League of Free Trade Unions. Lists of imprisoned and interned Polish trade unionists will be presented by the FDGB at protest rallies at regional and district levels. The FDGB recalls that it was one of the first trade union organizations in Europe to unequivocably comment on the state of war in Poland. It also lodged a protest action to the ILO office in Geneva on the violation of human rights. Its campaign already yielded over DM1 million which was used exclusively to provide high-grade medical supplies and foodstuffs for the Polish population. The FDGB ensures that these supplies are not used for purposes other than originally intended.

BOELLING BRIEFS SCHMIDT ON RELATIONS WITH GDR

[Text] Bonn, 15 Jan (DPA) -- The head of the Federal Republic's permanent mission in East Berlin, Klaus Boelling, today briefed Chancellor Schmidt on the state of German-German relations in the wake of the meeting at Werbellinsee. A government spokesman said that the chancellor took this opportunity to reaffirm how important it is to give indications that will give hope to Germans in the Federal Republic and the GDR and to work for a future with reasonable neighborly relations. Boelling also briefed the chancellor in detail on his talk with the chairman of the GDR Council of State, Erich Honecker in East Berlin on Monday.

SOLIDARITY ACTIVISTS IN FRG CALL FOR FOOD BOYCOTT

[Excerpt] Frankfurt, 16 Jan (DPA) -- Representatives of the Solidarity trade union called on federal citizens and the West to boycott Polish foodstuffs. The members of Solidarity said on Saturday in Wolfsburg that it was a scandal that Polish preserved meat, poultry and other vital goods were being sold to the West in the face of the great need in Poland.

SCHMIDT WRONGLY ASSESSED U.S., FRENCH REACTION

[Dieter Schroeder commentary: "Schmidt Moves Closer to Haig's Poland Course"]

[Text] It took the Atlantic alliance four weeks to react jointly to events in Poland. But even now the Western nations do not agree on united actions, but, for the time being, only on a joint assessment and denunciation of Soviet responsibility as well as on clear warnings to Moscow. Considering the profound differences of opinion, which had cropped up after the Polish generals' seizure of power, this constitutes some progress even though two reservations must be made: The resolution, which was approved only reluctantly by some of the European NATO members, clearly bears Washington's handwriting, and developments in Poland during these four weeks hardly allowed any expectation that the rulers in Warsaw might return to a course of reforms which deserves this name.

It would have been rather futile for the foreign ministers to continue harboring any illusions or guessing as to what is patriotic in General Jaruzelski. Their call to the Polish leadership "to set the course of reforms in motion again...and to immediately resume the dialogue with the church and Solidarity" sounds like a mere ritual in which nobody believes any longer. The Solidarity trade union, which could represent the aspirations of the Polish workers freely, does not exist any longer. A dialogue with a sham organization of that name, moreover, would be meaningless. The regime does not even have a "dialogue" with the church, rather it seeks to break its influence. For a talk with Jaruzelski Archbishop Glemp already had to give up his demand for the participation of elected trade union leader Walesa. Even with this concession Archbishop Glemp was not able to achieve any moderation in the general's policy. The church is being maneuvered into a position in which it has to fight for its own survival and to forsake the members of Solidarity. Moscow's hand becomes visible in this, too.

This is why the NATO foreign ministers did not have any other choice but to put their resolution into the shape of an indictment against Moscow, though they disagree on their possibilities of laying stress on their statement that the Soviet Union does not have the right "to determine Poland's political and social development." Nevertheless, this is a new tone. NATO, too, does not have the right to a claim for a development which would be in line with its own ideas. But its members are entitled to remind Moscow and Warsaw of the commitments undertaken in the Helsinki Final Act. They even are obliged to do so, as Secretary of State Haig said. And there is yet another reason: The continuous violation of the UN Charter and the Helsinki Final Act endangers the trust in cooperation between East and West and, in NATO's view, "seriously harms international relations."

The Federal Government has signed formulations in Brussels, harsh formulations which it had tried to avoid hitherto. It was afraid of a deterioration of international relations and of the effects on our trade interests in the East, on the very fragile German-German relations as well as on the arms control talks in Geneva, on whose successful course the fate of the present Federal Government might be depending.

But any refusal to sign the U.S. draft resolution, which was supported by Paris, London and Rome, would have harmed Bonn's interests even more. Schmidt cannot afford any confrontation with Reagan and Mitterrand. The United States, however, facilitated Schmidt's moving toward their resolution: it renounced, for the time being, discontinuing the Geneva negotiations; Bonn is not compelled to participate in the sanctions as yet. Nevertheless, they have committed Bonn with the resolution, which not only makes "future economic and trade relations but also the arms control process dependent on Soviet behavior vis-a-vis Poland." In his deal with Washington the federal chancellor finds himself now at the shorter end. If he or the Europeans were to object to the next demands raised by Washington then they must face the possibility that a frustrated Reagan will live up to his threat to break off the Geneva negotiations. But it is such a development that Helmut Schmidt must seek to prevent at almost any cost since a discontinuation of the arms control talks in all probability would spell the end of his government.

Until now, the federal chancellor did not dare any solos against Washington without French support. This time he missed gaining support in Paris, presumably because he wrongly assessed the U.S. and French reaction to Bonn's behavior, though Mitterrand's policy in the field of counterarmament ought to have served him a warning. He now will try to save what can be saved. This is not an easy task. France's suspicion about a special part played by Bonn in the relationship with Moscow is deeply rooted. It fears that Bonn might fall into the trap of Moscow's policy which strives for a neutralization of the Federal Republic. Schmidt will have to pay his price in Paris, too, so as to remove this suspicion and to win Mitterrand as a partner.

RED CROSS RELIEF -- An aircraft carrying a consignment from the German Red Cross for the victims of the Polish food catastrophe has left Cologne/Bonn airport for Warsaw. As the German Red Cross stated, about 80,000 persons have been made homeless since the Vistula flooded extensive areas near the town of Plock. The aircraft carried mainly medicine for preventive vaccinations and also 50 large tents. [Text] [Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1800 GMT 17 Jan 82 LD]

FOOD SHIPMENTS TO POLAND -- Stuttgart, 12 Jan (DPA) -- The charity organization of the Evangelical Church in Germany has sent two food shipments to the people in the Plock region in Poland, which has been affected by flooding. The two shipments are part of the emergency program started by the World Council of Churches in Geneva in which the German and Norwegian aid organizations are also participating, the church organization announced in Stuttgart on Tuesday. In January and February, an additional 13 shipments of food and goods in short supply worth DM1 million are to be sent to old people's, handicapped peoples' and children's homes and distributed to the needy by the Polish Ecumenical Council. CONSTITUTIONAL BODY REJECTS NATIONALIZATION BILL

[Text] Paris, 16 Jan (AFP) -- A bill put forward by France's Socialist government aimed at nationalizing big industrial groups, private banks and finance companies was today rejected by the Constitutional Council, a body that decides whether bills or treaties are in line with the constitution. The council decided that three articles in the bill, relating to compensation for shareholders of the companies in question, did not conform to the constitution.

There is no appeal against the decision by the nine-man council, and it is now up to the government to amend the bill. The council members, who have non-renewable nine-year terms of office, were all appointed before the Socialists' election victory last spring. Three are appointed by the president, three by the speaker of the Senate and three by the speaker of the National Assembly.

In a swift reaction, the government noted the council's decision that the nationalisations as such were constitutional and pledged to go ahead with the nationalisation programme. The cabinet will discuss the necessary measures to be taken at a meeting on Wednesday, the government said in a statement.

Government Reacts

[Text] Nationalization plans will have to be submitted to parliament. The Costitutional Council issued its verdict this evening that the government's draft bill is not immediately applicable. In the view of the nine members of the council, the procedures adopted to compensate the shareholders of the companies concerned are unconstitutional. The government will therefore have to amend its bill. It must be pointed out that decisions taken by the Constitutional Council are not subject to appeal.

In any case, one thing is certain: The principle of nationalization has been deciared to be in accordance with the constitution. On the other hand, not all companies may be nationalized; this would apply particularly to certain banks, that is to say those whose bulk of capital belongs to companies of a mutual or cooperative type. These must not be confused with mutual-type banks such as, for instance, the Credit Mutuel, which are entirely different entities.

Consequently the decision of the Constitutional Council does not allow the president to enact the law on nationalization in the form in which it was drafted. The government, for its part, considers that the nationalization program, which was ratified by the entire country, has not been put into jeopardy by the Constitutional Council. The government states that it has taken note of the council's decision, regretting, however, that this decision will keep the companies concerned in a state of suspense.

It must also be pointed out that the members of the Constitutional Council requested, within the context of their decision, that the amount of compensation paid to shareholders be increased.

I have just been informed that an interministerial meeting is to be held on Monday 18 January at the Hotel Matignon to study the Constitutional Council's decision.

SOCIALISTS LOSE IN PARLIAMENTARY BYELECTIONS

NC172310 Paris AFP in English 2307 GMT 17 Jan 82

[Text] Paris, 17 Jan (AFP) -- The ruling French Socialist Party was embarrassed today in parliamentary by-elections, losing four out of four contests. The opposition Gaullist and Giscardist parties took these seats away from the Socialists and conserved one.

The elections were in constituencies where the results of the general election last June, a landslide victory for the Socialists, were invalidated because of alleged election campaign irregularities. Roger Chinaud, a top official of former president Valery Giscard d'Estaing's Union for French Democracy (UDF) party, said the outcome of today's votes showed "the French are showing their uneasiness after eight months of government by Socialists and Communists." But observers noted that the Socialist defeats today were due in part to a high rate of abstention by Communist voters in their constituencies. The abstentions might have been a deliberate move by their Communist coalition partners to remind the Socialists they could not have won their landslide victory last spring without Communist backing in the runoff elections, the observers said.

Former justice minister Alain Peyrefitte, 56, who lost his parliamentary seat last June by 186 votes to Socialist Marc Fromion, trounced the Socialist this time by a margin of 6,381 votes (a total of 52,384 votes were cast.) Mr Peyrefitte had sponsored stricter laws in an attempt to fight rising crime, whereas the new Socialist justice minister, Robert Badinter, advocates more lenient legislation, on the ground that criminals are mainly from underprivileged families. The big shift in votes to Mr Peyrefitte might indicate many voters were endorsing Mr Peyrefitte's policy of punishing criminals, as opposed to the Socialist tendency to excuse criminals as products of an unjust society.

The Melun seat held by Mr Fromion was contested today because Mr Fromion had been found to have made an election speech after the official deadline. Another reason for the opposition's strong showing today was that the Gaullists and Giscardists backed each other's candidates in various constituencies instead of fighting each other as they did until just before the June general election.

But the Socialists still hold firm control of the National Assembly with 284 seats not counting the 44 seats of their Communist coalition partners. The Gaullists hold 90 seats after gaining two today, and the Giscardists 63 after gaining one. Ten seats are held by MP's unaffiliated with the main parties.

Aside from the victory of Mr Peyrefitte, a Gaullist, the results were:

-- In the Paris Louvre district, Giscardist Jacques Dominati gained revenge over Pierre Dabezies, a left-wing Guallist backed by the Socialists. Mr Dominati received 55 percent of the vote to 36.5 percent for Mr Dabezies, who beat him by a narrow margin last June. Six minor candidates split the rest of the vote.

-- In the Paris 12th ward, Gaullist Pierre de Benouville was re-elected with 57.18 percent of the vote after edging out the same Socialist candidate by only 48 votes last June.

-- At Chalons-sur-Marne east of Paris, Gaullist Bruno Bourg-Broc defeated the Socialist Annette Chepy-Leger with 51.6 percent of the vote to 42.8 percent. She had won in June with 50.19 percent. Mrs Chepy-Leger attributed her defeat to failure of workers to come out and vote.

The number two leader of the Socialist Party, Jean Poperen, noted that the constituencies lost by the Socialists today were ones they barely won last June "on the crest of a wave" (of enthusiasm just after the Socialist Francois Mitterrand was elected president of France).

Mr Poperen said today's setback was a lesson showing the Socialists they must carry out their program "despite this regrettable and annoying development." Former Gaullist premier Jacques Chirac, the mayor of Paris, commented that the by-election results showed the French people "did not need more than eight months to understand that the Socialist-Communist government was leading them down a bad path."

JOSPIN, MARCHAIS HOLD TALKS ON DOMESTIC POLITICS

PM151233 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 9 Jan 82 P 3

[Text] The two delegations met at Politburo headquarters on the Place du Colonel Fabien. After they had submitted to the demands of photographers and television cameramen, the meeting began in an atmosphere that was both serene and serious.

Georges Marchais welcomed Lionel Jospin and his comrades. The two delegations exchanged wishes. Then Lionel Jospin took the floor to read the speech he had prepared.

The Role of Vigilant Censor...

Lionel Jospin began with a report on the government's performance to date, which he evaluated as "positive." He thought that "the Communist ministers have respected government solidarity." But, he added, "we read the newspaper L'HUMANITE. We listen to your statements. They reveal a certain tendency on the part of the Communist Party leadership to attribute to itself the role of vigilant censor, distributing good and bad marks and not always avoiding the temptation to award the good marks to itself and reserve the bad ones for others. Is this tendency quite appropriate to what is at stake? We are not sure."

Lionel Jospin then went on to speak about the preparations for the 24th Communist Party Congress and in particular of L'HUMANITE as a forum for discussion, where it had been "affirmed that the leadership of your party apparently 'invited its members not to facilitate the election of Francois Mitterrand in the second round,' which was in absolute contradiction to its public call to abstain."

While saying that he was taking care not to intervene in this internal debate, he noted that "in the draft resolution presented for the 24th congress of your party, you do seem to have kept intact the critical analysis you made of the Socialist Party, its strategy and the proposals made by it between 1977 and the spring of 1981." He thought that the "questioning of the strategy of a union of the left around a program drawn up in the seventies demolishes the theoretical foundation of our union, which can then become a pure question of opportunity."

The PS first secretary then went on to foreign policy, dealing with questions relating to Poland, on which, he said, "there are differences between our two parties." He said that "there is no chance of our agreeing on the analysis of the Polish situation or on the causes of the dramatic events of December." For the Socialists, he continued, "nothing justified the massive intervention by the army, the militia and the police." He then proposed that the two parties take steps together on Poland and that the union leaders who had received Walesa in Paris do the same. Finally, Lionel Jospin concluded with a reference to the need to reflect on "the evolution of the countries of the East, which you call countries of 'real socialism.'"

George Marchais then replied to Lionel Jospin. "Contrary to what we often did in the past, when we were not associated with the government, I have not prepared a written speech. I prefer to share our views with you in a more spontaneous fashion." The PCF general secretary dwelt at length on the internal situation. He confirmed the communists' positive evaluation of the measures taken by the government and the outlook for the future.

Produce French

First of all, purchasing power. Although observing that the tendency was beginning to be reversed, Georges Marchais noted that there had been a rise in the guaranteed minimum wage, family allowances, the minimum old-age pension and housing allowances. At the same time, he reaffirmed that the communists regretted certain measures which to some extent counterract this positive change, in particular the 1-percent rise in social security contributions. He also noted the disparities in the evolution of purchasing power: i.e., that there had been a marked improvement in the purchasing power of large families while that of workers' families with one or two children remained low.

"All this," Georges Marchais emphasized, "is intended to stress the need for a durable boost in consumption and vigorous action against inflation." The Communist leader confirmed his party's support for measures taken to deal with rising prices while insisting on the need to develop worker participation by making use of all the legal rights that enterprise committees enjoy today, in order to tackle prices at the source. At the same time, he wanted to see measures taken to prevent increases in private profits and against their being squandered.

Georges Marchais then turned his attention to unemployment problems. An initial result had also been achieved in that field, namely, unemployment was not rising as fast as it had been, although it was still rising. Another positive factor was the revival in growth. So how to proceed? The Communist Party, Georges Marchais said, is "committed up to the hilt" as regards the application of the contracts whose principles have been decided by the government, on condition, of course, that these contracts lead to the creation of jobs. "We have supported this trend from the beginning. Our members and elected representatives are acting to give it effect. But a large proportion of employees continue to raise serious difficulties." Georges Marchais reminded those present that the solution of the employment problem required other measures also, namely adequate taxes on capital and very high incomes and the reduction of the working week to the extent that this really would create more jobs.

The PCF general secretary then developed the idea that it was possible to stop the current unjustified destruction of jobs by employers. "We are urging our members to oppose enterprise closures and unjustified redundancies. We are urging them to approve financial assistance to enterprises on the express condition that this will help create jobs. This principle is, in our eyes, the following: All public aid should lead to the creation of jobs."

Going on to industrial production, Georges Marchais remarked that the recession had been stopped, thanks above all to lower domestic consumption, although the 1979 level had still not been reattained. He welcomed the fact that the government was developing the idea that it was necessary to capture the domestic market once again and to produce French. "We are deeply gratified by this trend. Yes, we must create, invest, produce French in France." In order to obtain 3.3 percent growth in 1982, a new industrial policy, an improvement in the purchasing power of working class families, and the implementation of all the reforms envisaged are necessary. In this connection, Georges Marchais stressed the need to reduce France's balance of trade deficit, particularly with the United States, West Germany and Japan.

With regard to reforms, Georges Marchais emphasized the communists willingness to contribute to all those that had been decided: nationalizations, decentralization, the extension of workers' rights, and fiscal measures (such as the wealth tax).

Using All the Forces of Our Party

"To sum up," Georges Marchais said, "the government is, we think, going in the right direction. Even if we do not approve of all the measures taken, we consider the government's approach to the country's problems to be new and positive on the whole."

"And, even though fundamental problems remain, we feel there have been indisputable partial improvements. I wish to stress this: Not only do we approve of this new approach, but we support it, and we willingly participate in the action that inspires it." Noting the considerable pressure being brought to bear by employers in an attempt to halt the process under way, Georges Marchais explained that the Communist Party "intends to contribute in every way it can to overcoming the obstacles." He specified: "We are working toward this concretely in the field. On 4 December, even though our congress was approaching, we devoted a special session of our Central Committee to this matter. It is our duty to mobilize our party to participate in this positive and constructive action. It is our duty to do everything in our power to help with the mobilization of the people that is so indispensable."

Georges Marchais added: "We, the left, will be judged above all on the issues of employment, the purchasing power of wage earners and the problem of workers' rights in enterprises. That is why we attach so much importance to everything that contributes to the solution of these problems. On this subject, the general secretary of the party added: "From 1920, the year when we, in our opinion, made the right choice, we had virtually no say in the government of France, except for a period of just under 3 years. Moreover, unjust electoral laws deprived our party of the representation it could claim at many levels of responsibility. It is therefore essential that we adapt our activities from those of an opposition party to those of a party that is participating in government. I will not conceal the fact that this is posing problems for us and requiring a great deal of effort on our part. We are fighting employers and the right, which is opposing the implementation of the new policies that the French people want, and we are acting in a constructive manner in support of these policies on every possible front by mobilizing all the forces of our party without exception."

Profound Changes Within French Society

Georges Marchais then went on to deal with Lionel Jospin's question regarding the preparations for our 24th congress. He confirmed that we are "keeping intact" our evaluation of the 1977-1981 period. He made clear the meaning of the evaluation we are formulating as regards the joint program and, further back in time, of the Popular Front and the liberation. "There is no question whatever," he said, "of questioning the Popular Front or the liberation. Even if we could not go all the way at the time, our evaluation is eminently positive. But, from the 1950's onward, profound changes began to take place in French society; at the same time, serious problems relating to social construction emerged. It was during this new period -- the sixties -- that our party adopted an old strategy once again, a type of old union that had been valid earlier but was no longer suited to the circumstances. So what we are doing in the course of our preparations for our congress is undertaking self-criticism covering a whole period of our history. This self-criticism in no way questions the union of the left, but only certain forms of this union. And I must emphasize that neither does it question the fact that the present government is a government of the union of the left."

Georges Marchais then dealt in a few words with Lionel Jospin's question on one particular contribution to the forum of discussion represented by L'HUMANITE, suggesting that our party leadership had apparently secretly given orders to allow Francois Mitterrand to be beaten. On this matter, Georges Marchais explained how the democratic forum of discussion in preparation for our congress takes place. Of course, he said, L'HUMANITE cannot publish all the letters received, for practical reasons. But as the letter in question had been the only one until then to raise that particular question, it was natural, indispensable from the viewpoint of the exchange of opinions, that it was published. "But," the Communist leader stressed, "it is just the opinion of one comrade, and that is all." He will find his reply in L'HUMANITE today. Georges Marchais was astonished, in these circumstances, that this fact could be exaggerated and be given disproportionate, groundless publicity. He reminded those present that the Communist Party had mobilized itself to get Francois Mitterrand elected just as it had mobilized, regardless of the difficulties, to get Socialist candidates who eventually won, elected in the legislative elections. The results and the findings of experts left no doubts as to this reality.

Concern for Poland's Interests

Having clarified this matter, Georges Marchais reminded those present of the PCF position on Poland. He stressed in particular that the stand taken within the framework of the independence that characterizes communist parties today corresponds with the interests of the Polish working class, which must avoid a bloodbath and internationalization above all. This is in the interests of peace. And it corresponds with the interest of the French left, of our country's workers, who hope very dearly that the union of the left will not be split by petty political operations and that the new policies will continue.

As regards the interests of the Polish working class, Georges Marchais explained that the problems of extending democracy and developing freedoms are important, and that we have been stressing them since September 1980. At the same time, he highlighted the fact that there there are other problems in Poland: complex and serious problems affecting the economy and social progress. A solution had to be found to these problmes as a whole, and not to just one of them.

In passing, Georges Marchais also noted that it seemed inconceivable for an objective mind to assimilate the proclamation of a state of emergency in Poland with a military coup d'etat. It had nothing to do with a fascist military putsch like the one which had overthrown the leftwing government in Chile and killed President Allende.

"One question remains, a very important one for us: Have we remained loyal to the stand we took with you on 23 June last year on the Polish question? That is the crucial question. Our reply is: Yes, we have remained loyal to our agreement.... In fact our position preserves and even favors the decisive element, that is, the possibility for Poland to find on its own a democratic solution to its problems as a whole."

"In short," Georges Marchais concluded, "the differences and even the divergences between us on this Polish question have not caused the union of the left and the new policies to be questioned, in spite of the right's formidable efforts in this direction. That is really the main thing for us."

It is for that reason that the PCF does not accept the proposals of joint statements on the Polish question put forward by Lionel Jospin. On this subject, Georges Marchais drew attention to the fact that the trade unions must decide alone and independently what action to take, and it is to them that the Socialist Party should address itself if it so desires.

Lionel Jospin then took the floor again and the two delegations began to exchange views on several of the questions that had arisen. Both parties clarified their respective positions. At the end of this exchange of views, Georges Marchais took the floor again to make two observations.

Support for the New Policies

"First observation. I am astonished by your interpretation of my speech. But this does help me to understand the recent campaign to give credit to the idea that our meeting would be a difficult one and would show the division in our union. We shall not fall into that trap. We shall adopt as our own the president's slogan stressing that what counts is the union of the majority. We shall not leave the union. In our opinion, all that has been accomplished since the June agreements has been done well. We congratulate ourselves on the fact that in the government, in parliament and in the country, the unity, the union of the Communists and Socialists has prevailed in order to keep the promises made on 10 May and to implement the policies ratified by the French people. It is in this direction, exclusively, that we intend to continue. All our efforts are directed toward that single objective. That is why we think it vital to ensure that the attempt to split us fomented by the right fails. The media that are still in the hands of the right pinned a great deal of hope on today's meeting. Well, they will be disappointed.

"And here is my second observation. On the subject of Poland I limited myself to reminding you of our position, which, in our opinion, has been a responsible position. We intend to stand by this responsible position, particularly at a time when elements of relaxation seem to be emerging in Poland. We are concerned for the interests of the working class, the Polish people and the Polish nation as well as for relations between France and Poland: This is what leads us to do nothing that might either delay or impede a return to a normal situation, that is, the ending of the state of emergency, the release of those imprisoned and the solution of Poland's economic, social and democratic problems. That was what I meant in my speech. I am proud that, as Premier Pierre Mauroy reminded us last night, this test has in no way, beyond the divergences mentioned, affected cooperation between Communists and Socialists, or the indissoluble solidarity that has arisen within the government or, in our opinion, collaboration between the two parties. That is why we fully intend to continue in this vein. After all, it is natural that there should be differences and divergences between us sometimes.

"That is our state of mind. All the rest is mere lucubration. If I had a wish, it would be that you should exercise the same vigilance as ourselves with regard to the frantic campaign waged by radio and television against the left and its policies. I still regret that we have not discussed that. In effect, like the French people who wanted change, I think that this change has not yet affected television and radio.... Of course, if you think that what is happening in the media is alright, that is your business, but that is not our view.

"I repeat, then, that foremost among our concerns, our most important line of action, is mobilizing the people to support the new policies: the question of unemployment, the question of rising prices, the question of social reforms envisaged within the framework of the law, and the question of peace which is inseparable from that of France's security."

After a short speech by Jean Poperen on behalf of the Socialist delegation, a last exchange of remarks took place during which Georges Marchais was moved to say the following: "You say that the Polish question raises the problem of socialism. The question of socialism as we see it in France is a question that concerns us.... Allow communists to discuss it among themselves beforehand in order to prepare for their congress.... The PCF, at its 22d and 23d congresses, made its concept of the evolution of socialism and the socialist society it wants to build in France quite clear. It also stated clearly the nature of its relations with all the other forces: communist parties, in power or not, progressive parties, socialist and social democratic parties. We are discussing these problems at the moment in order to make them clear again at the 24th congress. There is therefore no veil or mystery surrounding our policies. Our perspective is clear and plain, as is our concept of the union of all the forces of the left, of the union of socialists and communists, as is our concept of governmental participation and of our relations with yourselves."

After a short suspension of the session, the joint communique proposed by the Socialist delegation was jointly finalized and adopted.

PCF Aides Comment on Talks

PM141509 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 9 Jan 82 p 5

[Text] Several PCF leadership members were asked to comment on television yesterday evening on the PCF-PS meeting.

Pierre Juquin was interviewed on French television's channel one. He described the meeting as very useful and its results as satisfactory. The two parties, he said, were able to assess the economic, social and political questions which form the new policy which has been started. He expressed the view that "the government's action is going in the right direction even if there is still some work to do." Therefore, the Communist leader pointed out, Georges Marchais emphasized unemployment, price increases and the workers' rights. "We reaffirmed," Pierre Juquin continued, "our intention to use all the PCF's forces to implement the new policy."

The journalist turned to Poland. "It is an important affair," Pierre Juquin stressed before adding: "It is impossible for two great parties like ours not to have differences of opinion and disagreements. The aim of this meeting was not to arrive at an agreement or disagreement. We exchanged our views on the situation, but differences of opinion do not stop us governing together."

Positive Judgment on Action Taken Over Past 6 Months

Paul Laurent was the guest on the French television's channel two news program. He stressed the areas of agreement between the two parties. "The meeting was scheduled before the events in Poland to assess our joint government action over the past 6 months and all that we have done to promote the new policy over the past 6 months. I am pleased," he said, "that we made a positive joint assessment of that period and that we are both committed to pursuing our action of mobilizing the people."

"On our delegation's behalf," he added, "Georges Marchais took the opportunity to lay particular emphasis on progress on major social problems like unemployment, the length of the working week and the struggle against inflation. We had an interesting and detailed exchanged of views on how to continue that action."

"We had a frank discussion on Poland," Paul Laurent continued. "We have a different viewpoint from the PS. We think that ours is a responsible position. We think it is a position which paves the way for a new beginning for Poland after this grave crisis. I would also like to stress that this morning's meeting shows that it is possible to govern the country together while respecting the different parties' personalities."

With regard to the PS proposal to send a trade union mission to Poland, Paul Laurent stated that, in the PCF's view, "that country was in a situation bordering on civil war. There was only one way of tackling that without bloodshed. It may now be possible to envisage a solution which aims for a gradual relaxation. We are not interfering in the current process because we do not want to cause difficulties. Furthermore we do not want to interfere with trade union initiatives in any way," he concluded.

We Want To Continue the Work Started

On France-Inter Roland Leroy described the PCF-PS meeting which he had attended a few hours earlier as an "event." "A number of things have happened over the past 2 weeks," L'HUMANITE's editor recalled.

For instance, [premier] Pierre Mauroy and [the PCF's] Charles Fiterman stood side by side at Montereau yesterday to reassert their will to continue together." Another fact is that "the right had based all its hopes on the fact that the events in Poland were going to destroy the government agreement in France." "The trial [period] is now over," Roland Leroy noted, and "that confirms what we said: There are differences of opinion between the PCF and PS but they do not prevent us from acting together when we know exactly why we are acting together."

"When you guage the difficulties which have had to be and have to be overcome, it is a success to meet and to reaffirm the will to continue the work started." That is why "today's meeting is an event taking place 6 months after the formation of a Socialist-led union government which includes four Communist ministers." For the important thing for the French people "is a new employment policy and a new industrial policy, and we want to continue the work started." Questioned on the PS' three proposals on Poland, the Communist leader did not regard them as "wise."

PCF'S FITERMAN REPLIES TO POPEREN ATTACK

[Text] Receiving the press yesterday at his ministry to convey new year greetings, Minister of State Charles Fiterman issued a statement regarding the remarks made by PS National Secretary Jean Poperen. "I don't need to speak on the PCF's behalf," the minister specified. "I am speaking on my own personal behalf." He continued:

"I must say that I read the interview with Jean Poperen with a certain amazement and that I am indignant and hurt. In brief, he suspects the Communists -- of whom I am one -- of nothing more nor less than working to make France dependent on a foreign country, in this case the Soviet Union. To say that, and to say it today -- really I cannot understand it and I cannot fail to react.

"One of two things. Either these remarks are geared to an internal political game, in which case I think they go beyond the limits of what is decent and reasonable. Or Jean Poperen believes what he is saying, in which case how can he agree to cooperate with people whom he suspects of having such dark designs? How could he fail to have seen that he would be furnishing the right with arguments in its current maneuvers?

"It is true that the events in Poland have given rise to different assessments by the Socialists and Communists. But can we not view them calmly without launching into such a hurtful accusation? I am surprised at this statement, after the appeal for unity launched by the president and the Friday meeting which ended with a reaffirmation of the desire to work together. Is it perhaps a case of an involuntary slip of the tongue? I would like to hope so."

MITTERRAND, U.S. ENVOY COMMENT ON ATTACHE'S DEATH

LD181334 Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 18 Jan 82

[Text] President Francois Mitterrand has said that he has instructed the government to do all in its power to throw light on the circumstances which cost the life of Lt Col Charles Ray, assistant military attache at the U.S. Embassy in Paris, who was killed by a gunman when leaving his residence in the 16th arrondissement this morning. The U.S. ambassador, Evan Galbraith, who was to be received at the Elysee Palace for lunch with the president today, declared himself revolted by the deed. What these cowards have done to Charles Ray's family is unthinkable, said the ambassador. Police inquiries are still continuing and so far there has been no claim made for responsibility for the killing.

CHEYSSON-TINDEMANS TALKS FOCUS ON EEC ISSUES

[Text] The talk between External Relations Minister Mr Cheysson and his Belgian counterpart Mr Tindemans Tuesday 12 January was mostly concerned with EEC questions, which will be discussed again in Brussels during a special meeting of the community Council of Ministers 14 and 15 January. The Belgian minister, in his capacity as president of the council for the current 6 months, is at present touring the capitals of the European Ten. Two problems are in the air: the agricultural budget problem (including the British contribution), which the French Government wants to resolve as rapidly as possible, and the revival of the political alliance based on a German-Italian suggestion. Mr Cheysson agreed on a working group undertaking an in-depth study of the problem. On the bilateral plane the two ministers spoke of the nuclear power station at Chooz, on the French-Belgian border. Mr Cheysson noted on this score that France was prepared to envisage cooperation with Brussels, which the Belgian Government wants, in both constructing and operating the station.

COOPERATION MINISTER COMMENTS ON CHADIAN POLICY

AB151636 Paris AFP in French 1427 GMT 15 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Paris, 15 Jan (AFP) -- France can only have limited objectives in Chad, the minister of cooperation and development, Jean-Pierre Cot, said before the National Assembly Foreign Affairs Committee on Thursday. According to a communique published Friday by the committee, the basic features of French policy, Mr Cot recalled, are total support for the OAU's decisions, no military intervention, the approval of any efforts for a political solution and the pursuit of civil cooperation with the Ndjamena government.

France is also trying to make its main EEC partners and the United States aware of the difficulties of the Chadian people, the minister stressed. Mr Cot indicated that the situation in Chad was marked by three factors: the withdrawal of the Libyan troops, the deployment of the inter-African force and the difficulties of the Transitional National Union Government (GUNT) in establishing its authority throughout the territory, the communique adds.

MORE NUCLEAR GUARANTEES FROM IRAQ TO BE SOUGHT

[Text] Replying to a written question submitted to him by a senator, External Relations Minister Cheysson explained that nuclear cooperation between France and Iraq should take into account technical development, especially in the fuel sphere. As the first official statement since the external nuclear policy council redefined France's policy on nuclear exports and international cooperation, this answer has confirmed France's desire to increase guarantees with respect to the Osirak nuclear research reactor and, in particular, to supply a less enriched fuel -- "caramel" -- whose use is partially to reduce the risk of proliferation.

Another guarantee probably sought by Paris -- a French presence on the site -- should be officially confirmed for a longer period (maybe 20 instead of 10 years). The Iraqi research reactor, which is monitored by both France and the Vienna International Atomic Energy Agency, is to be the subject of political discussions. However, there have been no new contacts at government level since the visit by Deputy Prime Minister Tariq 'Aziz to Paris in August. In the industrial sphere, however, matters have progressed further -- an atomic energy technical company [Technicatome] team has identified together with the Iraqis, sites where a new research reactor could be installed underground and it seems that its technical concepts which have been considerably altered, have been determined.

MITTERRAND MEETS PRC ENVOY -- Paris, 8 Jan (AFP) -- President Francois Mitterrand met Chinese Ambassador to France Yao Guang here today for a review of international issues focusing on the Polish situation and bilateral relations. During the 30-minute meeting, the ambassador handed Mr Mitterrand a message from Chinese strongman Deng Xiaoping, whom the French president met last February before taking office. The contents of the message were not divulged. [Paris AFP in English 2051 GMT 8 Jan 82 NC]

MITTERRAND TO VISIT ISRAEL -- Francois Mitterrand is to visit Israel at the beginning of March. The mission charged with preparations for the visit will leave Paris quite soon. I remind you that the president's visit was originally planned for 10-12 February. [Text] [Paris Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 15 Jan 82 LD]

RED BRIGADES ISSUE FOURTH COMMUNIQUE ON DOZIER

[Text] Rome, 16 Jan, (ANSA) -- A fourth communique from the Red Brigades urban guerillas holding United States General James Lee Dozier has been found here today but, according to the police, it does not contain any elements. The communique, found in a waste bin near a cinema after an anonymous telephone call to a Roman daily indicated its location, is the first message by the brigade group since 6 January, when communique number three was found together with the alleged transcript of the "interrogation" of the ranking officer at the NATO land forces in southern Europe headquarters in Verona. A spokesman for the Roman police stated that this fourth document from the Red Brigades holding Dozier did not contain any new information but that it did prove that the American general is still alive. Another copy of the same communique was found today in Milan, in the letter box of [a] Milanese private radio station.

Meanwhile, squads of police and paramilitary police agents continued today to effect numberous road-blocks, dragnets and systematic searches together with Italy's Revenue Police in the Verona area in search of the "people's prison" where the Red Brigades are reportedly holding Dozier. The general was kidnapped from his Verona apartment on December 17 after an armed "commando" bound and gagged his wife Judith, and carried Dozier in a large trunk to a waiting van outside, gaining [a] four-hour lead on police.

The systematic searches today included the requisitioning of approximately 700 boats harbored or navigating north and south of Venice, but police sources indicated that no new leads had been found. In Rome the special anti-terrorism police squad continued their investigations on the material and leads discovered at the time of the arrest of alleged Roman Red Brigades cell leader, Giovanni Senzani, and the discovery of two other of the urban guerilla group's 'coves' in the Rome area. According to anti-terrorism police sources, the new wave of investigations could lead to the discovery of [a] "cove" of the "Militarists" or hard-line brigades group responsible for the Dozier kidnapping.

In the five pages of communique number four from the Red Brigades holding Dozier, the group dedicates very little space to the abduction of the general, repeating only that the action constitutes part of the "offensive of the revolutionary forces against the nerve centers of the enemy project." The document also includes obscure threats against journalists, warning them that they could "end up like Simone," the deputy chief of the Roman anti-terrorism squad wounded on January 6th when two persons dressed as postmen rang his apartment doorbell and shot him twice in the jaw. Simone had formally held the post of press attache at the headquarters of the Rome police.

The remaining part of the document concentrates on ideological questions and on the "mistaken tendencies...which at times like this could bring about a defeat of the revolutionary forces." The reference is to alleged [words indistinct] within the Red Brigades organization over the tactics to use in their terror campaign.

JUDGE SAYS ISRAEL, LIBYA, SYRIA AIDED BRIGADES

[Text] Rome, 17 Jan (AFP) -- Italian Judge Ferdinando Imposimato has accused the Israeli Government of having aided the Red Brigades terrorist group with weapons, intelligence and money "at least until 1978." Mr Imposimato, who heads an inquest into the 1978 kidnapping and murder of Christian Democratic Party chief Aldo Moro, made the charges in an interview printed today in the center-left newspaper IL MESSAGERO.

He said the Israeli plan was to "reduce Italy to a country ripped apart by civil war, thereby forcing the United States to give more support to Israel in order to ensure the security of the Mediterranean."

Mr Imposimato said he based his charges on testimony given by repented Red Brigades leaders Patrizio Peci and Alfredo Bonavita, whom he said had knowledge of the organization's contacts outside the country. He said they had provided verification of Israeli aid to the group, which included helping the brigades track down "traitors" and providing them with information on potential new recruits. The judge also accused Libya and Syria of providing aid and weapons to the Red Brigades as well as to groups of the extreme right. He said he had witnesses who said presumed Red Brigades terrorist Maurizio Folini had imported weapons from Lebanon, and had at one time been arrested and then released at an Eastern European border after proving his membership in the Soviet secret service KGB.

Believes Dozier Will Be Killed

[Text] Rome, 18 Jan (ANSA) -- International links with terrorist actions in Italy, and a pessimistic outlook for the fate of kidnapped United States Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier were the subjects of an interview published in Sunday's edition of the Rome daily IL MESSAGGERO with Investigating Court Judge Ferdinando Imposimato. Imposimato, who has been involved with many of the investigations into both right and left-wing guerilla groups, maintained in the interview that "on the basis of my experience, I believe that the Red Brigades will unfortunately follow their aberrant logic of assassinating the prisoner. The general is in the hands of the Militarist wing of the organization, which has only been scratched by the recent anti-terrrorist operation culminating in the arrest of Senzani. We can expect many more attacks," the judge predicted.

The Roman judge also reiterated his often-quoted conviction that international connections exist between Italian and foreign guerrilla groups, and particularly between extreme left-wing subversive groups here and Libyan, Syrian and Eastern-bloc nation secret services. The judge also made the unique claim that "until 1978, Israeli secret services also infiltrated the subversive Italian formations and more than once put arms, financing and information at the disposition of the Red Brigades." The judge did not provide any direct proof for his allegations but he did reveal that "precise testimony" linking Italian terrorists to these foreign secret services does exist.

On the subject of the would-be assassin of Pope John Paul II, Imposimato said that he was equally convinced that the Turk Mehmet Ali Agca, who has been linked to right-wing Turkish groups, (?was) the last step in the plot. If he had only been an isolated madman, he would never have (?taken the precaution) to register at the university for foreigners in Perugia. An investigation which we have launched into (?his contacts) there, the judge concluded, "could lead to important results in the near future." Agca is currently serving a life sentence in a maxium-security prison in Italy for his attempted assassination of the pope.

'EMERGENCY PLAN' IMPOSED TO CONTAIN RED BRIGADES

PA151400 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1252 GMT 15 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 15 Jan (EFE) -- The Italian Government has ordered an emergency plan in the face of a "general revolt" in the prisons where the main leaders of the Red Brigades are being held. This is reported today by CORRIERE DELLA SERA, which states that one of the objectives of the brigade members was an all-out attack on several penitentiaries. This objective was deduced from the mountain of documents seized by the police in the past few days.

It was to be a "great assault," states the newspaper, and even helicopters were to be used to facilitate the mass escape of prisoners. The government plans to concentrate the most dangerous prisoners in maximum-security prisons, to increase vigilance to prevent their contact with comrades on the outside and to create a sort of "sterile zone" around those prisons located in urban areas. Using the army for guard duty was ruled out because that would cause technical and political problems; however, the military may act in the event of an emergency. Other more specific details of the plan are being held in strict secrecy, although it is known that experts of the Ministry of Defense and Justice have been working on it for several days.

As the documents seized following the latest arrests in Rome continue to be examined, there is a clearer idea of the "winter of fire" that the Roman column of the Red Brigades was preparing under the guidance of Giovanni Senzani. The objectives included attacks on several police stations, the assassination of a magistrate, the abduction of Ceasare Romiti of the Fiat Company, assaults on jails and an attack with missiles and grenade launchers on the Christian Democratic Party [DC] headquarters. According to other sources, the long list of "immediate objectives" also included attacks on Bettino Craxi, secretary general of the Italian Socialist Party, and Gianni de Michelis, minister of state.

The main concern of the investigators now is the arrest of the rest of the Roman column, which has not been broken up, as previously believed. It is known that more "safe houses" exist in and around Rome. It is suspected that one of them has an arsenal much larger than the one discovered last weekend, when grenade launchers and missiles intended for the party headquarters were found.

Plans for 'Massacre on TV'

NC171540 Paris AFP in English 1530 GMT 17 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 17 Jan (AFP) -- Arrested Red Brigades leader Giovanni Senzani had prepared detailed plans for a televised massacre January 22 Christian Democrat Party headquarters here, the nespaper IL GIORNO said today. Professor Senzani, an internationally known criminologist who headed the Rome branch of the Red Brigades, was arrested on January 9. IL GIORNO, citing highly reliable sources, said the attack plan called for a dozen Red Brigades posing as television technicians to infiltrate the headquarters on the day the national party council meeting opened.

Each terrorist was to carry gernades, two submachine guns and sleeping-gas bombs. They were to begin hurling the grenades and gunning down the deputies at the moment when television began direct broadcasting of the meeting. A few seconds later, members of the commando were to take over controls of the cameras ensuring that they continued to film the carnage while 15 other terrorists launched diversionary attacks outside the building. The whole operation, which was to last four and a half minutes, was planned to cause at least 80 deaths without any terrorist losses.

According to IL GIORNO, a rightist-leaning newspaper close to the government, the attack was meant to mitigate a schism between the Rome branch of the Red Brigades and the northern Venice branch which kidngapped U.S. General Dozier by proving the "effectiveness" of the Roman column. It said Mr Senzani had hoped to fulfill the wishes of imprisoned Red Brigade founder Renato Curcio to see the armed group reunified, while ensuring his own uncontested leadership of the entire organisation.

Meanwhile, police today discovered a Red Brigade hideout at Marino, 30 km (18 miles) south of Rome, which was to have served as a "peoples' jail" for Nicola Simone, deputy chief of the anti-terrorist police Digos. The Red Brigades tried to kidnap Mr Simone on January 6. He was severely wounded in the attack but managed to escape by shooting at the commando. Police found a large cache of weapons at the hideout, as well disguises and tape recorders to be used for interrogating Mr Simone. According to the police, the kidnapping had been planned by the same northern branch of the Red Brigades which claimed the kidngapping of General Dozier.

PAJETTA QUESTIONED ON RELATIONS WITH FRENCH CP

[Text] Disagreement over Poland continues on the Eurocommunist front. There is no discord between the French Communists and the Soviet Communists but there is a serious break between Moscow and the Spanish and Italian Communist Parties. Santiago Carillo has drawn blood and Enrico Berlinguer in Italy has been condemning the coup d'etat in Warsaw since 13 December. This week, after a 3-day Central Committee meeting, this condemnation was confirmed. Bertrand Vannier, our correspondent in Rome, asked an Italian Communist Party leader for explanations. Giancarlo Pajetta is one of Enrico Berlinguer's deputies and in some ways is the Italian Communist Party's foreign minister. The first question posed to Mr Pajetta was: Has there been a break with Moscow? Here is his answer:

[Begin recording] [Pajetta] We do not think so, and we are trying to reach an understanding. That is why we are talking to each other openly and firmly. We are not saying that the hopes raised by the October Revolution are lost. What is lost is the extent to which one can believe that force, arms and diktat can determine revolutionary inspiration, momentum and trust in the ideas of the revolution. Those who declare themselves the inheritors of all this must be blind to the new reality. The new reality points to a very complex and differentiated workers' movement, and we seek a dialog with the socialists, with the social democrats and with the liberation movements. We believe that one cannot, at this moment, speak of communists as a world-wide unique party.

[Question] As you know, the French Communist Party's attitude toward Poland is very different from that of the Italian Communist Party. What will future relations between the French and Italian Communist Parties be like?

[Answer] We will discuss these matters with the French comrades. There are four French Communists in the French Government and they are together with the Socialists even though they do not agree on the Polish question. In the same vein, I do not think identical stands are needed for us to be able to discuss things or even to work together. We defend our own stand and we listen to others. If polemics are necessary we will discuss things. We will attend the French Communist Party congress. We will listen and, as far as possible, we will express our views. [end recording]

CRAXI-PICCOLI MEETING FORESTALLS GOVERNMENT CRISIS

[Text] Rome, 16 Jan (ANSA) -- The present Italian ruling coalition appeared to be in better shape today after a meeting between two of the key coalition party secretaries confirmed the one condition posed by Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini as an important step before a "summit" meeting of the parties can be held to determine the validity of the present government. After a meeting described as "cordial" on Friday between Christian Democrat Secretary Flaminio Piccoli and Socialist Party head Bettino Craxi, Piccoli distributed a declaration in Milan claiming that "political verification" among the coalition should take place after the passage of financial laws mentioned as being "of prime importance" to the nation.

According to qualified political sources, Craxi told his counterpart from the relative majority party that the altered attitude about the "verification" of the Spadolini government depended above all on the escalated situation of attacks by armed groups in Italy, whose alleged new program of actions was "fortunately" thwarted.

In his declaration, Piccoli emphasized that there is no alternative to the five-party coalition, but noted that this did not imply that a "constructive dialogue with the opposition Communist Party" should be ignored.

The leadership committee of the Liberal Party, meanwhile, which together with the Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, and Spadolini's own Republican Party comprise the present coalition, yesterday approved a document affirming the necessity of "promptly" approving the financial laws. Toning down the impact of recent rumors circulating in political and press circles concerning the imminent collapse of the government, both Liberal and Social Democratic leaders agreed that through a "verification" among the coalition partners was necessary, this did not necessarily spell out [a] government crisis, during an interview last night on channel 2 of the Italian state television network.

In another development, Socialist Party minister for southern Italian affairs, Claudio Signorile, maintained in an interview to appear in the coming issue of a Milan weekly magazine that the opposition Communist Party's detachment from the Soviet Union has been maturing "for some time," referring to the recent documents and decisions to emerge from the Central Committee and leadership meetings. Signorile added that "when the Communist Party participates in a confrontation among its highest leaders, it means that a true change is taking place, and certainly not a painless one."

PAKISTAN'S ZIAUL HAQ ARRIVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT

LD171904 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 17 Jan 82

[Text] The president of Pakistan, Gen Ziaul Haq, arrived in Rome this afternoon for a 4-day visit. After paying homage at the Unknown Soldier's tomb, he will be received tomorrow at the Quirinale Palace by President Pertini. During the day Ziaul Haq will have talks with Fanfani, Spadolini and Colombo. During the talks attention will focus on the development of bilateral relations and on the international situation, with special reference to the Afghan crisis. Wednesday morning the Pakistani president will be received by the pope in the Vatican.

POPE APPEALS FOR 'SELF-DETERMINATION' FOR POLAND

[Text] Vatican City, 16 Jan (ANSA) -- Pope John Paul II made an impassioned appeal for his native Poland's right to "self determination" and decried the continuation of what he called the "spheres of hegemony" that emerged from the Second World War in a speech delivered here today to the diplomatic corps. He also took the occasion to announce the establishment of normal diplomatic relations between the Holy See and Britain.

The Catholic Church leader deplored events threatening peace in Central America and in the Middle East and lashed out against terrorism in Italy and other parts of the world in his hour-long tirade against injustice on the international scene. But the brunt of his remarks were devoted to his 'beloved homeland':

"The conviction that peoples should be freely allowed to choose their social organization... and that this organization must conform to the requirements of justice, human rights and religious freedom is spreading rapidly in world public opinion. The commonly shared conviction is that no people should be treated as a subordinate or as a tool by other peoples... in disparagement of equality, which is written in the human consciousness and recognized in international law. Just like personal relationships, in which it is not permissable for one to treat another like an object, so it is in international affairs... where anything that undermines the free expression of a nation's will must be deplored."

In a thinly-veiled reference to the Yalta agreements, John Paul went on to say: "The fact that (parts of the world) were divided into spheres of hegemony in specific situations... does not justify the persistence (of these spheres), especially when they tend to restrict the sovereignty of others.

"Every people has to be able to manage their own affairs when it comes to the free determination of their own destiny. The church cannot fail to give its support to this conviction."

The Polish-born pontiff decried forms of "authoritarianism," saying that "existing regimes" may upset the internal peace of a nation whose people would like to achieve a freer system.

He also warned against "the threat of totalitarian systems" which "deplore humanistic and religious culture of other people" and "impose their own ideologies without respecting man's right to free expression."

The reason for his remarks, the pope said, was that Poland had pounced into the center of the world stage, especially in the West, after last month's declaration of a "state of war."

Military rule in Poland, still in effect, has led to the detention of thousands, the church leader added, particularly intellectuals and leaders of the free trade union movement.

The pope reminded his listeners of "the enormous contribution in terms of sacrifice and bloodshed" that Poles gave Europe in the last two centuries and of "the holocaust of six million in the last war" while voicing pride in his nationality.

But nonetheless, he assured he shared the sufferings of other peoples as well, since he is "not only the son of a grieving Poland" but "the visible leader of the Catholic Church" which holds all peoples "equally dear and close."

Raising his voice, John Paul exclaimed that "it was not possible to keep quiet when man's inviolable rights and the no-less-sacred ones of nations were endangered."

The church, he added, was saddened as much by the "incalculable moral values" at stake as by the political interests involved.

Mounting tensions in Central America, the Vatican leader went on, where "repressive actions and guerrilla activities" are claiming a "macabre monthly toll of victims" were creating a situation that resembled "an unrestrainable epidemic of violence."

And the Middle East, he added, is beset by "a fragile and continuously threatened truce" as well as "renewed non-stop violence" and "the rigidity of intransigent positions."

The pope, who has been mediating a dispute between Argentina and Chile over possession of Antarctic territories, voiced the wish that "the two countries may finally move together along the path of prosperity and progress" with regard for "the priceless treasure of true peace."

Included in the church leader's appeal today were the "millions" of political exiles from Southeast Asia to Afghanistan as well as from several African countries.

His closing remarks picked up on the Church's stands on labor and the family as the pope called on political authorities to fulfill their responsibilities of "not treating man as if he were a tool of production" and of promoting the dignity of the family in a context of public morality."

"These times are tough and dark clouds are looming," he concluded, "but the forces of good are much bigger."

LISBON MAY REDUCE NUMBER OF SOVIET DIPLOMATS

[Text] Lisbon, 15 Jan (AFP) -- Portugal is considering reducing the number of Soviet diplomats accredited here as a protest against Moscow's involvement in the Polish crisis, a Foreign Ministry spokesman said here today. Diplomatic sources said such a measure could affect 30 percent of the Soviet diplomatic mission here, which numbers 23 diplomats and 44 other officials without diplomatic status. The expulsion might be ordered next week as a first "sanction" against the Soviet Union, sources said.

Following his return from Brussels, where foreign ministers from the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO) discussed possible sanctions against Moscow for its role in Poland, Andres Goncalves Pereira said his government would take "concrete" measures against the Soviet Union. He mentioned a possible reduction in the number of Soviet diplomats here, restrictions to their freedom to travel, and cutbacks in cultural and scientific exchanges between the two countries.

The Portuguese Communist Party said today the government had refused to grant a visa to Soviet Central Committee Member Ivan Kapitonov and members of a delegation who were to take part in a "friendship visit" here. This was the first time such a high-ranking Soviet official was denied a visa by a Western country.

In the wake of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan two years ago, Portugal called off a scheduled visit by Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko and cancelled several cooperation agreements. In June 1980, Lisbon expelled four Soviet diplomats, including the embassy's number two, for "interfering" in Portuguese domestic affairs.

PCP ASKS MINISTRY TO RECONSIDER USSR VISA REFUSAL

[Text] The Portuguese Communist Party [PCP] has announced fresh attempts to get the Foreign Ministry to reconsider its decision to refuse entry visas to a Soviet delegation. A Foreign Ministry spokesman, for his part, has said that the decision to refuse the visas was taken in light of the restrictive policies adopted by the government in this sphere following the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

The Soviet delegation was due to attend a communist rally to be held in Oporto. According to the PCP, the rally will still be held with the same initial goals, but now including any others possibly justified by developments.

BALSEMAO TO BEGIN VISIT TO BRUSSELS 25 JAN

LD152216 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 15 Jan 82

[Text] Brussels will be the first stop on Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao's tour of EEC capitals. On 25 January Pinto Balsemao, who will be accompanied by the minister of foreign affairs and the secretary of state for European integration, will meet Wilfried Martens, Gaston Thorn and possibly NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns in Brussels.

The prime minister's trips, divided into three stages, are expected to be completed by mid-May.

INTERIOR MINISTER SURVEYS ANTITERRORISM STRUGGLE

PM151517 Madrid YA in Spanish 30 Dec 81 p 7

[Excerpts] "With the information at this ministry's disposal, it is not envisaged that another 23 February will occur. But in any event this ministry and the Ministry of Defense are working to prevent another attempted coup occurring," Minister of the Interior, Juan Jose Roson has stated in taking stock of 1981 in a lengthy statement. In another context the minister stated that 1981 marked an important landmark in the struggle against terrorism: there has been a significant increase in the number of detainees and in the amount of weapons and explosives seized and a reduction in the number of attacks and victims.

Between January and October 410 people were arrested for involvement in terrorist actions, as against 353 during the same period last year. Some 621 kg of Goma-2 explosives and 268 weapons were also seized, as against the 189 kg of Goma-2 and 169 weapons in 1980. In the opinion of Minister Roson, the explanation of the success achieved over the last few months in the struggle against terrorism has three dimensions: those of the political forces, the social forces and the police forces.

In the first place, there was realization by the political forces, which culminated in 1980 in the approval of the law against terrorism. From that viewpoint, it must be acknowledged that the government had greater support on the basis of that law than it had previously. Second, I believe the people, and especially the people of the Basque Country and Navarre, received the maximum degree of information concerning what terrorism was in the first few months of 1981. We are detecting a greater degree of social rejection of terrorism in those provinces and a greater degree of cooperation with the state security forces and bodies.

Moreover, the minister added, there cannot be the slightest doubt that the state security bodies and forces have made a great effort and have succeeded in penetrating the cloak surrounding Basque Homeland and Liberty (ETA). The situation has improved, but what should not be done on any account is to draw a false conclusion. ETA has not ended yet, but is different from what it was a year ago. I believe there are signs that enable us to view the future with moderate optimism.

Among the favorable signs is the truce ETA's politicomilitary wing has maintained over the last few months, and which coincides with the political developments of a party which upholds the same viewpoints, but without violent action and within the constitutional framework. "I believe," Roson added, "that at this time, when ideological options are proceeding along political channels, ETA is ending up purely as what it is -- an armed gang."

ETA was based on three fronts: a few activists -- those who were the best trained technically and who were the perpetrators of the attacks -- who have always been a minority group and have never exceeded several hundred people; some far larger groups, support groups -- perhaps several thousand people -- which were what has come to be termed the intelligence apparatus; and last, a certain section of the population, which must be regarded as being a good many thousands of people, who saw in ETA the possibility of achieving political or social aims they set themselves. The police have very thoroughly deactivated the intelligence apparatus, and the mass of the people views ETA merely as an armed criminal group. Those who are left now are simply the criminals.

Concerning ETA's sanctuary in France, the situation is no worse, but nor has it improved spectacularly. The extraditions have not been granted, but the allocations of places of residence are being carried out scrupulously.

The cooperation of the Basque Nationalist Party in seeking to ensure that the revolutionary tax is not paid is also very important. It is the principal political force in the Basque provinces, and I believe that insofar as it opposes this kind of crime as such a political force, it helps to provide moral support for citizens to prevent them yielding to terror.

This year, Roson continued, terrorism by the 1 October Armed Revolutionary Group [GRAPO] declined considerably, and the number of detainees from this group has gone from 157 in 1980 to 36 in 1981. GRAPO has not been completely broken up, since some important leaders, such as Martin Luna, are left, but it is a group greatly harassed by the security forces.

I believe the key in the struggle against rightwing terrorism lies in the fact that we have delved deeply into it and have succeeded in isolating cells which had no very clearly defined connection. So far it is the type of terrorism in which the most progress has been made, which does not mean that it has disappeared; it is these apparently unconnected groups without a clearly defined infrastructure which have made it necessary to act simultaneously in many parts of the country, intensively and in depth.

The Single Command for the Antiterrorist Struggle represents an attempt to improve the state security bodies' and forces' coordination and specialization and the ability to coordinate intelligence. From this viewpoint, progress has been made throughout the months, but it is still necessary to make even more progress. The Single Command's great year will be 1982.

With the information at this ministry's disposal, it is not envisaged that another 23 February will occur. But in any event this ministry and the Ministry of Defense are working to prevent that possibility being realized. I regard it as remote, and insofar as we all cease to be under the psychological impact of 23 February, Roson said, we will have created the social defenses against any 23 February.

With respect to Felipe Gonzalez' assertions to the effect that 23 February had some civilian origins, I must say I believe there are not very many civilian origins for the attempted coup. What I do believe is that quite a few civilians, although very much a minority sector within society and absolutely insignificant within the political class, would be prepared to support any attempt at another 23 February. But my personal impression is that there is not very much civilian responsibility for 23 February, even if there was considerable civilian sympathy on the part of a minority of the people.

PRIME MINISTER ADDRESSES NEW MILITARY CHIEFS

[Excerpt] The new members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff have been sworn in at Moncloa Palace. At about 1030 the new members were sworn in: Lt Gen Alvaro Lacalle Leloup, Lt Gen Ramon de Ascanio y Togores, Vice Adm Saturnino Suances de la Hidalga, and Lt Gen Emilio Garcia-Conde. Like all military ceremonies, it was a simple one and began with their swearing-in with the words "I swear by my conscience and honor to fulfill the obligations of my post with loyalty to the king, to abide by the constitution as the fundamental rule of state."

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Lt Gen Alvaro Lacalle Leloup, then said a few words in which he thanked the king and the government for the trust they have placed in them to undertake this high military responsibility. He also stressed that they will make the utmost efforts to improve the armed forces in their technical and operational aspects. He also emphasized moral values, love of the fatherland, improvement of typically military virtues such as, he said, the virtue of law and discipline, which is the key to unity and to the armed forces. Finally, he expressed his loyalty to the king.

The prime minister, Don Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo, then spoke to thank and praise the attitude maintained by the outgoing lieutenants general and admiral during the time they were at the head of the three branches of the armed forces, and members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and among other things said the following:

[Begin Calvo-Sotelo recording] The four of you, under the chairmanship of the first, are taking over the supreme collegiate body of the chain of military command of the three branches of the armed forces. An exciting task lies ahead of you, which I should like to sum up in a single remark, to continue the process undertaken by your predecessors with the same spirit and with the purpose so often displayed by those who today terminate their office in the service of the Spanish people of the indissoluble unity of the Spanish nation, with total respect for the constitution and with a disciplined disposition in the framework of loyalty to the king. King's Address

[Text] At midday today his majesty the king awarded the Grand Cross of Carlos III to the outgoing members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in a ceremony attended by the prime minister, the minister of defense and the Army Supreme Council. After awarding the decorations the king made a speech in which he thanked the outgoing chiefs of staff, Lt Gen Ignacio Alfaro Arregui, Lt Gen Jose Gabeiras Montero, Adm Luis Arevalo Pelluz and Lt Gen Emiliano Alfaro Arregui, for the skill and effectiveness they had shown in their posts at a time when there was no lack of difficulties and moments of tension.

At a later point the king said: Let us examine our consciences and ask the consciences of everyone, for the supreme need to observe the law, respect freedom and the worship of truth. I repeat to you, Don Juan Carlos said, that in my opinion these supreme councils should always endeavor to take note of and consult the accurate feeling expressed according to the regulations of all those who make up the armed forces in order to convey it, as the reflection of an atmosphere, as a general opinion, with sincerity and clarity, to the authorities of state, who are responsible for the government of the country and for its defense policy.

But let us not forget either, and I emphasize this, the king said, that this has to be measured and correct, given at the request of the mentioned authorities or set out calmly when the general circumstances advise it, and should not, of course, include personal or corporative insults. Recently, Don Juan Carlos said, I had occasion to stress this need for communication within the armed forces and between their highest representatives and the government of the nation, and I emphasize it, Don Juan Carlos added, because I am certain that this perfect coordination will enable us to strengthen the unity of the armed forces, which have to adapt perfectly to the organization of the state so as to achieve the order, peace and progress we all want for our fatherland.

Many and diverse might be the positions and lines of thought and conduct in a society which describes itself as pluralist, but, Don Juan Carlos said, intentions which do not stem from the resolute will to serve Spain within the legal order which the Spaniards themselves have established will not be legitimate and, therefore, not worthy of acceptance. Neither will actions which, disregarding or bypassing the natural channels of expression and communication, could create conditions of restlessness or disorientation in the military service itself and in the peaceful coexistence of citizens in general be acceptable.

With regard to the future, Don Juan Carlos said, we must have the utmost confidence in ourselves and in the institutions in the certainty that any obstacle will be overcome and justice will prevail in every respect. In the year which has just ended we have all had to live through times which we cannot fail to remember as the source of a lesson and of experience. We have had the opportunity to defend national coexistence, social integrity, the strength of democratically elected institutions and the unity of the armed forces.

For my part, the king said, I can assure you that I have never felt alone in the task which has befallen me. The events resolved by your firm support for the king have shown that the Crown reinforces and strengthens the national desire to overcome differences peacefully, makes the social powers responsible and permanently adopts the way of live to which we are committed and for which we have received the most resolute adherence and support.

This is not the time, therefore, to dwell on the scars or natural resentment which adversity may have caused, but, precisely because of them, we should feel strengthened, more conscious and certain than ever about the future. With this confidence, I should like to offer you my warm and sincere regards so that you might also extend them to your subordinates, who I consider to be represented by you here.

Don Juan Carlos concluded his speech to the prime minister, the minister of defense and the Army Supreme Council by saying: And as a summary of my thoughts and as a resume of my permanent feelings there is a single word: Spain. This defines us and elevates us. We should feel proud of and committed to Spain. Let us never disappoint it.

KIDNAPPED PHYSICIAN FOUND; POLICE SUSPECT ETA

[Excerpts] Madrid, 17 Jan (AFP) -- [Words indistinct] Iglesias, kidnapped father of the Spanish singer of the same name, was released from a small house in Trasmos, in the central Spanish province of Saragossa, early today, the police anti-terrorist squad announced. A couple and two young people believed to be members of the ETA politico-military Basque separatist organisation [words indistinct] police from the small two-story house where Dr Iglesias was being held.

Dr Iglesias, 66, disappeared in Madrid in December [words indistinct] his pop singer son, who lives in Miami, Florida, was said [word indistinct] to pay a two million dollar ransom for the release of his father. The release came at 3:00 am (0200 GMT) today when senior police officers, the Civil Guard and members of the special operations squad raided [words indistinct]. A number of police vehicles surrounded the building before the police moved in. Dr Iglesias, a successful gynaecologist, was said to be tired after his ordeal, but happy to be released.

Eyewitnesses said police blasted their way into the house at Trasmos, catching in their sleep the four people in the house with Dr Iglesias. The four arrested included the owner of the house, a man in his fifties known as Luis Guti. He bought the house about a year ago and came to spend the odd weekend in the small village of some 130 inhabitants. Police said he used a car registered in Bilbao.

During the last few days, police had arrested several other people who had confirmed suspicions that Dr Iglesias was being held in the house, police sources said. Police said the abductors of Dr Iglesias made contact with the family on January 2, only three days after the kidnapping. If it is confirmed that the kidnapping was carried out by the ETA, this would signify an end to the truce announced by the organisation following the failed putsch of February 23, 1981.

ETA 'Breaks Truce'

NC171007 Paris AFP in English 1001 GMT 17 Jan 82

[Text] Madrid, 17 Jan (AFP) -- Spanish Interior Minister Juan Jose Roson today confirmed that Dr Julio Iglesias, rescued by police earlier today, had been kidnapped by the Basque autonomous ETA Political-Military movement. This meant that ETA-PM had definitely broken the truce it declared a few days after the abortive military putsch on February 23, 1981.

But observers noted that in fact the truce had been broken earlier by the kidnapping on January 14 of the industrialist Luis Suner, released three months later on payment of a ransom of 500 million pesetas (about five million dollars). However, since then the ETA-PM had scrupulously observed the truce.

Recently there have been reports that ETA-PM was facing grave financial problems. The other autonomous Basque movement, ETA-Military, still holds industrialist Jose Lipperheide who was kidnapped near Bilbao on January 5, exactly one week after the seizure of Dr Iglesias.

'CONSIDERABLE DIFFERENCES' IN U.S. TREATY TALKS

[Text] The sixth round of negotiations on the treaty of friendship and cooperation between Spain and the United States will possibly begin before the end of this month or at the beginning of February. Over the past week there have been meetings of three working committees, namely those studying the statute on the U.S. armed forces in Spain (?and) cooperation in the arms industry and (?the one) studying the treaty.

At the moment, there are considerable differences between the negotiators in the first two committees. Spain wants to have broad jurisdiction over members of the U.S. military who commit offences on Spanish territory. With regard to the committee on industrial cooperation, Spain, which with entry into NATO will become a good arms market, is demanding a bigger share of the profits the United States obtains in Europe from exports.

In any event, the Spanish Government hopes to conclude the negotiations as soon as possible, negotiations which could be helped by Spain's forthcoming entry into NATO. It is hoped, nevertheless, that the negotiations will be concluded before 20 May, the date on which the extension to the present treaty expires.

CALVO-SOTELO DESCRIBES TALKS IN BRUSSELS

PM181015 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 8 Jan 82 pp 5-6

[Andres Garrigo dispatch]

[Excerpts] Brussels -- Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo's visit to the leaders of Belgium, NATO and the Common Market has raised new hopes. Spain and the EEC have entered upon a new stage of political cooperation, and henceforth Spanish foreign policy will align itself increasingly with that of the EEC. As for the talks on membership, this year will be decisive, the Spanish prime minister believes.

"We are now beginning the definitive stage of the negotiation. The time for rhetorical statements is past, and we are going to enter into concrete realities. Until now the EEC always had preconditions; now that it has lifted them, we are prepared to negotiate seriously without avoiding a single problem," Calvo-Sotelo has said. As for the community, it expressed the same political will to make fundamental progress, but without committing itself to a definite date for concluding the negotiation.

Calvo-Sotelo announced with satisfaction that an interesting formula for political cooperation with the EEC has been concretized. As is known, the 10 ministers of the community meet regularly to tune their violins with regard to big issues in world politics, in addition to sessions of the Common Market Council of Ministers. This is how the Ten took a joint stand on Poland this week, a stand which is certainly very close to that of Spain, Calvo-Sotelo assured us.

Henceforth, as Perez Llorca told us, Spain will be consulted before each political cooperation meeting of the Ten, both at the level of directors general (at the preparatory stage) and at ministerial level. The chairman of the EEC Council will first receive the Spanish minister, who, after the session, will be invited to the luncheon or dinner the participants are wont to have.

The working session held yesterday at the Egmont Palace between the delegations from Spain and Belgium (as chairman of the EEC) marked the start of the new Spanish-community political cooperation. The two principal subjects discussed were the repression in Poland and the conflict in the Middle East.

But at prime ministerial level Calvo-Sotelo wished to emphasize the negotiations. He wielded two arguments above all: First, the EEC would not be true to the Treaty of Rome if it put off any longer a democratic European country which is knocking on its doors, prepared to accept the rules of the game; and second, the Spanish people are an impatient people but have demonstrated admirable patience during the 4 and 1/2 years which have passed since the request to join. Up to now public opinion has been favorably unanimous -- an advantage the majority of EEC member countries lack. Therefore we must not lose this asset by cheating Spanish opinion, to which he no longer knows how to explain the delays....

The response of Martens and Tindemans to this demand was "enormously open and favorable to a mobilization of the negotiations which would result from a definite impetus." Calvo-Sotelo hopes that a good deal of the issues will receive this impetus in this first half-year and that the rest can be resolved in the second half-year.

"In January," he said, "we will respond in a broad and concrete manner to the EEC agricultural document and the customs union document." With regard to the introduction of value-added tax, he explained that up to now Spain has refused to discuss it, but since the EEC is dropping its prerequisites, we will tackle it without further ado. This indicates a change in the Spanish position, but it remains to be seen what period of transition will be requested. This, the prime minister specified, is one of the key issues which will be shelved until the very end of the negotiation.

For their part, the community members have promised to prepare their positions -- almost definitive -- on the economy and finance, movement of capital, transportation, harmonizing of legislation and fishing before the 22 March EEC summit.

With regard to the fishing issue, which became heated yesterday when a negotiating session failed, Calvo-Sotelo voiced his concern to Martens and Tindemans. He insisted that we must abandon the system of annual licenses in order to establish a long-term fishing plan. It was not thought here that this problem would be raised to the highest political level. In contrast, the EEC had appointed an obscure official lacking in initiative for the fishing negotiations.

Will Spain repeat its request for membership if the negotiations drag on too long? This question angered Calvo-Sotelo, who fulminated at the soothsayers who display such pessimism at the very moment we are entering the stage of real progress.

He did not deny, however, that Portugal could join before Spain, as it applied for membership several months earlier, and both countries have opposed combining the two negotiations, which are following separate paths. But, again, the prime minister refused to "get uptight about specific dates." He said he was aware of the internal problems the community must overcome and of which he was reminded by Tindemans and Thorn, but he hopes the EEC reforms (agricultural and budgetary) will be resolved in parallel with the progress of the negotiations with Spain.

The bilateral aspects of the talks were of particular interest. Belgium has just brought in a new center-right government which has had to use drastic measures to tackle the financial disorder of the previous center-left coalition and the complex regional problems. Therefore, Martens took an interest in the Spanish regional autonomy legislation, and Calvo-Sotelo an interest in the special powers law (a free hand for the government in economic matters), which the Belgian parliament is debating. Our prime minister would like to dispose of similar powers to put the economy to rights, but he lacks the majority his colleague Martens enjoys.

More important, although little or nothing has leaked out, was the meeting with NATO Secretary General Luns. Calvo-Sotelo said it was normal for him to see him, since Spain has officially asked to join the alliance and the process of ratification has already begun with Canada's ratification. The prime minister denied that he had gone to discuss with Luns a timetable for concrete negotiations on military issues. For now this visit is, above all, confirmation of Spain's Atlantic outlook hallowed by the signing of the membership protocol of 10 December last year.

FOREIGN MINISTER SET TO PAY VISIT TO GIBRALTAR

LD122034 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1830 GMT 12 Jan 82

[Excerpts] At Moncloa Palace this morning Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo had a meeting with the first deputy prime minister with responsibility for political affairs, Rodolfo Martin Villa, and the minister of foreign affairs, Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca, with whom he had a working session. According to well-informed sources, among the subjects discussed was that of the elections to the Andalusian Parliament. The same sources have said that Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo and Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca studied the foreign minister's forthcoming trip to Gibraltar. After Calvo-Sotelo's recent trip to London and the forthcoming opening of the Gibraltar border, a trip by Perez-Llorca to the Rock was announced, though the definitive date has still not been set.

PAPER ASSAILS FRENCH-NICARAGUAN ARMS DEAL

FM141539 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 10 Jan 82 p 5

[Editorial: "Weapons for Nicaragua"]

[Text] The sale of French weapons to Nicaragua, decided in December but announced only now, poses a number of questions to which Defense Minister Charles Hernu was doubtless able to give only an embarrassed answer during his official visit to the United States.

The French authorities aver that their decision is justified by the aim to prevent the Eastern bloc countries from being the only suppliers of certain Third World countries, as if the market, the traffic, in weapons were limited and small, and possible purchasers found it difficult to obtain whatever military "gadgetry" they might fancy. The French leaders also say, with angelic innocence, that the agreement signed with Nicaragua refers solely to "defensive weapons," which does not alter the fact that the contract stipulates two antimissile patrol boats and two combat helicopters.

But the ultimate in stupid optimism is reached by the same spokesmen when they give serious assurances that the contract includes a clause forbidding the reexporting of the military equipment to El Salvador or Guatemala, with whose guerrilla groups the Nicaraguan Sandinists maintain cordial and intensive relations.

President Mitterrand's Central American policy seems not only confused but even dangerous at present, though temporarily backed by Mexican President Lopez Portillo. The manichean interpretation of what is happening in El Salvador made by the French president's advisers, including Mr Regis Debray, can only be compared to the one provided on Spanish television 2 days ago by the "Objectivo" program -- an outright anthology of bigotry, professional idleness and childishness. The problem is that whereas our indsecribable television service merely offers the resigned Spanish public an unfocused version of the facts (which would itself undoubtedly merit a lengthier commentary embracing more than the individual program in question), Mr Mitterrand is granting weapons, in a rather original demonstration of his desire to bring peace to that region.

TALKS ON SIBERIAN GAS SOUGHT WITH USSR

SIGHTING OF TURKISH GUNBOAT PROTESTED IN JAN

NC151602 Athens NEWS in English 15 Jan pp 1, 12

[Excerpt] The Greek ambassador to Ankara yesterday filed an official protest with the Turkish Government over yesterday's incident during which a Turkish gunboat was seen in Greek territorial waters south of the island of Evvoia. The protest was filed on the instructions to the Foreign Ministry, which was briefed on the incident by the Ministry of National Defense.

Premier and Defense Minister Andreas Papandreou was briefed on the incident yesterday by Navy chief Adm Kapetos, during a 4-hour meeting at national defense headquarters. According to press sources, the participants at the meeting discussed procedures for dealing with violations of Greek territorial waters and airspace, especially from the east. It was stressed during the meeting, the sources said, that action plans for all three branches of the Greek armed forces will be clearly adapted to the defensive structure of the Greek geographical space and not to the requirements of NATO headquarters Southern Europe.

Diplomatic sources in Athens last night believed there was [a] close connection between the new Turkish violation of Greek airspace and yesterday's meeting between Mr Papandreou and U.S. Ambassador Monteagle Stearns. The meeting, which had not been previously announced, took place in Papandreou's office and at his initiative, and lasted 45 minutes. No official announcement was issued afterwards, and the government spokesman, asked by reporters, said he had no way of knowing what the two men discussed. The sources noted that the future U.S. military bases in Greece, a major issue in Greek-U.S. relations, is unlikely to have been the subject of the Papandreou-Stearns meeting. The Greek Government, they said, has announced that negotiations on the bases will not start before the end of February; an urgent meeting at such a high level was therefore unjustified.

Regret at Press Handling

[Text] A government statement issued tonight says: The government expresses its regrets that the question of the Turkish gunboat has acquired impermissible dimensions in the press. The statement makes it clear that the government council on defense and foreign affairs has not been convened for over 10 days and that at the same time it is absolutely inaccurate that such a meeting was held yesterday because of the gunboat issue. At the same time, connecting it with the U.S. ambassador's call on the prime minister is absolutely unfounded.

Concerning the Turkish gunboat, the very violation that was caused by the gunboat and gave rise to the Greek Government's strong protest to Ankara is related solely to the rules of navigational safety. Otherwise the gunboat's course, both in the international waters of the Aegean and in the territorial waters of Greece on innocent passage, was normal and was known by Greek authorities.

NAVY EXERCISES SAID UNDER TURKISH SURVEILLANCE

[Text] Turkish air and naval units have come out in force to observe the formation of the Greek navy which started exercises on Wednesday.

According to press reports, Turkish reconnaissance planes flew repeatedly over certain islands of the eastern Aegean -- an indication of the strong concern on the part of Turkey of the Greek war games.

U.S. ENVOY'S REMARKS PART OF 'PROVOCATIONS'

NC180940 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 16 Jan 82 pp 1, 15

[Excerpts] An orchestration of NATO, U.S. and Ankara provocations against Greece has been disclosed. Immediately after Evren's junta rejected the Greek demarche over the gunboat question, new impudent statements by NATO Secretary General Luns and the U.S. Ambassador in Nicosia, Mr Ewing, come to light. ELEVTHEROTIPIA discloses today that Mr Ewing, U.S. ambassador to Cyprus, has told a delegation of Cypriot Americans who visited him in Nicosia that:

The stance of Prime Minister Papandreou does not assist in solving the Cyprus problem and Mr Papandreou himself is creating problems for the United States and its allies.

According to reliable information, the U.S. diplomat's unbecoming attack against the Greek prime minister was made on 7 January before a four-member delegation of Cypriot Americans who participated in the congress of Overseas Cypriots in Nicosia 4-9 January. The delegation visited Mr Ewing to manifest the interest of the congress in the issue of missing persons, among them eight U.S. citizens of Cypriot origin.

Answering a question by a member of the delegation about his statement that Mr Papandreou's stance does not help the Cyprus issue, the U.S. ambassador is said to have stated that "the Greek prime minister is creating problems for the United States and its allies." With regard to the missing persons, Mr Ewing said that the U.S. Government is endeavoring to promote the issue but that the Turkish Government shows its unwillingness with the argument: There are no detained persons.

AVEROF CRITICIZES GOVERNMENT FOREIGN POLICY MOVES

[Text] New Democracy Chairman Averof has made the following statement: During the widely advertised 100 days of rule by PASOK many problems have arisen which affect the productive classes and many points have appeared which cause concern to many democratic and peaceful citizens. As if all this were not enough in the notorious first 100 days, dangerous tension has appeared in Greek-Turkish relations. This tension is manifested either in rather provocative statements or in bold violations of the airspace and territorial waters; similar violations were not noted in the past. Sometimes the government does not announce them and at other times it is obliged to admit them.

Mr Averof adds: Of course all Greeks are determined to confront outside dangers with unshaken concord. It is impossible, however, not to observe that while at the same time tension is increasing both in the Aegean and Cyprus, the foreign policy being exercised by the government is weakening the country's international mainstays. I call on the government to be more careful and not to play with fire.

KKE Scores Turkish Actions

[Text] The KKE has issued a statement stressing that Evren's junta has recently been embarking on open provocative actions against our country. Regardless of the specific aims of the Turkish junta, these provocations constitute a plan by the U.S.-NATO imperialists to imtimidate Greece so that it will capitulate completely in the critical issues of NATO, the U.S. bases and the internationalization of the Cyprus issue.

PAPER PRAISES GOVERNMENT STAND AT NATO MEETING

NC181355 Athens EXORMISI in Greek 16-17 Jan 82 p 12

[From the "Political Affairs" column]

[Excerpts] It is not PASOK that has reintegrated the country into NATO; the responsibility lies with New Democracy, although it is doubtful whether we ever found ourselves outside NATO.

Because disengagement is not merely phraseology, it means disentanglement from an aggreggate of military-political commitments--a thing that has not actually happened.

This disentanglement is the target of the PASOK government. In order to accomplish this, it is necessary to establish beforehand a series of prerequisites related to the country's security (from the visible danger points of view), to which PASOK made a clear reference both during the election period and as a government, so that nobody can accuse PASOK of backing out. However, already it is extremely doubtful if our being in NATO will bring about what its leading "partners" desire both in terms of orientation of the armed forces and harmonization with its political decisions. Out of the "all or nothing" demanded by the political organizations of the traditional leftwing--who are not involved in the issue--there is the responsible road of the PASOK government. Because nobody can deny that we made "life very difficult" for Mr Haig--who could not conceal his fury--at the latest NATO foreign ministers conference when little Greece raised itself for the first time and refused to follow him in his cold-war-type irritation about Poland and threats of sanctions against the Soviet Union. We will do the same thing in the future--as long as we still are within NATO--to weaken his aggressive barbs that threaten peace, by taking precedence in covering other countries in order to reduce the momentum taken by the United States and thus aim at safeguarding detente and peace, which are the primary goal of the PASOK policy and which are of particular importance in its Balkan policy.

Mr Haig lost control of his nerves when, at a press conference after the NATO foreign ministers conference, he was asked about his government's stand toward the Turkish junta. It is difficult for the representative of Washington's "hawks" to realize that his open support for the Turkish people's hangmen--who are setting up new gallows these days--his government's indifference to the drama of the Cypriot people, the generous support to the juntas in Argentina, Chile, Guatemala and El Salvador ridiculously weaken the "true" feelings of support for the drama of the Polish people.

On this occasion it would be nice to know what Mr Haig's reaction would be in the event the Warsaw Pact raised the question of imposing sanctions on the United States for its open support for all the juntas throughout the world.

SOVIET OIL PURCHASE AGREEMENT -- Deputy Commerce Minister Papaspirou has stated that the agreement on purchasing 2 million tons of oil from the Soviet Union has been finalized. Papaspirou will leave for Algeria on Thursday to sign an interstate agreement on the supply of about 600,000 tons of crude oil. [Text] [Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1800 GMT 15 Jan 82 NC]

ANKARA REJECTS GREEK PROTEST ON GUNBOAT PASSAGE

[Text] Turkey has rejected a protest note from Greece which considered it a violation of its territorial waters for a Turkish gunboat to pass between the islands of Evvoia and Andros. According to a statement issued by the Foreign Ministry, the Greek ambassador to Ankara, Papoulias, called on Foreign Ministry Secretary General Kamuran Gurun and told him that a Turkish gunboat had violated Greek territorial waters and that the Greek Government protested the action. The statement added: The Greek ambassador was told by the secretary general that the Turkish gunboat passed between Evvoia and Andros islands, using its right of innocent passage. Therefore it was absolutely not a violation of Greek territorial waters and the protest note was rejected.

KURDISH PARTY LEADER REPORTED ARRESTED IN EAST

TA152115 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 2100 GMT 15 Jan 82

[Text] The Turkish military government has arrested the leader of the Kurdish party, Nezim Ikilik, in the course of a raid by authorities on members of the Kurdish party in the eastern part of the country. Another 64 members of the party were arrested as well. In the last 9 months several hundred Kurds have been tried in Ankara. They were charged with attempting to establish an independent country, imposing terror in the villages and killing hundreds of persons.

Kurds Kill 12 Soldiers

NC161248 Beirut Voice of Lebanon in Arabic 1215 GMT 16 Jan 82

[Text] A Kurdish group has issued a statement in Beirut saying that its revolutionaries have recently killed 12 military personnel and wounded 18 others in clashes in the (Birsim) area. The statement accuses the Turkish Army of launching a war of extermination against the Kurds in eastern Turkey. Meanwhile, official Turkish sources said yesterday that the authorities have detained the secretary general of the Kurdestan Workers Party and 64 party members in eastern Turkey.

NEW NAVIGATION RULE FOR BOSPOROUS ANNOUNCED

LD151312 Ankara International Service in Turkish 1100 GMT 15 Jan 82

[Text] Regulations governing maritime traffic in the Bosporous have been amended. According to a statement issued by the Navigation, Hydrography and Oceanography Directorate of the Turkish Navy, current regulations which provide for sailing on the lefthand side in that sector of the Bosporous between a line running from Kizkulesi and Ortakoy, and a line between Tarabya Cape and the lighthouse on the Umuryeri bank will be abolished with effect from 1 May 1982. From that date onward, vessels sailing through the Bosporous will keep to the right of the center line of the Bosporous. Vessels will not overtake or change lanes until they leave the Bosporous. The new traffic regulations will take effect at 1200 on 1 May 1982.

TRADE WITH USSR TO REACH $600 MILLION IN 1982

[Text] The volume of trade between Turkey and the Soviet Union will be $600 million in 1982. The Turkish-Soviet negotiations which were held on the issue in Ankara have ended. A trade protocol will be signed tomorrow. Under the protocol, Turkey will buy diesel oil, fuel oil, raw materials for fertilizer, and electrical energy from the Soviet Union this year. The Soviet Union will buy livestock, citrus, nuts, dried figs, raisins, tobacco, semiprocessed metals, leather, textiles and cotton thread from Turkey.

LAMONTAGNE AFFIRMS 3 PERCENT BUDGET INCREASE

LD142006 Montreal Domestic Service in English 1900 GMT 14 Jan 82

[Text] The Canadian minister of national defense, Gilles Lamontagne, says Canada is upgrading her armed forces. Mr Lamontagne says NATO forces, of which Canada is a member, and forces of the Warsaw Pact are not evenly matched, and he and the chief of Canada's defense staff, Gen Ramsay Withers, had harsh words today for recent antinuclear protesters in Europe. Brian Callagher has the details:

[Begin recording] Mr Lamontagne told an armed forces conference in Ottawa today that while news reports concentrate on temporary problems in the armed forces such as boiler trouble with destroyers on the east coast, the fact is that Canada is on the way to re-equipping the forces by means of a 3 percent real growth in defense spending each year. But Mr Lamontagne says that while the West concentrated on detente in the early seventies, the Soviet Union built up its military forces to the point where a dreadful imbalance now exists. Mr Lamontagne says those who call for unilateral disarmement would do better to attend remembrance day ceremonies where they might learn a few facts about peace and war. And the chief of defense staff, Gen Ramsay Withers, reinforced that view by saying the Soviet buildup continues unabated. [end recording]

WILLOCH TO MEET UK'S THATCHER IN MARCH

PM151403 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 13 Jan 82 p 9

[Excerpt] Prime Minsiter Kaare Willoch has been invited to pay an official visit to Britain by his British counterpart, Margaret Thatcher. Willoch has accepted the invitation and is planning to make the visit before the end of March, although the date has not as yet been settled. Political talks will be on the agenda for this meeting between the leaders of the only two purely conservative governments in Europe. Before visiting Britain Prime Minsiter Willoch will have visited West Germany as the guest of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. This visit will take place in mid-February. The prime minister will also travel to Helsinki during the first week in March and will head the Norwegian delegation at the meeting of the Nordic Council.

TRADE UNION DELEGATES REFUSED POLISH VISAS

[Gunnar A. Johansen report]

[Excerpt] Trade Union Federation Chairman Tor Halvorsen and Trade Union Federation international section leader Kaare Sandegren have been refused visas to visit Poland. At the same time the Trade Union Federation leadership is undecided whether to go ahead with a visit to the Soviet Union planned for late January and early February. Tor Halvorsen and Kaare Sandegren applied to the Polish Embassy before Christmas for visas for a visit during the first half of this month. The two were to visit Poland as part of a large delegation organized by the European Trade Union Federation to look at conditions in the country since the introduction of martial law. Both Halvorsen and Sandegren were present at Solidarity's first national congress last fall. The idea was that several of the European trade union movement's top leaders would travel to Poland early this month. Trade union leaders from Central Europe have already been refused visas by the Polish embassies in their respective countries. Now the Norwegian Trade Union Federation has also been refused. The reason given was that the time is not right for such a visit.

KREISKY ILL WITH FLU; MISSES CABINET MEETING

[Erich Aichinger report on 19 January press conference following cabinet meeting]

[Excerpt] The main question at the press conference was: How is Chancellor Kreisky? In this context, rumors have spread that his illness is serious. Vice Chancellor Sinowatz said in this context:

[Begin recording] [Sinowatz] The chancellor has a cold. He has the flu.

[Question] How long will it last?

[Answer] Well, a few days, as it usually does with flu. With the weather we are having at present, a great number of Austrians have the flu just now. [end recording]

LARGE SAUDI LOAN EXPECTED; MINISTER IN VIENNA

AU191137 Vienna KRONEN-ZEITUNG in German 19 Jan 82 p 2

[Peter Gnam report]

[Text] Vienna -- Now the cat is out of the bag as to where Austria is to get the missing billions to fill the holes in the budget. According to Chancellor Kreisky, Finance Minister Salcher will negotiate this week in Vienna with the Saudi Arabian finance minister on receiving a loan of billions under favorable conditions. In a talk with KRONEN-ZEITUNG, Kreisky indicated that such a Saudi loan could amount to 5 - 15 billion schillings. The chancellor did not want to say anything on the conditions -- interest rate, duration -- "because all that will be negotiated by Salcher." Salcher himself was even more tight-lipped and altogether declined to comment.

At any rate, the deal is to be concluded directly between Austria and Saudi Arabia and not, for example, via Switzerland. It is hoped that more favorable conditions can be obtained that way. Kreisky, asked whether there are any political strings to the deal, said: "None at all. We surely will not get the money because we are such nice people, but because we have very good relations with them, because we enjoy a good reputation and because we are sound debtors." Moreover, Kreisky added, the French and Germans have also been granted loans by Saudi Arabia. If the deal works out, he said, there would be no need for us "to go begging anywhere else." The strictest security precautions have been taken for the visit of Saudi Arabian Finance Minister Shaykh al-Khayl.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORTS BAHA'I MINORITY IN IRAN

[Text] Vienna (APA) -- Austria has taken measures to alleviate the situation of the Baha'i in Iran, the country's largest religious minority. The Austrian Embassy in Tehran has been instructed "to express to the Iranian side at a suitable opportunity and in an effective manner Austria's strong interest in respecting human rights in Iran." This was stated in a reply by Foreign Minister Pahr to a written inquiry submitted by Nationalrat Deputy Hoechtl and other deputies.

PAHR TO BEGIN FAR EAST TOUR 20 JANUARY

[Summary] Foreign Minister Pahr will leave Wednesday for a 10-day trip to the Far East. He will pay official visits to Singapore, the Philippines and South Korea, to discuss with his hosts questions of international politics as well as possibilities of increasing bilateral trade and economic cooperation. Pahr will be accompanied by a large economic delegation, including representatives of the Voest-Alpine, Elin and Simmering-Graz-Pauker companies as well as bank representatives.

YUGOSLAV EXILES' DEATHS 'POSSIBLY POLITICAL'

[Text] Heilbronn/Stuttgart, 18 Jan (DPA) -- Three Yugoslav exiles were shot dead on Sunday night in Untergruppenback, near Heilbronn. According to the state prosecutor's office in Heilbronn, and the Land criminal investigation department of Baden-Wuerttemberg which was called in to investigate the crime, the attack may have a political or secret service background. Before he died, one of the victims blamed the Yugoslav secret service for the bloody crime. In spite of a large-scale police hunt there is no trace of the culprit or culprits.

According to the German security authorities, the dead men -- two of them were brothers -- were Yugoslav exiles all of whom were ethnic Albanians and who had opposed the political situation in Kosovo Province on the Albanian border and who had supported the establishment of an independent Kosovo republic. Their names were Bardhosh Gervalla (31), Jusuf Gervalla (36) and Zeka Kadri (28).

Jusuf Gervalla, who survived the attack for a few hours, had been in the FRG since December 1979 seeking asylum, according to the authorities. Both he had his brother had been accused by Yugoslav authorities of being a leading member of an organization aimed against Yugoslavia. Kadri, who had apparently been a radio and television journalist, had lived in Switzerland, where he had been granted political asylum.

HAIG SEEN AS 'A DIPLOMAT IN THE NUCLEAR AGE'

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "What Is at Stake for the Europeans"]

[Text] Brussels, January -- Reservation is called for in assessing NATO conferences. When the NATO Council meets and the ministers make agreements during personal meetings, the Atlantic world seems in order. It is always more difficult to formulate a communique which all partners believe they can sign. But generally "high Atlantic spirits" exist after a meeting.

That was also so on Monday. Matters looked different, however, by the weekend. The ministers have returned home, and the results of the supranational conference is now under pressure from national interests. Although it was stressed with satisfaction in Brussels that a common field of action had been outlined with regard to possible sanctions, a restriction contained in the communique is being pointed out everywhere: The Europeans insist that the Atlantic statement on Poland says that when it comes to imposing sanctions against Poland or the Soviet Union, every partner state can act according to its laws or the requirements of its national situation. The U.S. concept of using sanctions as an element of deterrence to stop any further deterioration of Polish freedom hardly has a chance of being implemented due to this attitude on the part of the European partners. All that exists for Washington is the agreement of its allies not to undermine sanction which another pact member wants to impose.

In his great speech Secretary of State Haig, who is an experienced Atlanticist, must have protectively anticipated the gradual wearing out of the NATO agreement achieved on Monday. He had carefully prepared his basic statement, which was intentionally read to the international press in Brussels. Alexander Haig was following Henry Kissinger in this respect. He had warned the Europeans 2 years ago by saying that there are limits to the U.S. willingness to defend Europe. We have learned that Haig's address was also supposed to be a kind of warning, but he made the content and the formulation dependant on the result of the special NATO session.

Since the U.S. delegation was quite content with the communique, they worked until 0200 on Haig's speech given Tuesday morning.

The speech reflected the relative agreement of the United States with Europe and the decisions arrived at the night before. After the special session, Haig spoke much more optimistically and positively than planned. And yet it is obvious for the attentive listener or reader that his address contained some hard formulations from the original version. The U.S. secretary of state said most clearly to the Europeans that the West tends to trust every new Marxist system and every red government. The West has been ignoring communist reality for 60 years; it was 20 years before the free world realized that the Stalinist system was a danger for freedom. Regardless of how many missile systems, nuclear weapons or tanks are being built by Moscow and regardless of whether the Kremlin oppresses East Germany, Hungary, Afghanistan and Poland, Western intellectuals will always find a new excuse for the communists and will use the term moderate for what is actually brutal subjugation.

Haig also turned out to be a diplomat in the nuclear age. He used arguments to justify his contempt for the incompetent economic system of Marxism-Leninism and its immorality. But he built a bridge of understanding to the other nuclear giant. He indicated that "President Reagan is prepared to go very far -- with regard to understanding -- if it becomes necessary." This speech was thus balanced in two ways: Haig indicated that he and his president generally agree with the Atlantic decisions of the past days, but that the West should particularly correct its assessment of the communist danger. He tells the Soviet Union that he holds it responsible for the Polish troubles, but that the United States would be prepared to discuss many things if the communist approach in Poland were changed. His demand that "action must be taken now," is addressed to the East as well as the West.

It must be mentioned in this connection that the European NATO partners should consider such a demand not as just a political remark. NATO is a military alliance. The United States is not only the leading political power of this alliance, it is the strongest military pillar of NATO. The planning and thinking of the Pentagon influences the strategic direction ordered by the President as the U.S. military commander in chief.

For months Washington has been discussing whether the so-called forward defense can be militarily maintained in Europe. The Atlantic planning aimed at maintaining a security position along the Iron Curtain is senseless when viewed from the operative angle. The Western divisions are lined up from north to south like a string of pearls, and units cannot operate in depth. The areas where they would concentrate are heavily populated and settled. The airfields are too close to the front, and the strategic unloading ports are located just a few hours by tank from the offensive units of a possible adversary.

It was the political demand of the Federal Republic to have a forward defense line which prompted the United States to station a whole army and highly sensitive air squadrons statically in a zone which can be successfully defended militarily only with mobile action. The preparedness of the United States to expose themselves here is simultaneously a political move with regard to the Belgians and the Netherlanders. They also derive great advantages from the so-called forward defense. For the French the geographic unity of West Germany and the Benelux states is an ideal strategic buffer zone. As long as defense will not take place on the Rhine but on the Elbe, Norway and Denmark can consider the U.S. divisions as political divisions of their security concepts.

Have the Europeans considered that Secretary of State Haig held his speech against this strategic background? With their claim for a special position in the alliance, have the Greeks considered that they can maintain their negative approach only as long as the U.S. 6th fleet remains present in the Mediterranean? Athens' action was particularly shocking in Brussels this time. The Papandreou government refused to hold the Soviets jointly responsible for the military dictatorship in Poland. It also protected the totalitarian Russian system against moral condemnation by liberal states. In doing this, the Greeks cannot withdraw to their usual chauvinist protective position, namely the thesis that the Turks are their actual enemies.

In its independent action following Monday's special session, Athens has acted as the socialist government which of all NATO members depends the most on the leftist radicals in its own party and on the communists in the trade union. If NATO does not want to deteriorate to the point of the United Nations, it must make it clear to this uncertain partner that the supranational interests of 14 other nations have priority over Greek national interests.

MEDIA FIGURES CRITICAL OF U.S. POLISH POLICY

DW191213 [Editorial Report] In light of recent events in Poland and the resulting U.S. sanctions, press reaction has been heavy and some anti-U.S. sentiments have been expressed.

This is reflected by the reaction of readers of the Hamburg weekly DER SPIEGEL. In letters to the editor published in the 18 January issue, readers sharply take the United States to task. A reader from Frankfurt warns that anyone endorsing sanctions now is "leading the way to developments which will end in nuclear war," a war which "nicely enough" might be localized in Europe. Another letter writer accuses the United States of being guilty "of deceitful hypocrisy" in Poland's case because Washington "supports the torturing military dictatorship in Turkey," and another reader adds that "in El Salvador there is torture and murder with U.S. arms and military assistance. Within a 2-year period 30,000 people have been killed. About 600,000 people have fled."

A reader from Berlin draws a harsh parallel: "The trade union shook the long-standing dictatorship and a return to democracy seemed possible. However a group of military men staged a putsch, a group which is directly subordinated to the great-power army. Under the eyes of the latter, the soldiers commited massacres against hundreds of citizens, and thousands are arrested and placed into a camp. The leader of the putsch is received with great pomp by the great power three-quarters of a year later. The name of the small country is South Korea (in the summer of 1980), that of the great power is not hard to guess: the United States."

"If hypocrisy constituted a criminal offense," another reader writes, "Ronald Reagan would find himself behind bars." A reader in Gummersbach thinks that "what matters to Reagan is his life's dream: playing the lead role of the gunslinging sheriff on the great world stage. Canada, Japan, England, France, Italy, the CDU and the CSU provide the choir, staring with fascination at the judge's 1,000 boots, murmuring yes, yes, yes, yes to everything."

A reader from Warstein maintains that "what matters to U.S. policy is not Poland, but the curtailment of European sovereignty. It needs causes for confrontation rather than the continuation of the reform course in Poland." A letter writer from Muenster wonders why 'Bonapartism' in the East bloc was not equated to that in the West, because "in the countries of southern Europe -- Portugal, Spain, Greece, Turkey -- the military held or holds a dominant position. Does 'Bonapartism' stop when a U.S. four-star general becomes U.S. scretary of state of the United States?"

In an article on page 26 of the same issues, DER SPIEGEL publisher Rudolf Augstein declares that anyone who "seriously and comprehensively institutes sanctions against Poland and because of Poland" is challenging the Soviet system to a fight for life or death "whether he is aware of this or not." It is unimportant whether this war would be "comprehensive" -- the Germans definitely would be "lying under the debris." Augstein implies that the United States provoked Pearl Harbor and thus war with Japan, saying: "During the confrontation of 1941 between the United States and Japan, the island state was the expanding power, the 'aggressor.' Options for understanding did not yet seem exhausted. Yet Roosevelt's government no longer wanted understanding. Through Japan it wanted to enter the war against Hitler (and perhaps DER SPIEGEL has this will to thank for its existence). This is why Roosevelt kept tightening the economic screws until the explosion came in Pearl Harbor."

Augstein, who notes that the nuclear bomb lies between Roosevelt and Brezhnev now and that ultimately "you cannot 'punish' a nuclear world power," asks: "Where does the United States in particular get the right to punish those governing in Poland and the people at the same time?"

On the subject of U.S.-FRG relations, Heinz Barth, DIE WELT correspondent in the United States, has begun a three-part series of articles in which he looks into the causes of the discord between the FRG and the United States. In the first installment published by DIE WELT on 16-17 January on page 6, Barth writes that President Kennedy, having been bluffed by Khrushchev over the German issue, "contributed to the alienation" between Germans and Americans. After the "depressing experiences of 13 August," the construction of the Berlin Wall, "it was no longer possible for Bonn-Washington relations to revert to what they had been before." Barth maintains that "to this day" the United States has failed to comprehend what a "momentous event" it was when Adenauer decided to tie Germany to the West. It was "a radical repudiation of all principles of German foreign policy" of historical standing, namely, playing East against West in view of the vulnerability of its borders. Barth comes to the conclusion that "against the background of an irrational anti-Americanism which has split the Social Democrats and made the wavering coalition unsure of itself, the tensions between NATO's leading member and its previously most reliable ally in Europe have become permanent."

In his second article, published by the paper on 19 January, on page 6, Barth expresses the belief that "the anti-Americanism sweeping Germany is internationally directed," pointing out that this has caught "the mass of the Americans" completely unawares to the point that they just cannot explain "what happened with the Germans who irritated Kennedy so much because they could not live without daily manifestations of grace." What they now see is "a chancellor who would best like to play arbiter between East and West" and hooligans "chasing U.S. GI's through the streets." There is also the DER SPIEGEL publisher who irks even socialists of other European countries by "charging Reagan with 'blind aggression' because of his attitude toward the Polish issue."

Barth says that U.S. policy on Germany has definitely not done any "building for the future," having been satisfied with limited solutions on a "case by case basis" for lack of a coherent world-political concept. However, "the disappointment of the United States is nearly boundless because the Germans, who of all people they believed to be most reliable, have become the protagonists of the anti-U.S. campaign in Europe." It is surprising, Barth says, that this disappointment has not yet turned into "another wave of isolationism."

POSSIBLE FRG-GDR DISARMAMENT INITIATIVE VIEWED

[Hans-Michael Rathert editorial: "Passing a Taboo"]

[Text] Perhaps in the near future we will see two German foreign ministers appearing hand-in-hand before an international audience to make a joint suggestion about how to best defuse a few mines on the generally approved path toward disarmament. This would cause excitement in cabinets and papers. Under the disguise of doing a good deed, Messrs Genscher (West) and Fischer (East) are about to undertake a policy which can be seen as German policy or Central European policy, depending on how you look at it.

It has been reported that the GDR foreign minister recently agreed to a plan thought up by his Bonn colleague. A quick look into the book on German-German behavior shows that something new is really in the offing here. Both sides dare to start up something which up to now has been blocked by taboos and reservations. Up until now they have been most careful in East Berlin not to become engaged in any activity with an all-German appearance out of fear that the laboriously achieved reputation of having their own state would be called in question again. As you can read in NEUES DEUTSCHLAND regularly, the special relations negotiated in the treaties with the East, according to which the Federal Republic must not consider its neighbor as a foreign country, constantly hurt their self-confidence.

The opportunity to work with the real Bonn foreign minister instead of the unloved minister for inner-German relations, Egon Franke, probably was a successful lure in overcoming the fear of being touched and in agreeing to Genscher's offer of a common disarmament initiative.

However such activities are also not easy to initiate in Bonn. According to existing doctrine, the minister for inner-German relations is responsible whenever the GDR is involved, and not the foreign minister -- the opposition and Axel Springer watch out for that. Hans-Dietrich Genscher had to concentrate on disarmament, a field where he bears responsibility, to be able to correspond as one foreign minister to another. In order to be absolutely careful diplomatically, Egon Franke was hired as a high-ranking mailman -- he is supposed to deliver the mail in East Berlin.

However, this caution will probably not suffice once the project has become ready, once the two foreign ministers must visit with each other personally to give the matter a final touch and once a German-German initiative is presented on the international stage for the first time in postwar history. At the latest the alarm will go off first time in some capitals at that point.

The ticklish thing about this is that due to its painful experiences the world believes it can live more safely if the Germans are quarreling rather than agreeing. It is certainly not just an accident that reports on an exchange of letters between Fischer and Genscher seemed just worth a few lines to the German press, while French journalists were immediately worried, and were asking about the background of all this.

The Federal Government will have to think up quite a few things to calm down the anxious people because the second wave of speculation on neutralization which was launched in recent weeks particularly in Paris and Washington could endanger the action which is supposed to be a simple treatment of disarmament.

That would be a pity with regard to disarmament and the concept of being able to cooperate more productively in the heart of Central Europe. Foreign fears that peacefully cooperating Germans must be handled with care are unreal and even absurd. As matters stand, the Fischer-Genscher procedure will certainly not end in an all-German embrace. History cannot be corrected that simply.

But certainly common interests exist for both German states, thanks to their geographic location and their leading positions in their respective alliances. These tasks can possibly be better solved together on an international level. Only interests can be involved which do not run basically against those of the two big powers. But these can still be problems which are most urgent for us in West Germany and East Germany, but for which the big powers do not have the proper feeling because of their big power attitude.

ROCKETS FIRED AT NUCLEAR BREEDER REACTOR SITE

[Excerpt] Grenoble, France, 19 Jan (AFP) -- Five rockets rained down last night on the site of what will be the world's largest nuclear breeder reactor in the southeastern French town of Creys-Malville, but barely scratched the structure, officials said today.

No injuries were reported at the reactor plant, which is still under construction. Twenty people, mainly guards, were reported working at the site when the rockets struck shortly before midnight. One person was standing only about 20 meters (yards) from where one of the projectiles landed.

Personnel on the site said they had heard five explosions. One guard said he saw the sky light up above the Rhone River, as if fireworks were being set off on the other side. Responsibility for the blast was claimed by an anonymous male caller to AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE. He did not name the group he represented, but said it was "ecologist and pacifist." He added that the group had taken every precaution to ensure that no one would be hurt.

Construction of the plant, which is designed to withstand the impact of a crashing jet-liner, will continue at the same pace, officials said. The Creys-Malville plant will be one of the world's most advanced when it is completed two years from now. Known as a Super-Phoenix breeder reactor, it is considered by experts as an industrial prototype.

[Text] Grenoble, southeast France, 19 Jan (AFP) -- The anti-tank rocket launcher used in an attack on the Crey-Malville nuclear power station last night was of Soviet manufacture, an official source said today. The source said at the Phoenix station that the rocket launcher was a 1960's 60-mm model, and added that a spent rocket casing found outside the power station was marked in Cyrillic lettering.

MITTERRAND MEETS WITH WEST BANK MAYORS 18 JAN

[Text] Paris, 18 Jan (AFP) -- President Francois Mitterrand had a 45-minute meeting here today with the Palestinian mayors of Hebron and Halhul, both expelled from the Israeli-occupied West Bank. Hebron Mayor Fahd al-Qawasimah said afterward that he and Halhul Mayor Muhammad Milhim discussed with Mr Mitterrand "the Palestinian cause" and the case of their own expulsion.

Mr Mitterrand, he said, had promised to do his utmost to ensure that they returned to their cities and also to ensure the return of peace to the Middle East. The two mayors siad they were convinced that in his forthcoming visit to Israel, Mr Mitterrand would reiterate his position on the Palestine issue.

They were not accompanied in their visit by the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) representative in Paris, Ibrahim Sus, but this did not mean, Mr al-Qawasimah said, that they contested the PLO's representativeness. "Our visit to Paris," he said, "was the result of personal initiative. Our attachment to the PLO has been manifest."

TUNISIA'S MZALI MEETS MITTERRAND, COMMENTS

NC152224 Paris AFP in English 2203 GMT 15 Jan 82

[Text] Paris, 15 Jan (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand will officially visit Tunisia during 1982, Tunisian Prime Minister Mohamed Mzali said here today. Mr Mzali, who made the announcement following a meeting and lunch with Mr Mitterrand, said discussions centered on the Middle East, relations with northern African countries and the Western Saharan issue. He said that the Western Saharan issue was discussed in "an optimistic perspective" and that both countries were maintaining efforts to try to find a peaceful solution to the situation. He described bilateral relations as "satisfactory" and the talks as "cordial and friendly."

SIBERIAN GAS TALKS WITH SOVIET UNION RESUME

[Text] Paris, 18 Jan (AFP) -- Franco-Soviet negotiations on the "deal of the century" for the delivery of Siberian natural gas resumed today and will probably last to the end of the week, Gaz de France sources said here today. The location of the talks, somewhere in France, are being kept secret. The two sides have already agreed in general that the Soviets will deliver 8,000 million cubic metres of Siberian gas to France each year for 25 years, starting in 1984. They are now wrestling with the price.

The West German firm Ruhrgas signed a gas contract with the Soviets last November for which the price, although undisclosed, is believed to be around five dollars for a million British Thermal Units (BTU's). West Germany is due to receive about 10,500 million cubic metres of Siberian gas a year, Italy about 8,500 million cubic metres, and Austria, the Netherlands, Belgium and Switzerland about 12,000 million cubic metres.

Several French companies have also won contracts worth more than 3,500 million francs (about 500 million dollars) for the building of a gas pipeline from Siberia to West Europe nearly 5,000 kms (3,000 miles) long. The Gaz de France sources denied that the French Government had put any pressure on it to reduce the scope of gas purchases, depsite the United States opposition to the deal. It is widely expected that the United States will use the Coordination Committee for the Multilateral Control of Exports to COMECON countries (COCOM) to pressure West Europe to reduce economic links with the Soviet Union. COCOM meets here tomorrow.

LE MONDE ON FIRST MONTH OF MARTIAL LAW IN POLAND

FN141707 Paris LE MONDE in French 14 Jan 82 p 1

[Editorial: "A Month of Martial Law in Poland"]

[Text] It is 1 month since the cloak of martial law came down over Poland. It is 1 month since men and women accused of nothing more than involvement in trade union activity began to be imprisoned. It is 1 month since the second biggest army in the socialist camp was called upon to win a victory over a large section of its own people. It is 1 month since the many difficulties of daily life in a country with a ruined economy were worsened by the frequently intolerable constraints of martial law. It is 1 month since communism took the form of a junta over a developed society.

When he installed his military council on 13 December General Jaruzelski was able to say that his country was on the edge of the abyss. But was there really a threat of civil war, as he claimed? There is nothing to confirm that diagnosis.

Solidarity's most "extremist" members were certainly not calling for an armed revolt. They were not even challenging the agreements reached during the war, notably at Yalta, which forced the Poles to be the USSR's friends. But those agreements left it up to the sovereign people to choose the men to whom they wished to entrust their future through free elections. Is it adventurist to finally demand the implementation of those agreeements?

It is obvious that the Jaruzelski solution is not the worst of all those which can be envisaged. But at different stages of its history People's Poland has already had the "best" of the possible leaders.

General Jaruzelski may be sincere when he says that he is determined to create the right conditions for "national accord." Perhaps those of his aides who envisage the reemergence of an independent trade union including many of the Solidarity leaders are also sincere.

But for the time being the government has imprisoned the partners on which it ought to rely, at least if it is anxious to bring about "national accord." It may seek cooperation from the Catholic Church; but the Episcopate is refusing the open basic negotiations until martial law is lifted and as long as dissidents are imprisoned.

The primate has certainly not preached active resistance or pronounced the radical condemnation which some people expected. Nor has he asked his flock to take the oath of loyalty which the government is demanding. Do it if by so doing you avoid the worst, and do it in the knowledge that it has no importance, since a declaration obtained under pressure is worthless: that was what Monsignor Glemp said in his Epiphany sermon.

With Solidarity decapitated, the church now remains the only institutional obstacle to normalization, but it is an obstacle which once again prevents orthodox, hardline communists from following their path. It is difficult to see how the government can break that force which many Poles, whether believers or not, see as the repository of national legitimacy in the tragic circumstances. General Jaruzelski's only hope is not to be honored as a savior but to avoid being regarded by the Catholic heirarchy as less legitimate or more legitimate than his predecessors, once martial law is lifted.

WEST'S 'CONFUSION' OVER POLAND DEPLORED

[Max Clos article]

[Excerpts] It happened during the night of 12-13 December. A month, a year ago. It took just a few hours to completely stop a diffident rise of freedom. Poland has been "normalized." Order prevails and will undoubtedly continue to prevail in Warsaw. Who will mention the coup in 6 months' time? Who still mentions Afghanistan?

What is the free world doing? It is deploring. President Reagan has decided to impose economic sanctions, but his European allies have merely uttered a few words suited to the occasion while refusing to join in because such sanctions "would be ineffective," and also because some contracts could be lost. The European Ten have expressed their "complete disapproval" and the 15 NATO countries have "condemned."

Mr Mitterand has indicated -- true, before anyone else -- "his strong disapproval." Two years have elapsed since the West stated that the invasion of Afghanistan by Soviet troops was "unacceptable." Now Soviet indirect intervention in Poland is called "reprehensible." The free world is certainly showing muscle...General Haig has stated that "the history of Europe has taught us that the greatest mistake you can make when confronted by a powerfully armed aggressor is to ignore violations of international agreements and behave as if nothing had happened."

Indeed, why is Europe behaving "as if nothing had happened?" Because of fear, undoubtedly, which is not necessarily very profitable. But that fear is concealed behind a bogus political analysis which can be summarized as follows: the East bloc, the neutralists point out, is in no way a monolith; it is crisscrossed by various -- nationalist, religious and philosophical -- currents, all of which are leavening elements of disintegration; it is our interest to encourage them.

In order to do this we must, above all, not break with the communists but, on the contrary, develop contacts at all levels to enable enslaved peoples to breathe the air of freedom. In this way we will succeed in developing reformist centers which will eventually undermine the bloc from the inside. Examples: Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Poland.

But, as always, facts have to be reckoned with. Whether in Budapest, Prague or Warsaw, how have things ended every time? The rebellion has been crushed. The West thought that Solidarity had shattered the Polish state apparatus, the party, the army and the police. But what did we see? As soon as Moscow reached the conclusion that enough was enough, that very same, obviously undamaged, state apparatus went on the offensive and everything was crushed during one night. The evidence presented by the advocates of detente has not been very convincing with respect to this point, just as it has not been with respect to some others.

So? So as far as Poland is concerned, this is the end. So there are four Communist ministers in the French Government. The deputy leader of the PS suspects them of preparing our country's "Finlandization." The president censures him and states that France "speaks about these problems with one voice."

It is the voice of confusion.

MITTERRAND'S ISRAEL TRIP ENTAILS 'DOUBLE RISK'

[Editorial: "The Israeli Risk"]

[Text] By announcing on 15 January that he will go to Israel at the beginning of March, Mitterrand caused some surprise. When, on 20 December, he confirmed that this trip, originally planned for 10 February, was to be postponed, the government announced that the question would be reexamined "at the end of the debates due to take place in the United Nations" on the annexation of Golan by Israel. Now these debates have not ended but have merely been suspended since the defection by Panama, which reneged on its decision to vote for the sanctions against Jerusalem, led the Arabs to withdraw their draft resolution. And one cannot help noting Paris' alacrity in announcing the new date for the trip to Israel several hours before this false "result" was known.

One can probably argue that matters had been clarified by the recent debates: France in any case had already decided to abstain over sanctions against the Jewish state. But one might have thought at one time that Paris was going to choose a different path: Mitterrand might have waited until the Jewish state had evacuated the whole of the Sinai, that is the end of April, before going to Israel. With this goodwill gesture to compensate somewhat for the gratuitous provocation of the annexation of Golan, a new era might have begun. In particular the choice of a later date would have increased the pressures being brought to bear on Begin from all sides to comply with this Camp David promise.

But none of this happened and the government is thus running a double risk: the risk of having to note the continued presence of Israeli forces in Sinai even after giving Israel the great satisfaction of receiving its first French head of state; and the risk of henceforth causing dissatisfaction to certain Arab states for reasons which are not perfectly clear. Some, for example, will not fail to see in this an internal French political act on the eve of important byelections.

The reply will certainly be made that Begin's present attitude makes the evacuation of the Sinai in April very likely (The Israeli cabinet was moreover due to make a final decision this Sunday on European participation in the peacekeeping force in the region) and also that there is no "right time" to make the trip to Jerusalem. There is nothing to indicate, for example, that the Israeli head of government will not make new "attempts" at the end of April or the beginning of May precisely to get his ultimate concession to Egypt accepted among his supporters. Moreover French diplomacy no doubt considered that it ought not suspend its activity in the Near East, which will comprise several gestures toward Arab countries, for more than 4 months because of this hinderance.

Fitting precisely into this context is the audience which Mitterrand will grant on Monday to two West Bank mayors expelled by Israel -- yet another "first" because the two men have never before been received by a Western head of state. In the same way one might expect that the preparations and dates for the president's trip to Tunisia will be settled and announced in the next few weeks. But a little more will be needed to get certain Arab governments to swallow the bitter "pill" which this trip to Israel represents for them, less than 3 months after the latest fait accompli in Golan.

TWO PHONE CALLS 18 JAN CLAIM DOZIER KILLED

[Text] Verona, 19 Jan (ANSA) -- Investigators were carefully checking out the reliability of two telephone calls last night that claimed that kidnapped U.S. General James Lee Dozier had been killed. The calls, both claiming to be messages from the Red Brigades terrorist organization, gave different versions as to where the alleged corpse of the general, a high-ranking NATO officer, was to be found.

The first call came into the GAZZETTINO daily in Venice. A male voice with a southern accent said that Dozier's body could be found near Verona, the city from where he has kidnapped by the Red Brigades on December 17 of last year.

The second call arrived some time later to the ANSA office in Florence. This time the caller said that Dozier has been executed and his body left on a road on the city's outskirts. However, police combing the area surrounding Florence found no trace of the kidnap victim.

This is not the first time in this case however, that there has been a call announcing Dozier's death which later proved to be a hoax.

As investigations continued, an anti-terrorism official in Verona told newsmen that a new stage has opened up in the case. He added that he was confident that positive results would soon be reached in the probe.

According to leaks here, the new turn in the investigations were the result of information acquired in Rome after the arrest of around a dozen Red Brigades members. It was also noted that house-to-house searches, roadblocks, and car and document checks had visibly slowed Monday after 32 days of intense activity.

The police also said that they believed they had identified three members of the commando group that nabbed the general from his Verona apartment. The trio were said to already be on the wanted list for subversive activity.

PAKISTANI PRESIDENT RECEIVED BY PERTINI

LD181852 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1600 GMT 18 Jan 82

[Text] The president of Pakistan, General Ziaul Haq, has been received at the Quirinal Palace by President Pertini. During their talks they discussed international topics, with special reference to Afghanistan and to the question of aid for refugees from that country. They also examined possibilities for bilateral cooperation.

Spadolini Speaks at Dinner

[Text] Rome, 19 Jan (ANSA) -- Pakistan President General Mohammed Ziaul Haq is scheduled to participate here today in the assembly of the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) and will be received in Vatican City by Pope John Paul II before he leaves for Bucharest on Wednesday.

Zia is in Rome on a three-day official visit in which he has had talks with head-of-state Sandro Pertini, Premier Giovanni Spaolini, and other leaders.

Yesterday Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo discussed the international situation, and especially developments in the Mideast and in southern Asia, with his Pakistani counterpart Aga Shahi who is accompanying Zia on his visit.

At a dinner in honor of the Pakistan visitors, Spadolini underscored the "generous assistance" that the Islamabad government has given to Afghani refugees. It is believed that there are currently two-and-a half million Afghanis in Pakistan.

Spadolini said that Italy stood ready to increase its financial and technical assistance to Pakistan to further that country's economic and social development programs. He stressed the Italian conviction that no political model or development project could take precedence, however, over the need for absolute respect for the values of democracy, justice and progress and the full recognition of human and civil rights; a position, he said, that explains Italy's firm deploration of events in Poland.

Italy also strongly favors cooperation with Third World countries and the creation of a new world economic order, he said.

The Italian premier voiced deep concern over certain crisis situations in the world, and especially the one in Afghanistan which has at its basis the Soviet military presence and behavior contrary to the determination of peoples and the United Nations Charter.

Two years after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan the numerous appeals from the United Nations, the Islamic conference, the Nonaligned Movement and the European Economic Community have gone unheeded, the premier lamented.

IRANIAN ECONOMIC GROUP ARRIVES FOR TALKS IN ROME

[Excerpt] Rome, 19 Jan (ANSA) -- Iran is ready to increase its oil exports to Italy in exchange for a vast series of accords in all economic sectors including industry, energy, agriculture and banking systems. With this in mind a large delegation of Tehran government officials arrived in Rome Monday for talks with Italian leaders. This is the first such visit here by an Iranian delegation since the revolution that deposed the shah of Iran.

The group is being led by the budget and programming minister, Mohammad Taqi Banki, who will have talks with Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and Industry Minister Giovanni Marcora, among others.

During a press conference here right after his arrival, Banki said that Iran will offer Italy ample opportunities for bilateral accords that will enable the west Asian country to rebuild its autonomous economy without influence from either the East or the West. This offer was being made because Italy, despite American pressures, has maintained friendly relations with Iran in the three years following the revolution, Banki said.

Iran 'Replanning Economy'

LD182240 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 18 Jan 82

[Text] Iran will supply Italy with all the oil it needs in exchange for industrial supplies. This will probably be the formula that the Iranian delegation which arrived in Rome today, led by Mohammad Banki, minister of state in charge of budget planning, will submit to the discussion to be held with our economic ministers. We regard Italy as a friendly country which has always maintained excellent relations with us, the Iranian minister said during a press conference. Iran is currently trying to replan its entire economy according to medium and long term programs, that is, 5 and 50 years respectively.

EANES MAY RESIGN IF CONSTITUTION CHANGED

[Excerpts] In today's DIARIO DE LISBOA presidential spokesman Joaquim Letria confirmed, point by point, the reports carried last week by this station and by our Spanish counterpart concerning the possibility of the president's resignation, his nomination of a presidential candidate, the setting up of a political party under Eanes's leadership and his resulting candidacy as prime minister in the event of winning the lesiglative elections to be held after his resignation.

The permanent committees of the Social Democratic Party [PSD] and Socialist Party met today. These were scheduled meetings but the reports from Belem [the presidential palace] dominated the agendas.

Through the voice of the PSD spokesman Dr Nascimento Rodrigues, here is the reaction of the PSD. [Begin Rodrigues recording] Firstly, the PSD takes the view that the announcement of the possible resignation of the president in the event of a hypothetical reduction of his presidential powers in the context of the current revision of the constitution amounts to exerting illegitimate anti-democratic pressure on the members of parliament.

If the presidential spokesman invokes the context in which the president was elected as an argument to limit the freedom of action of the deputies with constituent powers, this means that he deems the result of the presidential elections as superseding that of the legislative ones. This would reflect an identity of views with the position advocated, since the presidential elections, by the Portuguese Communist Party, a notion that none of the democratic parties has ever embraced.

There is no provision in the Portuguese democratic and constitutional system for the nomination of a president by a former president. In addition, the candidacy to prime minister is the result of a nomination by the party or parties that polled the highest vote. Admitting the possibility that the statements made by the presidencial spokesman, by virtue of their anti-democratic and destabilizing character, may have constituted a clear abuse of his functions, the PSD therefore expects the president to rectify them and duly enlighten the country as to his position. In this context, and for this very same purpose, the PSD has deemed it necessary to request an urgent audience with the president. [end recording]

Further Details

[Excerpt] Lisbon, 18 Jan (AFP) -- Mr Letria's statement was considered a warning to the ruling center-right not to go too far in revising the constitution, observers said. The revision of the constitution, in the view of the left opposition, goes back on many gains of the 1974 revolution that overthrew the right-wing dictatorship of Marcelo Caetano.

It calls for a significantly reduced role for the president, ending his rights to dismiss the government -- except under exceptional circumstances -- and to refuse to carry out the government's laws. More significantly, the new constitution would deny the president the right to select military leaders -- a change which would favor the intentions of "those who never accepted the revolution," according to some political circles and in particular the communists. The new constitution would require support from two-thirds of the 250-seat parliament in order to be approved. Consequently, a compromise between the governing center-right and the opposition Socialist Party would have to be achieved to approve the constitution by April 25.

CALVO-SOTELO INTERVIEWED ON TIES WITH TUNISIA

PM131645 Tunis L'ACTION in French 23 Dec 81 p 6

[Unattributed interview with Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo at end of his 18-21 December visit to Tunisia]

[Text] [Question] We see few examples of Spanish-Tunisian cooperation in everyday life.

After your visit, should we expect more, Mr Prime Minister, and of what kind?

[Answer] Cooperation between the two countries, as much from the political as from the cultural viewpoint, has developed magnificently well and has had very positive effects.

Economic and technical cooperation has increased considerably of late and, after the meeting of the mixed commission in June 1981, it clearly has a very promising future, which will be consolidated and will extend to the ministerial level which we foresee at present, the results will be studied when the Tunisian prime minister visits Spain around July 1982.

[Question] Spain's entry into the EEC...: Are our countries' interests not contradictory?

[Answer] Not only will Spain's entry into the EEC not be at variance with the Maghreb's interests but, quite the contrary, this region, and Tunisia in particular, will find in Spain an ally to defend their interests within that international organization.

[Question] Spain is to be a member of NATO. Why? What has Spain to gain? How has this decision been received in your country, Mr Prime Minister?

[Answer] What I have just said can likewise be applied to Spain's entry into NATO and has already been explained in the message which our secretary of state for foreign affairs sent to the Tunisian foreign minister a few months ago.

[Question] How could Spain, a sure friend of Arab countries, express this friendship in concrete form on the international plane?

[Answer] What I have just said also answers that question. Eternal friendship, common interests -- stemming from the fact that ours are both Mediterranean countries -- as well as political, economic and social interests, will find in Spain a sure ally, although Tunisia, by virtue of its acknowledged position in all international forums, already has a presence of its own and carries a certain weight which makes it respected by all.

The signing in Tunis of the document recognizing the Arab League bureau in Madrid as an embassy, with all attendant rights, is another step in these difficult times toward the full recognition of Arab rights in all the problems of the Middle East and the Mediterranean.

BRIEFS

NEW POLITICAL PARTY — In Madrid today former Minister of Justice Francisco Fernandez Ordonez opened the headquarters of his new party -- Democratic Action. At the ceremony Fernandez Ordonez said that his social democratic party is not functioning in 36 provinces. At the present time, Democratic Action has three priority aims: to obtain its own parliamentary group in congress, since at the moment it is included within the centrist group; to hold its first congress, beginning on 26 March; and to maintain contacts with social democrats in other countries. JORGENSEN PRESENTS PROGRAM TO FOLKETING

[Lisbeth Knudsen report]

[Text] Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen yesterday appealed for cooperation with both the right and the left in the Folketing chamber when he presented the minority Social Democratic government's program to the Folketing. The prime minister dealt almost exclusively with Denmark's competitiveness and with the employment situation in his speech. The proposals the government is putting forward without any form of safety net in the Folketing are all in close agreement with the Social Democratic Party-Danish Trade Union Federation plan of action, on which the party compaigned in the November election last year.

"The advice given to the queen pointed to a Social Democratic government as the solution which would have the best parliamentary chances," the prime minister said in his speech. He did not mention the internal Social Democratic deliberations about whether the party should go into opposition.

Of the financial reforms which toppled the government in November because of a Radical Liberal amendment the prime minister said,"It is still the view of the government that such a reform could be based on voluntary agreements on the deployment of funds from the considerable amount of pension and insurance capital. A precondition for this could be that steps will have to be taken to prevent strain being put on competitiveness by passing legislation for certain minor areas."

The main theme of the prime minister's speech was unemployment -- particularly unemployment among young people. Anker Jorgensen presented the financial reform as a means of easing unemployment in the construction industry and giving support to the crisis-striken agricultural industry. For industry and commerce as a whole he promised continued tax relief and various measures to improve growth. One of the direct job creation initiatives mentioned by the prime minister was an expansion of the government's youth guarantee arrangements.

"The government's clear goal is that it should be possible to offer all young people either a job or a place in further education in the course of this year or next year, so that by the end of 1983 a nationwide youth guarantee will have been created," the prime minister said. In addition he promised a guarantee for the necessary number of teaching and training posts, the reintroduction of job creation arrangements, improved support for education and an investigation of the population's working hours with a view to implementing a reduction in working time. Finally the prime minister promised an investigation of the attitude of the Folketing to compulsory profit sharing.

"The government presents its proposals to the Folketing in the hope that parties both to the right and to the left of the chamber will enter into realistic cooperation," the prime minister concluded.

Nonsocialists Attack

PM190841 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 13 Jan 82 p 7

[Lisbeth Knudsen report]

[Text] The government is now putting forward the same policies which were rejected by the old Folketing and which the electorate rejected in the election in December.

This is the view of the four nonsocialist parties which formed the nonsocialist government alternative -- the Liberals, Conservatives, Center Democrats and the Christian People's Party -- to the prime minister's inaugural declaration to the Folketing yesterday. The government's cooperation partner, the Radical Liberal Party, considers the speech to be sufficiently conciliatory for cooperation to be possible.

"The prime minister's speech was conciliatory -- as it should be for a minority government without parliamentary agreements on any side," the Radical Liberal Folketing group said in a commentary. Conservative Group Chairman Poul Schlueter said, "It was a very weak opening speech from a very weak government. The coming few weeks will show whether the government will stick to its intention of forming a majority with the Socialist People's Party and the Radical Liberals and whether the four nonsocialist parties can win influence. It is only the latter which could give any firmness and stability."

Liberal Chairman Henning Christophersen said, "Perhaps the most striking thing about the speech was that it did not devote a single word to what the government intends to do about the evergrowing deficit in the national budget. It is worrying that the prime minister is not worried any more."

Christian People's Party Group Chairman Christian Christensen said that the prime minister's speech underlined the government's impossible parliamentary situation. He pointed out that the prime minister is still talking about legislation to interfere in pension funds and insurance companies, even though the government was toppled over this question in November.

NATO STATEMENT ON POLAND SETS CLEAR GOALS

[Editorial: "The Call to Poland"]

[Text] Western policy with regard to the Polish crisis got on the right track yesterday with the declaration from the extraordinary meeting of the NATO Council. The last few weeks' distracting tactical disagreements about sanctions now or later seem to have been removed with the unanimous call for the lifting of martial law in Poland as a precondition for continued Western support. Implicit in this call is the threat of serious economic sanctions which will also hit the Soviet Union if the Polish authorities do not release the interned trade union members and enter into free negotiations with the church and Solidarity for a new national concordat.

With the declaration from the NATO meeting Western policy has once again been given a goal. The weakness of the U.S. sanctions announced just after Christmas was that their political aim was not clearly defined. Their random nature gave no explanation of what precisely it was that they were supposed to achieve. It was almost as if they gave expression to a mood of general protest. They did not make it sufficiently clear what steps the Soviet Union should take to have the restrictions lifted again. As joint Western policy has now been formulated in the declaration from NATO's foreign ministers, the call for the return to normalcy in Poland, for the release of prisoners and for the resumption of negotiations has been made into clear conditions which must be met if the West is to continue to be able to cooperate in order to prevent Poland's financial collapse.

A month after the announcement of martial law General Jaruzelski and his national council have taken only modest steps toward normalizing conditions in Poland. Small adjustments of extremely limited scope have been made in certain fields and in certain areas. But in all essential respects the Polish people are being held fast in a vise of prohibitions. Every night the population is locked into its homes, and every day it is herded inside the towns without any form of social contact across the country. It is possible that General Jaruzelski will show the way back to normal conditions when he goes before parliament next week for the first time since the coup. And it is to be hoped that he will present a program which will give us reason to believe that he will once again steer a course toward a state of peace while guaranteeing the established freedoms of Polish citizens. But he will be met with doubt until there is something which can be seen as a pledge that his promises will become reality.

Europe has shown understanding and patience beyond measure with the Polish military regime, to a certain extent because of the view that Jaruzelski is a Polish soldier who wished to save his country from a Russian invasion. The NATO declaration must convince him that this patience is now exhausted and that no further respite can be given for the fulfillment of the promise of a return to a state of greater freedom.

Check Count Underway

LD190936 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0800 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Text] The check count of the results of the presidential Electoral College elections began this morning.

The Ministry of Justice points out that the results of last night's preliminary count may still change after the check has been carried out. The check count will take a few days, and the final result of the Electoral College elections will be confirmed in the Electoral District Central Committees on Saturday. After this the central committees will send the credentials of the electors to the parliament, where the actual election of the president will be carried out. This will happen on 26 January.

According to the results of the preliminary count, Social Democratic candidate Mauno Koivisto secured the greatest number of votes -- 145. National Coalition Party candidate Harri Holkeri received 58 votes, Center Party candidate Johannes Virolainen received 53 votes, Finnish People's Democratic League candidate Kalevi Kivisto received 32 votes, and Swedish People's Party candidate Jon-Magnus Jansson received 21 votes.

Rural Party candidate Veikko Vennamo and Liberal People's Party candidate Helvi Sipilae both secured the support of one elector. The Christian League, the Constitutional Party of the Right and the Finnish People's Unity Party did not have the support of any electors.

ARBEIDERBLADET CRITICAL OF U.S. POLISH POLICY

[Editorial: "A United NATO"]

[Text] The outcome of Monday's NATO foreign ministers' meeting in Brussels was yesterday being interpreted as a victory for Ronald Reagan and his "hard line" toward those in power in Poland and the Soviet Union. U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig has now said that what the foreign ministers agreed upon is more than he had expected.

We do not know what Haig had expected but what did emerge from Monday's NATO meeting was exactly what was to be expected -- the alliance partners agreed on strong condemnation of those responsible for the state of martial law; there was agreement on sanctions, but these sanctions must be adapted to fit the situation in individual countries. The communique states that the NATO nations will suspend all credits to Poland and implement economic sanctions against the Soviet Union unless the situation in Poland changes for the better.

"But," writes the NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA correspondent, who like so many others has been taken in by loud-talking representatives of the U.S. administration, "but the United States did not win support for their original desire to win the Western nations over to the line of comprehensive sanctions adopted by the United States."

The United States has not adopted a "line of comprehensive sanctions." The sanctions which President Reagan announced between Christmas and the new year distinguished themselves for their meaninglessness. The suspension of export licences for computers, new license requirements for the export of oil and gas equipment, no Aeroflot aircraft in U.S. airports and no Soviet ships docking in U.S. ports are all marginal measures. The Russians will hardly notice when they are implemented and will hardly notice when the sanctions are lifted again.

If one really wants to make the Russians feel it, one must resort to much tougher remedies. The only measure which would have had economic consequences for the Soviet Union was and is the suspension of U.S. grain sales. However, President Reagan chose not to take such a step, not out of respect for the Soviet Union but out of respect for U.S. farmers.

There is no reason why the impression should be given that the United States is doing its utmost for the Polish people while the West Europeans are looking after their commercial interests and not caring a damn about the Poles.

This is an incorrect impression, and it is wrong of the United States to strengthen it. The sanctions which have been implemented and which will be implemented on both sides of the Atlantic are symbolic, political sanctions.

As for the political condemnation of the state of martial law and the "normalization" of conditions in Poland, West Europe was not as swift to act as the United States. Helmut Schmidt and West Germany never acted as the Soviet Union's lickspittle -- the impression one could have formed from some newspapers, especially U.S. papers. Nor was Margaret Thatcher's Britain completely in line with Reagan and the United States, agreed and loyal, as it was presented in the mass media.

"Soldiers are shooting at workers. Trade union members are being arrested. Solidarity is being crushed. With all of my heart I am on the side of the workers," Helmut Schmidt said in the Bundestag 18 December. Ever since the military takeover the Social Democrat-Liberal government in West Germany has demanded that the military regime release the internees, lift martial law and resume its dialogue with Solidarity and the Catholic Church. Margaret Thatcher for her part applauded Reagan, but from the very beginning she also stressed that "conditions are different in the United States and in Europe" as far as possible punishments for those who have trampled on the Polish people are concerned -- "we cannot follow the United States in all its initiatives," Thatcher said.

For a long time it appeared that the all-overshadowing questions in connection with Poland -- seen from the U.S. viewpoint -- were the simple: "Who is responsible for the Polish drama? The Polish leaders or the Soviet leaders? What is Jaruzelski? A Polish nationalist or a Russian puppet?"

The U.S. answers are that the Soviet Union is solely responsible and Jaruzelski is only the puppet of the Kremlin leaders. Of course things seem this simple for a president who surrounds himself with advisers who perhaps have "an intimate knowledge of the heart and mind of the President himself," as an official presentation of the new top security adviser, William P. Clark puts it, but who are are hardly able to find Poland on the world map. Naturally, Federal Chancellor Schmidt knows that the answers are somewhat more complicated and that no one is yet in a position to answer in great detail. The only thing we know is that freedom and plurality are not reconcilable with the system which is -- and was even before 13 December -- established in East Europe.

But we are happy that NATO, a united NATO with Reagan included, is showing solidarity with the champions of democracy and social justice.

NATO DIVISIONS: SMALL PRICE FOR DIVERSITY

[Editorial: "NATO and the Soviet Union"]

[Text] It is NATO's strength that the organization consists of a group of independent states, and that the idea of uniformity, both inside the countries and inside the alliance, is foreign to the member nations. On many occasions this strength can appear to be a weakness or at least a problem, for it is not that easy to coordinate views even on the most important political issues. This is a low price to pay. How great the cost it is for an alliance which does not tolerate opposition and diversity can be seen from the present state of the Warsaw Pact. NATO would not have stood the sort of stresses on the Warsaw Pact, and it remains to be seen whether the Warsaw Pact will be able to stand them.

The extraordinary meeting of foreign ministers in Brussels the day before yesterday resulted in greater agreement than there was reason to expect in advance.

West Germany also supported the view that it is the Soviet Union which was behind the last month's events in Poland. As we have already asserted in this column, the Bonn government has taken a little too long to reach this view, despite the fact that it was repeatedly told that this was the case by its very closest European allies, especially France.

As far as NATO's ability to act in the present situation is concerned, it would be wrong to have expectations that are too great. This is not only due to the member nations' differing views of their own interests vis-a-vis the Soviet Union and the other East European states, although this disparity is important enough in itself. NATO is a defense alliance and naturally enough it is unable to help countries other than those which are its members. In the face of regimes which ride roughshod over their neighbors NATO is powerless.

But NATO also creates standards. The ideals of freedom it is founded on -- and which are shrugged at by certain circles in the West -- are a longed-for, but distant reality for the peoples who observe its members from the East. As a result it has both a duty and a right to make it clear to the top Polish and Soviet leaders that it is not without cost that they behave in the way they have in the last month, not without economic cost, and not without political cost.

Those in power in the Kremlin have acted as they do now out of concern for the stability of their own security system. In Berlin in 1953, in Hungary in 1956, in Czechoslovakia in 1968, and now in Poland, events have shown that the system is not stable -- for the simple reason that it does not leave any room for changes in tune with the times. It has become so much more unstable recently because the economy is so clearly and palpably tottering within the system. When the system grew up the idea was that it would give security to the Soviet Union. But it was molded into a shape which the nations it affected feel to be foreign. For this reason it has become the opposite of stable. This is something which the Soviet leaders have failed to understand. Every time the oppressed have grumbled, the explanation from Moscow has been that this is due to Western infiltration.

As long as these attitudes prevail, the enormous gap between Europe's two parts will remain. And at unpredictable intervals the system's stability will again be disturbed. The system will remain weak, because unlike the system in the West it is inflexible.

PRO-SOLIDARITY RALLY HALTS TU VISIT TO USSR

PM191127 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 15 Jan 82 p 8

[Jan Ove Ekeberg report]

[Excerpt] Norwegian Trade Union Federation Chairman Tor Halvorsen and the federation's international section leader, Kaare Sandergren, will not be visiting the Soviet trade union movement 29 January - 2 February as originally planned. The reason is that Halvorsen must be in Norway 30 January, this is the day when the international trade union movement will be demonstrating its support for Solidarity.

The date for the demonstration of support for Solidarity was fixed by the international trade union movement early this week, the visit to the Soviet Union has been finalized for a long time. The trade union federation chairman has now accepted an invitation to be the main speaker at a major meeting in Oslo 30 January.

The visit to the Soviet Union was planned as a round of talks at which the Norwegian and Soviet trade union movements would reestablish contact after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan at the end of 1979. Since this event talks have twice been postponed for practical reasons.

"We do not expect this postponement to be taken as a break, or that we do not wish to have contacts with the Soviet trade union movement. There is a need for such contacts, particularly because of the rearmament and tension in the world today. "We will be in touch with the Soviet trade union movement as soon as possible to fix a new date for the visit. The Norwegian Trade Union Federation is of the opinion that the visit should take place as soon as possible, ideally in the first half of this year," Sandegren said.

PAPER VIEWS NATO 'HEADWAY' ON POLAND CRISIS

[Olof Santesson editorial]

[Text] After a little over 4 weeks the Western powers have united behind a few principles regarding the Polish question. It would be going too far to speak of a common line -- the United States has had to accept that the West Europeans do not want to go as far as they do -- for the time being at least. But the U.S. allies have promised to look individually into various possibilities of cooling relations with the Soviet Union.

At the extraordinary meeting in Brussels -- an extremely unusual phenomenon -- tough criticism was directed at both the Polish military regime and the Soviet Union. The ministers spoke of massive violations of human rights and the repression of fundamental freedoms. The Soviet Union was warned of the possibility of Western sanctions if the situation in Poland does not improve. Demands were made on Poland that the state of martial law be lifted, those interned be released and negotiations between the party, the Solidarity trade union movement and the Catholic Church be resumed.

For the time being Poland will not be granted any credits apart from those for food. Negotiations on Poland's enormous foreign debts have been postponed.

The reaction in the Soviet Union and in Poland has been violent. The two countries' foreign ministers who have held their first consultations since the introduction of martial law have, not unexpectedly, spoken of interference in Poland's internal affairs. A particular source of irritation for them is clearly the NATO nations' proposal that the Madrid CSCE conference should start discussions of the Polish crisis.

The question then is what the NATO nations have achieved. To a certain extent they have succeeded in hiding their own internal disagreements, even though Greece under Andreas Papandreou has once again disrupted, in a striking manner the harmony striven for. He did not want to agree to any remarks directed against the Soviet Union.

The NATO meeting was preceded by a bitter speech from the pope. This could indicate that the Catholic Church with its relatively good knowledge of the situation in Poland is despondent about the prospects of a rapid improvement. To judge by all the indications an internal showdown is taking place within the communist party -- General Wojciech Jaruzelski is said to be attempting to form a centrist coalition and dissolve the old party apparatus.

Poland's military rulers are keen to create the impression of a swift return to calm. But one has rather the feeling that the struggle for Poland's future is dragging on. A more long-term need to meet force with force could give the NATO nations major headaches -- no matter what undertakings may be made in Brussels.

NATO STANCE ON POLAND 'BETTER LATE THAN NEVER'

[Editorial]

[Text] Better late than never. After weeks of dissension and contradictory statements, NATO has agreed on a joint stance on the Polish tragedy. This happened when the Western allies' foreign ministers met in Brussels on Monday.

In the communique issued after the meeting NATO declared for the first time that the Soviet Union is responsible for the oppression in Poland. The communique also makes it clear that the Western European NATO nations also intend to consider economic sanctions -- against Poland and against the Soviet Union -- if the situation in Poland is not soon returned to normal.

According to NATO three conditions must be fulfilled before the situation in Poland can once again be considered to be normal -- the state of martial law must be lifted, those imprisoned since 13 December must be released, and the talks between the regime, the Catholic Church and the Solidarity free trade union must be resumed.

In the last few days the state of martial law in Poland has been softened somewhat and censorship on foreign journalists has been lifted. However, NATO dismisses these as meaningless gestures. The Polish Government must not expect any help from the West as long as oppression continues.

According to the communique from Brussels there can, for the time being, be no question of new trade credits for Poland, except for food. For this reason negotiations on the rescheduling of Poland's foreign debts will also be postponed.

If the NATO nations adhere to this stance Poland will be hit very hard. The country's debts to the West amount to $29 billion. On Saturday the government in Warsaw announced that Poland needed a delay in loan repayments and further credits totalling $1.5 billion every quarter to cover necessary imports. Poland's East European allies could hardly do more than they are doing at present to support the unfortunate country. Thus it should now be clear to those in power in Moscow and Warsaw that the price of oppression is high.

The threat of no further credits carries much greater weight than the warning delivered simultaneously in Brussels that the states of West Europe could also resort to sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union if oppression continues. In this latter case no binding decisions have been made. Consultations will start in Brussels next week.

It should be noted in passing that Greece alone among the NATO nations was unwilling to support the idea of sanctions, but this exception is reasonably unimportant.

NATO was very clear in its statement on the Soviet Union's joint responsibility for what is happening in Poland. The allies, the communique stated, condemn the persistent campaign waged by the Soviet Union against the Polish people's efforts to bring about national renewal and reforms and the Soviet Union's active support for the systematic repression of these efforts. The Soviet Union has no right to determine political and social developments in Poland.

U.S. Secretary of State Haig had good reason to be satisfied with the meeting in Brussels which confirmed that, after some vacillation, the European NATO nations had drawn closer to the U.S. line. Even through the meeting will not have immediate tangible effects the message from Brussels includes warnings of which the East must take careful note.

UN DENIES REPORTS OF MAJOR ARMS BUILDUP

[Excerpts] New wild Turkish allegations about Russian planes and Latin American tanks for the National Guard have prompted ironical comments from the UN quarters, who have been persistently denying that any major arms build-up has been observed on either side. "The UN has always favoured disarmament and these reports of 'hundred of tanks' arriving in Cyprus suggest that we have been successful in every other part of the world except Cyprus."

A new Istanbul daily BULVAR joined the campaign with a report in its issue on Friday that "there are secret Russian arms in Cyprus." Similar allegations were made by the Istanbul daily MILLIYET which also claimed that Yugoslav, German and Bulgarian equipment is arriving in Cyprus.

Weapons Theft Denied

[Excerpt] The UN spokesman in Cyprus yesterday described as "the greatest piece of nonsense yet" a report in the Istanbul daily HURRIYET which claimed that Greek Cypriots had snatched "tens of thousands of arms from UN headquarters." "It is reprehensible that UNFICYP's name is being used in this way and we are forced to respond forcefully to unfounded allegations which only make UNFICYP's difficult job even more difficult and especially its role in the delicate intercommunal talks." he said.

However, the Turkish Cypriot Bayrak Radio said last night that the Turkish Cypriot leader Mr Denktas had sought from the UN special representative Mr Gobbi information as to where were the arms and ammunition which ought to be in the custody of the UN. He is quoted as having said after his meeting with Mr Gobbi that he expressed the Turkish Cypriot community's concern about "the missing arms" and asked for an assurance as to whether the arms and ammunition are in the control of the UN. Mr Gobbi told Mr Denktas that he would investigate and let him know as he was not aware about the arms mentioned.

KIPRIANOU-PAPANDREOU TALKS SET FOR 25-26 JAN

NC181148 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 18 Jan 82

[Text] An official statement on President Kirpianou's forthcoming visit to Athens says that his talks with Prime Minister Papandreou will take place on 25 and 26 January. The talks will be attended on the Cyprus side by Foreign Minister Rolandhis and by interlocutor Ioannidhis. The official statement adds that President Kiprianou will leave for Athens next Friday and that the first 3 days of his stay there will be a private visit.

DURDURAN EXPLAINS POSSIBILITIES FOR COALITION

TA181505 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1458 GMT 18 Jan 82

[Text] Lefkosa, 18 Jan (AA) -- Leader of the Communal Liberation Party Alpay Durduran said another minority government by the National Unity Party was the only alternative left for the next government of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. In an interview published in the journal OLAY (event), Durduran criticized the Democratic People's Party for smashing attempts to form a three-party coalition with the Republican Turkish Party as the third partner. The other two parties did not see eye to eye with his own on relations with Turkey, Durduran complained.

Durduran's party, with 13 seats in the 40-seat federated assembly, is the second largest after the caretaker government's National Unity Party, which holds 18 seats.

DENKTAS HITS ANTI-TURKISH PROPAGANDA CAMPAIGN

NC191126 Nicosia BIRLIK in Turkish 16 Jan 82 p 1

[Text] Nicosia — Head of state Rauf Denktas has stated that the joint slander campaign being conducted by the Greeks and Greek Cypriots against Turkey and the false propaganda they have initiated in order to push the Cyprus issue into the international arena have boomeranged.

Denktas was answering questions from the press yesterday. Asked to comment on Greek Cypriot Foreign Minister Rolandhis' denial of the propaganda in the Greek Cyrpiot press several weeks ago that the Turkish Army in Cyprus has been reinforced, Denktas said: "The aim is to intensify the propaganda vilifying Turkey, as agreed on with Papandreou, and to take the Cyprus issue -- which every country wishes to see resolved through the intercommunal talks -- to an international forum. In order to accomplish this, they have resorted to such lies as 'There is danger in Cyprus; peace is about to be broken in the area.' They repeat these lies in their newspapers every day, and they have spread them, as well as anti-Turkey propaganda, abroad.

"But over time their weapon boomeranged. It was understood that their own people had great fear. Then the leaders felt the need to pacify their own people, who had become panicky over the possibility of a war breaking out. They felt compelled to tell their own people that no such danger was expected from the Turkish side and that no such situation existed. This shows how far lies can lead people."

Recalling that the present situation is the outcome of conditioning the Greek Cypriot people through false propaganda since 1960, Denktas continued: "We hope this latest experiment will show them that they will not be able to resolve the Cyprus issue through lies. We also hope they will adopt a more realistic attitude at the negotiating table."

Asked to comment on reports that Kiprianou told West German Social Democratic Party leader Willy Brandt that the Cyprus issue could be resolved if the Turkish troops were withdrawn from Cyprus and if the United Nations increased its force on the island and that Brandt considered this view reasonable, Denktas said the most appalling attacks on the Turkish community had been carried out under the eyes of the United Nations force.

He continued: "Our community has experienced the kind of protection that foreign troops provide. We cannot accept such a measure, which we have tested and found inadequate, just because Kiprianou wants it. We have only been protected by our fatherland, through measures based on Turkey's right as a guarantor power. If it were not for this treaty of guarantees and Turkey's right to implement it, neither the independent Cyprus state nor the Turkish Cypriot community would have survived."

Stressing that Brandt is a person who should know these facts because he saw the stark realities when he visited the mass graves, Denktas said he did not think Brandt could advocate the adoption of measures which would enable the Greek Cypriots to commit new crimes.

Denktas stated further that Kiprianou is still dreaming of achieving what he failed to achieve in 1963 and that he was wasting time on unacceptable formulas.

Asked whether he and Brandt had discussed the establishment of a university in Cyprus, Denktas replied that Brandt asked his view on the matter. He further stated that he told Brandt that education and culture in Cyprus depended on the free will of the two communities and, therefore, the two communities should get together and decide on the issue. He added that he told Brandt it is too early yet to think about establishing a university in Cyprus. Denktas said: "I told Brandt that the establishment of a university is linked with peace on the island, that we are opposed in principle to UNESCO discussing the question of a Cyprus university with the Greek Cypriot administration as if it were the government of Cyprus, that we would not participate in such a dialogue with a community status because we refuse to recognize the Greek Cypriot administration as the government of Cyprus and that discussing the establishment of a university in Cyprus was untimely."

Answering a question concerning Greek Cypriot representations to the United Nations that Turkish fighter aircraft had violated Cypriot airspace, Denktas stated that it is natural for Turkish aircraft to fly to our region. Stating that the entire world knows that Turkish troops are in Cyprus to protect the independence of Cyprus and the Turkish Cypriot community, Denktas added that flights by Turkish aircraft in our skies is of no concern to the Greek Cypriots.

Noting that this was the reply given to the United Nations each time the Greek Cypriots complained, Denktas added that such noisy advertisements by the Greek Cypriots should be ignored.

Asked about allegations that UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar has sent an urgent message to the leaders of both communities and that he is trying to counter the tension of recent days, Denktas said no such message has been received. He added: "The tension of recent days has been created by the lies of the Greek Cypriots. The tension will die down now that Rolandhis has abandoned these lies."

PAPER CRITICIZES U.S. ENVOY'S REPORTED REMARKS

[From the "Views" column: "Awkward Diplomacy"]

[Excerpt] U.S. diplomacy has introduced a method which is strange and unheard of in the world of dealing with international questions: it entrusts its generals and admirals and ambassadors with voicing public statements of a political-military nature, thus proclaiming them White House press spokesmen. Indeed, no French or West German or Netherlands general has ever spoken to newsmen about the policy or the strategy of his government on the international stage. On the other hand, the enigmatic silence observed by ambassadors, as well as their diplomatic tact when they speak even within their private circle, are well known. On the contrary, every now and again the world public is told about what has been "stated" by the U.S. commander of such-and-such a zone or by the U.S. ambassador in such-and-such a capital, without any clarification as to whether these statements reflect the views of the State Department or the White House. If such were the case, why should these statements not be made by the responsible source or by some other person of a different standing and competency?

We point out this unorthodox practice because it has again been observed, this time the target being the Greek Government. U.S. Ambassador to Cyprus Ewing, as has been disclosed, has stated to a visiting delegation of Greek Cypriots from the United States: "The stance of Greek Prime Minister Papandreou does not help in solving the Cyprus problem and Mr Papandreou himself is creating problems for the United States and its allies."

One wonders what President Reagan would have said if the Greek ambassador in Washington (or even in nearby Canada) suddenly stated that the United States is creating problems for the Greek Government because of the various U.S. pressures, the undesirable U.S. bases, the pro-Turkish U.S. attitude and so on and so forth.

GOVERNMENT SIGNS PACT ON REPAIR OF SOVIET SHIPS

NC182254 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2200 GMT 18 Jan 82

[Text] An Athens government spokesman has stated that the Greek Government has signed an agreement with the Soviet Union to repair the Soviet fleet's merchant ships and auxiliary vessels at Greek shipyards. The spokesman explained that these auxiliary vessels are not classified as military vessels and do not carry weapons or military electronic systems. Their crews are civilians and the vessels transport foodstuffs, drugs and oil.

FINANCE MINISTER REPORTS ON 1982 BUDGET POLICY

[Text] The general debate on the 1982 fiscal budget draft bill was concluded at the Consultative Assembly today. The debate on the different articles will be continued.

Replying to criticism at today's session of the Consultative Assembly, Finance Minister Kaya Erdem said that in 1981, the rate of inflation and the trade deficit were reduced. Erdem said: More basic and significant steps will be taken during 1982 toward this target. Pointing out that 1981 was a year in which a basic and solid step was taken away from the economic crisis, Erdem explained that serious measures were taken to secure the internal and external economic balance.

Noting that the government is aware of the past and present measures and current economic policy for the future of the country, the finance minister said: Our government is well aware of the sacrificies made by the Turkish nation. It is suffering from not being able further to alleviate the situation of the low and fixed income groups. However, the only way to provide a permanent solution is to refrain from easy solutions that would cause a recurrence of the ailment. A government that is conscious of its responsibility to the nation cannot act in any other manner.

Erdem explained that during 1982 interest rates will fall and investments will be accelerated, employment opportunities will increase, real production will grow and the situation of needy and low-income groups will improve. Erdem noted that a balanced budget was prepared to provide social justice in line with these goals and that this is necessary for the success of the current stability program. He said that in accordance with the balanced development principle, regions with priority for development were emphasized in the allocation of public investment. Erdem said the government attaches special importance to this subject and that 25 provinces that are accorded priority for development were allotted 23 percent of the total public investments.

Replying to criticism to the effect that the increase in civil servants' salaries and real wages is below the inflation rate, the finance minister said the government is persistent in dealing with the problem. However, it is not possible to resolve it in only 1 or 2 years.

Pointing out that the adverse effects of the past have been averted and that the scales will be rebalanced, Erdem said transforming Turkish currency into a convertible one depends on the creation of the necessary economic climate. He said: The convertibility of Turkish currency will occur when the internal and external balance is secured and when we believe this balance will continue in the future. Such a decision would be very beneficial to the Turkish nation. The time for such a decision will be near if no concessions are made from the economic policies during 1982 and 1983.

Erdem stated that proposals to exempt the minimum wage from tax must be evaluated within the general wage policy and that a balanced budget and revenues from taxes are very important for the Turkish economy. Noting that the cost of exempting the minimum wage would be 50 billion Turkish liras, Erdem said: This must be discussed, keeping in mind the rate of inflation and taxation and wage policies; anything else would disrupt the balance of the budget and yield results contrary to the stability program.

Erdem also noted that the government is determined to implement a wage policy preventing health personnel, supervisory officials, high-level administrators and technical personnel from leaving the public sector. He said this policy will begin on 1 March 1982. The finance minister also announced that the bills on state security courts and a state of emergency have been prepared by the government and will be submitted to the Consultative Assembly in the near future.

DEATH PENALTY SOUGHT FOR 25 LEFTIST MILITANTS

[Summary] The trial of 91 members of the illegal Turkish People's Liberation Party Front-People's Revolutionary Pioneers has begun at the 3d Military Court of the Istanbul Martial Law Command. Death penalties are being sought for 25 of the suspects for intending to overthrow the constitutional order and replace it with a Marxist-Leninist system. The indictment charges the suspects with 12 cases of murder and numerous other crimes, such as armed assault, shooting, armed robbery and bombing. Prison sentences up to 36 years are being sought for the other suspects.

[Summary] The trial of the 26 members of the illegal Turkish Communist Toilers Party had begun at the 1st Military Court of the Istanbul Martial Law Command. The suspects are charged with undertaking actions in a bid to overthrow the constitutional order by force. Death penalties are sought for three of the suspects.

Izmir Death Penalties

[Text] Three persons were condemned to death today in two separate trials being held in the Izmir 2d Military Court. Of 10 persons being tried for the murder of Suleyman Tosun, a watchman at the Bostanli police station, Izmir, one was condemned to death by the court. The accused is a member of the Revolutionary Path organization, which aimed at overthrowing the constitutional order by the use of force. Two other members of the same organization were also condemned to death for the same crimes but their sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. The same court condemned to death Musa Iz and Arif Karakurt, two militants accused of killing three persons in Denizli in 1979.

ULUSU RECEIVES VISITING TUNISIAN OFFICIAL

[Text] Tunisian Foreign Ministry State Secretary (Mahmoud Mestiri), who is in Turkey on an official visit, continued his contacts today. The Tunisian official was received by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu at 1800. Earlier (Mestiri) visited Industry and Technology Minister Mehmet Turgut.

In a statement before the talks, Turgut expressed hope that this visit would be a turning point in trade relations between the two countries, which were currently at an unsatisfactory level. Pointing out that Turkey would do its part for promotion of trade relations between the two countries, Turgut said Turkey could contribute to the establishment of various industrial installations in Tunisia. In reply, the visiting Tunisian official said his country was interested in learning from Turkey's accumulated experience in the fields of industry and technology. He added that he was convinced such cooperation would greatly contribute to the development of relations between Turkey and Tunisia.

PAPER CHARGES ARMS BUILDUP BY GREEK CYPRIOTS

NC191202 Istanbul BULVAR in Turkish 15 Jan 82 pp 1, 2

[Ulvi Yanardag report]

[Text] "We are divulging: There are secret Soviet arms in Cyprus." The Greek Cypriot administration is about to complete its preparations, which are designed more for aggression than for defense."

In addition to arms and ammunition obtained from all corners of the world, 2,700 Greek military experts have arrived in the Greek Cypriot sector of the island and ground, naval and air forces have been formed. A number of the military experts have established commando training centers on the southern slopes of the Troodos Mountains. The soldiers being trained there have been given the most-up-to-date Czech automatic weapons. Other Greek officers have been assigned as commanders of the Greek Cypriot National Guard. In addition, the personnel of the Greek regiment have been increased from 950 to 3,000, contrary to all treaties.

Military training is being conducted at camps near the mountains with Chaparral antiaircraft missiles from Brazil, T-34 tanks from the Soviet Union and automatic weapons from Czechoslovakia. These T-34 tanks are only being used for training since they proved ineffective during the peace operation in 1974. For this reason, 3 months ago 35 Soviet T-54 and T-55 tanks were obtained from some Middle East countries. Another 50 tanks have been ordered from France.

New 106-mm recoilless rifles have been received from Yugoslavia in addition to the ones already on hand. In addition to (Jaraka) antitank guns from Brazil and 25 armored reconnaissance vehicles from the United States, the Greek Cypriots are continuing their contacts in other countries for more arms.

Greece has sent 32 F-84 planes. It has also been learned that the Greek Cypriots are going to be provided with a number of Harrier bombers from Britain. These planes will be based at the airfield nearing completion at Paphos. Some of the SA-321-H Superfrelon helicopters ordered from France have arrived. The Greek Cypriot administration has also purchased two coast guard boats from France. A [Greek] air force squadron has been based in Crete to be able to reach Cyprus quickly.

Concrete positions have been constructed on the northern slopes of the Troodos Mountains facing the Turkish Cypriot sector. These positions can be seen from the Turkish Cypriot side on the Kambos River and on the tops of Marathasa and Kakopetria, particularly in the west. An infantry battalion has been stationed at Pirga village, below the hills.

The Greek Cypriots serve 26 months in the army, which is composed of 50 units, including armored, mechanized infantry, reconnaissance and artillery support units.

BRIEFS

ALUMINA EXPORTS TO USSR -- Some 63,000 tons of alumina was exported to the Soviet Union last year from the Etibank aluminum works in Konya's Seydisehir district. The exports generated about $14 million in foreign exchange. A total of 131,000 tons of alumina, 40,000 tons of liquid aluminum and 11,500 tons of aluminum sulfate were produced at the Etibanks works last year. The liquid aluminum and aluminum sulfate are being used locally. [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 10 Jan 82 TA]

SYNAGOGUE TERRORIST ATTACK TRIAL OPENS IN VIENNA

[Summary] With extreme security precautions the trial of the two synagogue terrorists -- Husham Muhammad Rajih, 21 years old, and Marwan Hasan, 25 years old -- began yesterday at the Vienna Criminal Court. Rajih is also charged with having assassinated Vienna City Councilman Heinz Nittel [on 1 May 1981]. "Hasan pleaded not guilty regarding the attack on the Vienna synagogue, while Rajih pleaded guilty on this charge but denied he was guilty of the murder of Heinz Nittel. When questioned in court yesterday, Rajih declared that before the Nittel murder his organization, Al-'Asifah -- National Liberation of Palestine, had planned to kidnap Chancellor Kreisky. This plan was abandoned, however, because strong negative international repercussions were feared. Hasan's defense counsel, Weber, yesterday requested that Interior Minister Lanc be summoned as a witness."

The trial is being held under the chairmanship of Judge Heinz Holzer. The prosecutor is Robert Schindler. The presumed case officer of Rajih and Hasan, Bahij Yunis, who was arrested in Salzburg and is still being investigated by police, is to be tried separately, and Yunis will not appear in the current trial as a witness, either.

The court building resembled a fortress yesterday morning. As early as at 0800 hours, many people had gathered before the heavily guarded entrance. Only three persons at a time were allowed to enter. They had to undergo a careful search and a close identity check. The courtroom itself was heavily guarded by members of the "Cobra" anti-terror squad and closed off by a special iron gate which only journalists were allowed to pass after a second search and identity check. In the courtroom it was strictly forbidden to take photographs.

After the reading of the indictment connected with the attack on the synagogue on 29 August 1981, during which 2 persons were killed and more than 30 persons were injured, Hasan pleaded not guilty, claiming that he was a Palestinian soldier who had merely carried out orders and had only intended to attack Israelis. Rajih pleaded guilty to the terrorist attack charge. Hasan's defense counsel declared that the defendant had felt entitled to undertake "combat actions against Israelis" because a few weeks earlier another armed PLO unit, discovered at Schwechat Airport, had been virtually not bothered at all by the authorities but let off with a suspended sentence and an acquittal. Hasan claimed in this context to have learned from a contact man that Interior Minister Erwin Lanc had maintained good relations with a member of this PLO command, Sartawi, and had received from Sartawi money and a gold watch. "In a release, Interior Minister Lanc denied this assertion as completely unfounded slander."

After the second indictment on the assassination of City Councilman Nittel was read, Rajih withdrew his confession made to police. "He admitted to having gathered information about Nittel, to having brought the NATO jacket that was found after the murder, and to having spied out Nittel's habits a few days before the murder, but he declared that he expressly rejected the order to assassinate Nittel that was given to him, and therefore did not shoot him. He claimed that he confessed to the murder during the police questioning only to avoid being further questioned in detail about contact persons.

"In reply to the judge's question as to who actually committed the murder, Rajih declared: 'Actually several members of the organization were present, the contact man could have fired.'" Rajih also withdrew all statements incriminating the presumed case officer Yunis, claiming that he merely named him as the man who gave him his orders and who supplied him with arms because he wanted to be left alone by the police. Asked by the judge whether the reason for his hesitant evidence was fear because what he said would become publicly known, Rajih declared that it was still dangerous for him to help the Austrian authorities. The trial will continue today, Tuesday, at 0800 hours.

BRUSSELS DECLARATION A 'HAPPY COMPROMISE'

FM200839 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 12 Jan 82 p 7

[Editorial]

[Text] At their extraordinary meeting in Brussels the NATO foreign ministers used strong words in their condemnation of the situation in Poland and the Russian responsibility for it. And they repeated the three demands made earlier by the West German Bundestag and the 10 members of the EEC -- the lifting of the state of martial law, the release of those imprisoned and the resumption of talks between the Polish state, the church and the free trade union movement.

Collectively they adopted no tough measures, although they drew up a list of sanctions which the member states could implement if the situation in Poland were to worsen. These would not only include economic sanctions, but would also embrace measures in the political and cultural spheres.

In doing so, the NATO ministers showed that they are adhering to a policy of arms limitation and to the view that the return to real reforms and to a dialogue in Poland would improve the atmosphere for the arms limitation talks. But if the Soviet Union does not fulfill its international commitments, the ministers warn, it will be responsible for the injurious effect that would have on the arms limitation process.

The significance of this declaration is that in Brussels the United States got its way with its wish for a tough attitude in principle from the Western alliance toward Warsaw and Moscow and for a tough strategy in the long-term.

But as far as the course to be followed in the short-term is concerned, the more cautious European view that tough measures at the present moment would harm more than help the Polish people won the day -- because such measures would destroy any possible remaining willingness on the part of the Polish Government to resume the dialogue and would drive it further into the arms of the Soviet Union.

Moreover it seems from the declaration that there has been a growing awareness in the United States that sanctions against East Europe would hit the European economies much harder than the U.S. economy, because European trade with that region is much more important. The view that only Bonn is prepared to put commercial considerations above solidarity with Poland -- a view put forward by a section of the U.S. press in particular -- seems untenable.

The other European nations also have their economic problems which urge cautious action. Thus the British foreign secretary made it clear in a statement that his country would only adopt measures which did not do greater harm to itself than to others. Here he was thinking, for example, of limiting Russian imports, reducing the size of embassies and the like, for, he said, the United States is not demanding that Europe adopt the same measures as it is adopting itself, but merely that an indication of disapproval is given to the Soviet Union over events in Poland.

Without further ado the Brussels declaration can be described as a happy compromise. Not only has it restored the unity of the Atlantic alliance to the outside world, but also because it can be seen as an adequate response to an extremely complicated situation, in which excessive action must be avoided just as much as excessive caution.

SCHMIDT ASSESS ECONOMIC, SOCIAL SITUATION

[Text] Bonn, 19 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has optimistically assessed the Federal Republic's economic and social situation at the start of the new year. Speaking in the lower house budget debate today, the chancellor claimed that the government has created the prerequisites for a course of economic improvement, as far as this is possible within the German framework.

Schmidt drew attention in this respect to rising exports, to the considerable reduction in oil and gasoline consumption and, as he said, to the considerable improvement of the Federal Republic's balance of goods and services. This was a prerequisite for lowering interest rates in the Federal Republic and would lead to considerably lower interest rates than in other countries. German interest rates are still too high for the current economic situation. The head of government went on to say that internal peace and social consensus has been preserved. The government is laying the foundations for an upturn in economic development with its 1982 budget, which was adopted in parliament on Friday.

The chancellor rejected CDU/CSU criticism of the government's attitude on the Polish question and summarized its position as follows: "self-control and a calm hand, not agitation and sterile efforts." He described the government's foreign policy by pointing out that responsible action, not only in German interests but also in recognition of its influence on a global basis, requires moderation and restraint in implementing one's own interests. It does not mean striving for dominance or interfering in the internal affairs of others. On the contrary, it is more a question of respecting everyone's right to self-determination and to solving disputes peacefully.

Schmidt expressed support for active German membership in the Western alliance, and said that the government is making considerable contributions to consolidating and strengthening the alliance. He compared the concept of military balance and the concept of security partnership, which the union has criticized, and stressed: "No one can achieve peace in today's world without having partners." In view of the goals of military balance with a reduction in arms secured by treaty, the Federal Government is also in favor of continuing the U.S.-Soviet talks on European medium-range weapons in Geneva. Schmidt appealed to the Soviet Union and Poland to resume observing the principles of the Helsinki CSCE Final Act.

Schmidt defended his visit to the GDR against the criticism of CSU Regional Group Chairman Friedrich Zimmermann. Despite the "fuss" in Guestrow, which was sealed off by police, he still maintains that his meeting with SED leader Erich Honecker was seen as a sign of hope in both parts of Germany. This was confirmed by letters and visits from the GDR. The chancellor also rejected Zimmermann's view that he is relying on and fanning fear. Schmidt said that he has opposed fear-mongering up and down the country and that he is still doing so.

He summarized the government's policy in four ponts:

1. Working with perceptiveness and determination toward the peaceful settlement of conflicts.

2. Bonn counts on the power of reason, on the readiness for dialogue and balance and on the indisputable prerequisite of military equilibrium. Germany would become a shuttlecock without the Atlantic alliance.

3. The government is aware that its policy is based on the trust of the majority of the people and it will not disappoint this trust.

4. Bringing about a change in the current trend in the job markets is an international challenge which the Federal Government will meet within the scope of its national possibilities. Schmidt once again gave his assurance that whoever supports a desire for reason and the will for peace will find the Federal Government a reliable partner. The government will solve its tasks with inner calm. "And, Herr Zimmermann, the federal chancellor has no intention of leaving the boat."

BUNDESTAG APPROVES 1982 FEDERAL BUDGET

LD191922 Hamburg DPA in German 1812 19 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 19 Jan (DPA) -- After about 8 hours of debate during which, in accordance with tradition, all political topics were discussed the Bundestag approved the second reading of the budget this evening with the majority of the SPD/FDP coalition. A total of 264 deputies with full voting rights voted for the budget and 207 against. There was 1 abstention. Of the 21 deputies from Berlin 11 voted for and 10 against the budget.

Prior to this there was a heated argument about defense policy. Manfred Woerner, the CDU/CSU's defense expert, accused Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD) of remaining silent in the face of several cuts in his budget and said he was concerned only about his political survival. Woerner said the share of defense expenditure in the overall budget, which in 1967 was 25.2 percent, had fallen to 18.4 percent in the 1982 draft budget. There is a constantly growing gap between the Bundeswehr's mission and its means. Today, it is no longer possible to assume that the Bundeswehr could fulfill its tasks.

Defense Minister Apel rejected these accusations and stressed that the Bundeswehr will maintain its combat readiness in 1982, too. It will fulfill its commitments to the NATO alliance and continue to modernize its equipment and guarantee its operation. However, he conceded that "in some tasks we must master specific problems and we are faced with considerable difficulties." Nonetheless, the Bundeswehr could "with this budget, too, continue to guarantee together with the alliance partners the security of the citizens of our country and of the free world."

DIE WELT VIEWS U.S. AMBASSADOR BURNS' STATEMENTS

[Friedhelm Kemna commentary: "Warning of Erosion"]

[Text] Of all possible speculations regarding the FRG-U.S. mood, the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Germany would be the worst. Arthur Burns, Washington's ambassador on the Rhine, has pointed out this possibility a second time within a few weeks. Burns himself considers this, by the way, a catastrophic option for Europe as well as for the United States. The Atlantic alliance cannot be divided into protectors and protected. If it withdrew from Europe, the United States would say farewell to its role as a world power -- farewell in a historically binding way. Europe would inevitably fall into the wake of the only other functioning world power. Yet it would be dangerous, particularly now, to underrate political emotions which could easily get the upper hand in competition with political reason.

There is a foreign political "argument" which always fascinates many Americans at certain times. Withdrawing to fortress America as a response to insufficient reaction in a friendly country has been considered by Congress, according to Senator Mansfield. Neo-isolationism is not necessarily an objectionable word in the new world. If European policy on Poland, turns into opposition to the involvement of the United States in Poland, the alliance will as a consequence be up for discussion. Burns certainly is not pursuing unilateral and superficial criticism of the alliance. The roots of the alliance go deeper than the columns of the New York TIMES, but the ambassador's warning against an erosion of relations, which could be caused by the opinions of Europeans and the Germans being published, must be taken seriously. To avoid this, political reason is called for -- here as well as over there.

AIR FRANCE BUS TERMINAL IN PARIS BOMBED

NC192234 Paris AFP in English 2234 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Text] Paris, 19 Jan (AFP) -- A bomb wrecked the coin-operated baggage lockers at Air France's bus terminal at the western edge of Paris tonight. An employee said: "The deflagration was tremendous. Luckily, nobody was nearby." The blast also wrecked part of the ceiling. The terminal is at Paris' Maillot gate.

NGUYEN CO THACH EXPECTED TO VISIT IN SPRING

[Excerpts] Paris, 19 Jan (AFP) -- Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach is expected to visit Paris this spring, it was announced here today. A date has not yet been fixed for the visit, but informed sources said it would probably be in April or May, after the Vietnamese party congress planned for March. The visit would be the first to France by a member of the Hanoi governing team since the Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea in early 1979. The possibility of a trip to France by Mr Thach follows indications from the Vietnamese Embassy here that Franco-Vietnamese cooperation would resume as a result of an accord signed late last month under which Paris is to give Hanoi 200 million francs (36 million dollars) in aid. Informed sources here said that while France wishes to start up a new dialogue with Vietnam, it intends to maintain its occupation of Kampuchea, Vietnamese control of Laos and any plan for an Indochinese confederation. But Vietnamese Ambassador to France Mai Van Bo said at a recent press conference that, despite political differences between the two states, Hanoi hoped that new economic relations could begin between France and Vietnam. "Conditions are ripe for a resumption of development and cooperation," he said. Ambassador Bo also hinited that the Hanoi government saw France as a possible link between the Indochinese nations and ASEAN, saying that France had "interests in the region" and that Vietnam expected Paris to play "a positive role in favor of peace and stability in the region."

ARMENIAN TERRORISTS ASKED TO END HUNGER STRIKE

[Text] Beirut, 19 Jan (AFP) -- The Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia (ASALA) today appealed to four Armenians in French prison to (?cut off) their hunger strike which they began nine days ago. The four were imprisoned for their role in the Sept 24, 1981 hostage taking at the Turkish Consulate in Paris. ASALA, in a telephone call to AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE'S Beirut office, called on voluntary and human rights organizations to ask the Armenians to end their hunger strike, "and to denounce the position of the French authorities which do not care about the life of revolutionaries and militants." ASALA criticized the French Government for reneging on its commitment to give ASALA militants political status. The group warned that "revolutionary violence" would be used in future against the French Government.

EX-CYPRIOT PRESIDENT CLAIMS TO BE HIT TARGET

[Excerpts] Paris, 19 Jan (AFP) -- Nikos Sampson, Cypriot president for one week in July 1974, has alerted French police after claiming he was the target of a three-man hit squad, informed sources said today. The 46-years-old Sampson is now living in the smart Paris suburb of Neuilly after earlier spending some time in the United States and West Germany. The "moral veto" against police here had issued a nation-wide warrant for the three men, whom Sampson described as "Greeks or Turks" who had come to France after picking up arms in Britain, the sources said.

SIX DOZIER ABDUCTORS IDENTIFIED; NAMES NOT GIVEN

[Excerpts] Rome, 19 Jan (ANSA) -- Six members of the "commando" which kidnapped United States Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier from his Verona apartment on December 17 have been identified, Italian police confirmed here today. Police investigators, however, said that in order to protect the ongoing investigation, the names of those identified as Dozier's abductors will not be released for the time being.

Yesterday evening, police on the case had said in Verona that they were reasonably sure of having identified three members of the group, who were said to be already on the wanted list for subversive activity. It was also noted that the road-blocks and search activities, carried on intensely during the last 32 days, had visibly slowed down on Monday. According to rumors in Verona, the new turn in the investigations were the result of information acquired in Rome after the arrest of around a dozen Red Brigades members last week.

Meanwhile, investigators would give no explanation of the transfer of Judith Dozier and her daughter Cheryl to the Naples NATO headquarters. It was reported last week that the general's wife and daughter had gone to Naples as the guest of the NATO commander there and they have so far not returned to Verona. According to rumors circulating here, Judith Dozier may have received a message from her husband's kidnappers while shopping in a Verona supermarket, and NATO authorities decided to send the Dozier family to Naples for the time being for security purposes.

Two West Germans Arrested

[Text] Avezzano, 19 Jan (ANSA) -- Two West German citizens, allegedly belonging to a neo-Nazi organization with links to similar international groups, were arrested at dawn here today, Italian police disclosed. The arrest operation is still underway, the police said, and therefore no further information has been given.

Sources close to the police however revealed that arms and ammunition were reportedly seized in the apartment where the two West-Germans were arrested, and that the two were fugitives from an international arrest warrant. The sources also said that the two were possibly in contact with right-wing extremist groups in Italy.

PAKISTANI PRESIDENT CONTINUES VISIT TO COUNTRY

Rome Banquet Speeches

BK191218 Karachi Domestic Service in Urdu 0200 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Italian Prime Minister Spadolini has expressed confidence that President Mohammad Ziaul Haq's visit will further promote friendship and cooperation between the government and people of the two countries. Speaking at a banquet hosted by him in honor of the Pakistan president in Rome last night, he said the cooperation between the two countries over the past few years, which had deep roots in the field of culture, has been extended progressively to the technical and economic sectors.

In reply, the president said that he is happy that the close bonds between the two countries are now being renewed and reinvigorated. He said that bilateral economic, commercial and cultural cooperation is growing steadily. The president said his talks with the Italian leaders showed the very close similarity of views that exist between the two countries on various international issues. This was possible because the two countries not only abide by the principles of international relations but also expected other countries to do so.

He said one such principle, that of the right of every nation to decide its own form of government free from foreign interference, has been violated in Afghanistan. He said that, as the Italian prime minister and Italian people are aware, the brave people of Afghanistan were struggling against heavy odds to regain their freedom. The president said the continuing Afghan crisis poses a threat to the security of our region and world peace. He said he was convinced that the only way to resolve it is to uphold principles laid down in the resolutions of the Islamic conference, the United Nations and the Nonaligned Movement.

The president commended Italy's constructive and positive role in international institutions. The president invited the Italian prime minister to visit Pakistan.

Haq Addresses IFAD Council

AU192015 Rome ANSA in English 1943 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Rome, 19 Jan (ANSA) -- Pakistani President Mohammad Ziaul Haq urged the establishment of a "comprehensive program of action" on a worldwide scale to deal with emergency food needs as well as long-term agricultural development while addressing the governing council of the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD) here today. Zia also called for "adequate replenishment" of IFAD's resources to meet the contribution target of 1,270 million dollars set by the governing council in 1980.

Zia proposed a short-term plan to cover emergency dispatches of food to countries confronted with drought, famine or other natural disasters. "For this, stockpiles of foodgrain reserves should be permanently established, instantly replenished, and scrupulously maintained at the optimum level." The long-term plan should aim at "practical measures to assist the developing countries in their efforts to increase foodgrains and other essential crops," and should include all factors strengthening the agrarian base for increased food production.

Rome Press Conference

BK200757 Karachi Domestic Service in Urdu 0200 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Excerpts] President Gen Mohammad Ziaul Haq has said Pakistan and Italy not only have identical views but also share each other's concern on matters of international importance. Addressing a crowded news conference in Rome last night, he said that during his meetings with the Italian president and other leaders matters of bilateral concern and international importance were discussed. In this connection the Afghanistan issue also came up for discussion. He said they shared similar views because Italy was among the members of the United Nations who supported the UN resolution on Afghanistan.

Drawing a parallel between Afghanistan and Poland, the president recalled that about a year ago he warned the free world that if it did not view the Afghanistan problem in true perspective the time was not far off when it would have to face a similar situation in Poland. He said Pakistan would not compromise its principles on the Afghanistan issue. He said because of our strong protest over the Afghanistan situation, there had been several disturbances on our western borders. However, its impact has been that today the situation in Poland is not as bad as it could have been. He said it was possible that because of Afghanistan the Soviet Union had not yet made a move in Poland.

About his coming visit to France, the president said there is no truth to the rumor that he will hold talks on acquiring a nuclear processing plant. He said Pakistan has neither the capability nor the intention of indulging in the luxury of producing atomic weapons.

The president denied the allegations of Amnesty International about the number of detainees in Pakistan. He said only 62 persons were under detention. He challenged Amnesty International to come to Pakistan to learn the truth, because by sitting in Geneva one could not correctly assess the situation in Pakistan. He said Amnesty International is doing a great job for human freedom; however, it should also define the responsibility of a person on behalf of his nation and his people. The president said we will never allow terrorism in Pakistan.

SPADOLINI WARNS AGAINST PROVOKING ANY CRISIS

AU200842 Rome ANSA in English 0815 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 20 Jan (ANSA) -- Premier Giovanni Spadolini has reiterated his deep conviction that any provoking of a government crisis before the definitive approval of important financial legislation would be "a serious political error."

Spadolini currently heads a five-way coalition government of Christian Democrats (DC), Socialists (PSI), Social Democrats (PSDI), Republicans (PRI) and Liberals (PLI).

In an interview Tuesday he said that until these parties had worked out a vision of future political equilibriums, the best policy for the government was to go ahead with the implementation of its economic policies.

Meanwhile the DC was going ahead with its preparations for a national council at the end of the week in which new organizational norms are to be approved with a view to the coming party congress in April.

Many within the party are calling for changes that would enable the secretary to be directly elected by the congress.

DC Deputy Roberto Mazzotta, who belongs to the party's rightwing, said that the political secretariat to emerge from the next congress almost certainly would be called upon to cope with a difficult test at the polls and therefore must be given objective instruments with which to compete with the other Italian political forces.

The various parties are also busy discussing terrorism and pension reforms.

The state run INPS pension program is in crisis and recent calls to delay reforms in this sector advanced even by Labor Minister Michele di Giesi have provoked protests from various quarters, including Communist Party figure Giorgio Napolitano, who said it was "inadmissible" that summit decisions made outside the parliament could squelch "a correct parliamentary dialectic."

GOVERNMENT'S LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM OUTLINED

[Lisbeth Knudsen report]

[Text] The government has now finalized its plan for its attempt to survive in the new Folketing without having a single advance agreement to ensure a majority for any of its future legislation. Alternately, the government will first attempt to pass the budget legislation for 1982, which the nonsocialist parties are expected to support. Then will come the financial reforms, which the Socialist People's Party and the Radical Liberals already seem close to supporting. And finally the government will present an overall employment program, based on a series of proposals from the action program put forward by the Social Democratic Party and the Danish Trade Union Federation, together with supplementary budget legislation. A statement from Finance Minister Knud Heinesen makes it clear that the government is linking its financial reforms to its job creation initiatives. Therefore if any uncertainty arises surrounding the passing of the financial reforms, the parties creating the uncertainty will at the same time be accused of being responsible for obstructing the employment initiatives.

When the Folketing holds its opening debate today, it will be without any motions from the nonsocialist opposition. The four parties which comprise the nonsocialist government alternative -- the Conservatives, Liberals, Center Democrats and Christian People's Party -- decided at a meeting yesterday not to table any motions in order not to give the government an opportunity to cobble together a majority around a motion for an emergency debate. However, an extremely fierce debate is expected, as is a clear demonstration that the government is at present without any permanent support from parties in the Folketing. The motion which the Center Democrats had tabled for a debate on adjustments in car taxation will be postponed until a special debate can be held on this topic. Today's debate will take place without the Folketing's being given any figures for the economic consequences of the government program of action. The government will present these only when the financial reforms are home and dry, the Finance Ministry statement said.

PAPER VIEWS 'AMBITIOUS' UNEMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

[Editorial: "Great Expectations"]

[Excerpts] Anker Jorgensen's newly formed government has made -- as was to be expected -- the fight against unemployment its prime task. Everything else must take second place to it. And it is worth noting that in his statement to the Folketing yesterday the prime minister gave great prominence to the fight against unemployment among the young. The government wants to start a general debate about the young, and it intends to take a number of initiatives to help the young. These will aim at improved educational opportunities, at the legally enforced creation of training and work experience places, at job creation arrangements and labor supply arrangements. This will be achieved through aid from the government and local governments, and will take place with the cooperation of private enterprise. And the simple answer to the question of where the money is to come from is, of course, that as a consequence of these arrangements there will be less paid out in social security and unemployment benefits. It is an ambitious target the government has set itself. Not only does it want to reduce unemployment among the young, it wants to abolish it. These are big promises to make, but the prime minister's assurance was not to be taken as mere words.

No matter how much sympathy there may be in the Folketing and the public at large for this goal it must still create amazement -- and concern -- that the government dares go so far in its program. The government will not be able to count on automatically persuading the Folketing to participate in the actual policies which the government will claim to be necessary for the achievement of the goals. The employment policy to be pursued must be seen in the context of the policy to be adopted on the rest of Denmark's economic development, industry's expenditure problems and wage agreements. It is simply not possible to divorce the endeavors to give young people something to do from the general economic policy.

NEW SOVIET DESTROYER TRACKED, PHOTOGRAPHED

PM200825 Copenhagen AKTUELT In Danish 8 Jan 82 p 26

["Lewig" report]

[Text] A completely new type of Soviet missile destroyer has been sent out into the world's oceans. On New Year's Eve the missile destroyer Sovremenniy rounded Skagen and is now in the South Atlantic. On its way through Danish waters the ship was followed and photographed by Danish intelligence services.

In size and armaments the new type of missile destroyer is very reminiscent of a cruiser. The ship is armed with surface-to-surface missiles and 130-mm guns. Danish intelligence services say that the ship's size and armaments indicate that it has been built to operate with Soviet combat units on the world's oceans. It will probably be used first and foremost to combat Western surface units. It is assumed that in the next few years the Soviet Union will complete a further three or four ships of this type. The Sovremenniy is 155 meters long and has a crew of around 400 men. The ship is equipped with two gas turbines and two screws which give it a speed of 30-35 knots. The ship is also armed with torpedoes, antimissile artillery, antisubmarine missiles and antiaircraft missiles. Toward the stern the ship is equipped with a so-called telescope hangar for a Hormone-class helicopter.

KOIVISTO COMMENTS ON ELECTIONS, FOREIGN POLICY

LD191956 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1700 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Excerpt] The winner of the presidential Electoral College elections, Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto, considers it possible that the presidential election will be decided in the first round of voting at the electors' meeting. According to Koivisto, this would be dignified. In an interview with the Finnish news agency STT today, Koivisto said he hopes for a speedy formation of a new government after the presidential election. In Prime Minister Koivisto's opinion, government cooperation should be continued on the present basis until the regular parliamentary elections, but Koivisto does not want to comment further on the government question for the time being. The prime minister believes that Finland's international position at the time of the change of president is stable. Finland's position is firmly anchored, particularly on the Finnish-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance. Foreign policy will continue to follow the Paasikivi-Kekkonen line, and there relations with the Soviet Union are of special significance.

KIVISTO ASKS SKDL, SKP TO SUPPORT KOIVISTO

LD191758 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Kalevi Kivisto, presidential candidate of the Finnish People's Democratic League [SKDL], appealed to his electors to vote for Mauno Koivisto in the first round of voting next Tuesday. In Kivisto's opinion it is particularly important that the final result of the elections should be as unambiguous as possible.

DENKTAS: NORTH WILL NOT DECLARE INDEPENDENCE

TA191236 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Text] Pointing out that two separate governments and two sectors exist in Cyprus, President Rauf Denktas has said that there is no need for a unilateral declaration of independence. Replying to questions on Greek Cypriot propaganda to the effect that the Turkish Cypriot side would declare independence on 13 February, Denktas told correspondents that the aim of Greek Cypriot propaganda is to embellish fabrications in a bid to accuse and denounce the Turkish Cypriot side.

Noting that Greek Cypriot propaganda is based on ulterior motives, Denktas said: The Greek Cypriots claim that we are going to declare our independence. In fact, the Turkish Cypriot side is already a separate state. There are two governments and two sectors in Cyprus. Therefore there is no need for such a declaration. If such a step is to be taken, that would be asking other countries for recognition. This could be done in accordance with [words indistinct]. Therefore allegations that the Turkish Cypriot side will declare its independence on 13 February have never been, and will never be, true.

GOVERNMENT DENIES WEAPONS STOLEN FROM UN FORCE

NC191823 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Text] Referring to Mr Denktas' allegations that the Greek Cypriots have stolen arms and ammunition in UN custody, the government spokesman has stated that these allegations are ridiculous and show the degree of credibility of charges the Turkish leadership has been making lately. The arms and ammunition Mr Denktas is referring to are being kept by the United Nations in such a way that they could be stolen only in an armed attack. Nevertheless, the United Nations itself has stated that the arms are still in their custody. This must constitute a satisfactory reply for every person of good faith.

BRIEFS

GDR DELEGATION -- A four-member GDR People's Chamber delegation arrived in Cyprus on a 4-day official visit as guests of the House of Representatives. The delegation, headed by Karl-Heinz Schulmeister, member of the People's Chamber, visited the refugee camps of Ayios Anaryiros and Voroklinis. Speaking at the refugee camps, Schulmeister said the GDR people, who know the drama of war and refugees, fully understand the struggle of the Cypriots for an independent and integral Cyprus. He also said his country will do everything possible so the UN resolutions on Cyprus may be implemented. He expressed the conviction that justice will utlimately prevail, and that the day will come when the Cypriot people's struggle will be crowned with total success. Deputies Thalis Mikhailidhis and Poumbouris accompanied the delegation on their visits. [Text] [Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 19 Jan 82 NC]

TURKISH-SOVIET TRADE PROTOCOL SIGNED IN ANKARA

[Text] A trade protocol between Turkey and the Soviet Union for 1982 was signed in Ankara today. The protocol, which envisages the amount of trade between the two countries for this year, was signed by Turkish Commerce Ministry Agreements Department Director General Dincer Atena and Soviet Ministry of Foreign Trade Administration Chief Kuznetsov.

In a statement at the signing ceremony, Atena said the bilateral trade volume of $600 million envisaged for 1982 indicated a great development in trade relations between the two countries. He added that trade with the Soviet Union, which has been based on barter, will be made with foreign exchange beginning in 1983.

In turn, Kuznetsov said no efforts will be spared in a bid to achieve the target trade volume set up in the protocol. Pointing out that both countries are willing to conduct substantive activities in a bid to promote mutual trade, Kuznetsov added that cotton-picking machines, tractors and trucks would be offered to Turkey with very good conditions. He said the Soviet Union would buy some agricultural products from Turkey instead of trying to grow them itself.

PAPER CHARGES GREEK CYPRIOTS STEAL UN WEAPONS

NC191246 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 16 Jan 82 pp 1, 11

[Ziya Akcapar report]

[Excerpts] Nicosia (HURRIYET) -- While Greece is continuing to send arms and troops to Cyprus, the Greek Cypriots have broken into the headquarters of the United Nations peace force at Nicosia International Airport and stolen 287 tons of arms and ammunition of Czechoslovak manufacture!

According to our information, confirmed both by military and civilian sources, stolen in this robbery, which was carried out under the control of the Greek intelligence organization and the intelligence organization of the Greek General Staff, were antitank missiles, antiaircraft missiles, 108-mm mortars, recoilless rifles and light and heavy machineguns.

In report S-10564/2 submitted to the Security Council by the UN secretary general, it is stated that 287 tons of arms and about 7 million rounds of ammunition in 10,850 cases were kept under a dual lock-and-key system. Now these arms and ammunition have been stolen, but no one knows when. The most interesting aspect of this arms theft, the biggest of its kind in history, is that the UN secretary general has not so far submitted any report to the Security Council, though it is his duty to do so, nor has he given any information to Turkey, which is a party to the agreement placing the arms and ammunition under lock and key.

Another interesting aspect of this matter, which is characterized "as an unprecedented scandal," is that the UN officials we asked, far from verifying the information, showed great sensitivity as to how HURRIYET learned about it.

On the other hand, while we were inquiring into the biggest arms theft in history, we caught Greek Prime Minister Papandreou "red-handed"!

Twenty days ago, when we were inquiring into the case, we happened to establish that the Larnaca-Nicosia road was closed to civilian traffic. We also found that this is repeated frequently.

We also discovered that there is a ban on civilian traffic on certain days of the week when the Pireaus-Crete-Limassol ferry is operating. Starting from Piraeus, these boats are frequently escorted by the Greek Navy to Crete, where supplies are obtained, without any civilians being allowed to approach the vessel.

The following is the information we obtained regarding the arms stockpiling affair in which we caught the Greek prime minister "red-handed":

1. Brazilian "Milan" antitank missiles and (Jaracara) tanks with rubber tires [as published] have been deployed opposite the Turkish Cypriots in the vicinity of Morphou. Up to 20 days ago, the Greek Cypriot Army did not possess these tanks and antitank missiles.

2. Modern Argentine (Sucuri) tanks with 90-mm guns are on the island. This is the first time these highly sophisticated tanks have been seen.

3. One of the 120 (Cascavel) armored vehicles purchased from Brazil which are fitted with a 90-mm gun, an antiaircraft gun, radar and an electronic telescopic sight is positioned on the Nicosia-Famagusta road. Papandreou has denied the existence of this vehicle. These vehicles appear to have arrived only within the past 20 days.

Some surface-to-surface missiles have been stored at the Athalassa camp, in southern Nicosia, by Greek officers.

Arms Going to Kurds

NC200806 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 17 Jan 82 pp 1, 11

[Cem Basar report]

[Text] Athens (HURRIYET) -- It has been determined that some of the arms and ammunition stolen by the Greek Cypriots from the UN peace force depot in Cyprus have been sent to the Kurds in Syria, Iraq and Iran.

According to information from well-informed sources in Athens, this operation is being conducted by Greek Cypriot socialist party leader Lissaridhis and his men. The sources maintain that Lissaridhis has formed a secret army in the Greek Cypriot sector of the island. Militants in this secret army are being trained in Palestinian camps in Libya and Lebanon. It is also reported that Czechoslovak and Cuban military advisers in Cyprus are engaged in forming commando groups from among these militants.

It is stated that the goal behind sending these arms to the Kurds is to encourage activities which would upset Turkey.

On the other hand, according to information reaching Athens, Lissaridhis is planning a coup against Greek Cypriot leader Kiprianou. It is being stated that after accomplishing the coup, Lissaridhis will launch an operation against the Turkish Cypriots.

SECURITY FORCES ARREST 51 LEFTIST MILITANTS

TA191639 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1525 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Text] Ankara, 19 Jan (AA) -- Fiftyone more militants of the left-wing extremist groups "Dev-Yol" and "Dev-Sol" (Revolutionary Path and Way) have been caught by security forces in recent operations in Ankara, Izmir and Mugla Provinces, Ankara police formally announced Tuesday. Several members of the two illegal groups had already been caught in earlier crackdowns. Ankara police also confirmed those under custody included Ozlem Bilgin, using a false identity card, who was identified as an accomplice in the murder of ex-Premier Nihat Erim in Istanbul.

FOREIGN MINISTERS TO DISCUSS POLAND 9 FEB

[Text] West European foreign ministers will hold a mini-summit on Poland in Madrid on 9 February, during the plenary session of the Madrid conference. Diplomatic sources have said that the decision to hold the meeting stems from the military coup of 13 December and the fact that the Madrid conference provides an appropriate forum for discussing the matter.

PRESIDENCY ISSUES STATEMENT ON RESIGNATION ISSUE

[Text] The presidency has reiterated the gist of statements by presidential spokesman Joaquim Letria published in yesterday's DIARIO DE LISBOA newspaper. Joaquim Letria went on television this evening to read a statement in which the possibility of Ramalho Eanes's resignation is mentioned once again.

[Begin Letria recording] As he has always stated -- and will not cease to maintain -- he takes the view that it is to the members of parliament -- and them alone -- that the historic duty falls to approve what amendments to the constitution they may deem necessary and adequate. Therefore, the president will in no way seek to set limits on the task of revising the constitution, nor will he have the slightest hesitation in promulgating the law finally approved.

It is not within the jurisdiction of the president to put forward any proposal for revising the constitution. But he has a democratic, political and moral duty to appraise the approved revision in terms of the responsibilities he undertook when he was elected by universal suffrage, and in terms of the continuity of our political regime on the basis of the balance of powers, of the democratic clarity of the meaning of the vote [as heard], on the existence of political alternatives and on the fulfillment of freely accepted commitments.

For this reason, the president does not abdicate his constitutional, political and personal right to consider, among other possibilities, that of his eventual resignation should he consider that damage has been done to the conditions essential for discharging the responsibilities he has accepted. [end recording]

SOVIET PROTEST OVER VISA DENIAL REJECTED

LD192110 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Excerpt] According to an official source, Portugal today rejected a protest from the USSR over the refusal of entry visas to Soviet citizens. A Foreign Ministry spokesman said that the Soviet Government conveyed to the Portuguese ambassador to Moscow its protest over the refusal of visas, invoking the Helsinki Final Act as grounds for the protest. The spokesman added that Ambassador Antonio Patricio had been instructed to tell the Soviet Government that the refusal of visas is a sovereign act for which no explanations are owed, and that, as far as freedoms are concerned, and specifically with regard to implementing the Helsinki Final Act, Portugal will take lessons from no one, least of all the USSR.

KREISKY INTERVIEWED ON PROSPECTS FOR POLAND

AU201646 Vienna PROFIL in German (special issue on Poland) 15 Jan 82 pp 24-26

[Helmut Voska interview with Chancellor Bruno Kreisky on Poland, headlined: "To Intervene Means Nuclear War" -- date, place not given]

[Excerpts] PROFIL: Mr Chancellor, you have spoken of the "Third World-historic attempt to overcome a communist regime." Has this attempt also finally failed as did the ones in Hungary and the CSSR, or is there still some hope for Poland?

Kreisky: At the present moment I tend to believe that there is still some hope for Poland. However, it is not a realistic goal to aim at tearing Poland out of the communist bloc. That would be such a complete change from the conditions created by World War II -- perhaps a few people in the United States can imagine something like that. People who know the real conditions will certainly not believe that. However, within this bloc system there may perhaps be a possibility for certain elbow room and leeway. If what the Polish ambassador has written me today is correct, then it is indeed the intention of the military regime to preserve the hard-won liberties and to respect the reform movement. Thus everything is theoretically still possible.

PROFIL: And in practice?

Kreisky: One does not know how this will develop in practice because probably the military regime has destroyed more than was originally intended. Once such military machinery starts moving, it overruns everything.

PROFIL: Do you exclude a Soviet intervention for the foreseeable future?

Kreisky: I think that one can already exclude it. A Soviet intervention is no longer necessary. The military apparatus has achieved full control of the situation...

PROFIL: Dreadful as that may be...

Kreisky: Dreadful as that may be. But that is nothing new in Poland. At one time, there was the Pilsudski military dictatorship in that country, which was fascist, and now there is a military dictatorship which is communist. The method, the brutality is the same. The big question is whether after the clashes that have taken place any gesture of reconciliation is still possible at all.

PROFEL: Hardly conceivable: The Solidarity leaders are locked up -- which leaves the church.

Kreisky: It seems that there is not much left of the trade union, except some cadres pushed underground. I don't know what possibilities the Roman Catholic Church has. But one should beware of the mistake of believing that the church is a parapolitical organization. It is not. It cannot be that, that would be overtaxing it.

PROFIL: But in parts of South America it surely does play such a role.

Kreisky: Yes, it can launch a movement, it has done so in Poland, too, but it cannot lead a political movement. It lacks everything that is required by a political apparatus. One can be a moral authority, one can make one's voice heard, but in the long run the church cannot lead a political movement.

PROFIL: Poland's example did not have any consequences in the East bloc?

Kreisky: In the sense of the old Trotskyists and Leninists this would have been quite a realistic conception had there been a similarly revolutionary situation against communism also in Hungary, the GDR and the Soviet Union. Then this would have been a great beginning, but that was their big mistake -- nothing stirred. The Polish workers class was left alone, and that is actually the real reason for the inevitability of this defeat.

PROFIL: Would there have been a chance to handle things differently?

Kreisky: I don't know. But one thing is certain: Some day this military dictatorship will be confronted with the question: "What is the matter with the party?" The military dictatorship can restore peace and order, but it cannot build up a party. No purely communist state can exist without the communist party. Surely one will not simply restore the old nomenclature. Thus the entire further course of the Polish development is uncertain. Theoretically it is possible that a certain renewal will begin where there is now a great vacuum. But whether this is possible in practice in view of the brutality with which the regime proceeded, in view of the dead, seems doubtful.

PROFIL: You say: "We must not extend our hand to a regime that is fighting against its people." In my opinion, that is a very cowardly and opportunist formulation. Should a courageous Western social democrat and freedom-loving statesman not rather say -- to stay with your metaphor -- "We must show our fist to a regime that is fighting against its people?"

Kreisky: Sure, you can show your fist. But it is only a powerless fist. There are only two alternatives, either an intervention, which means war....

PROFIL: ....nuclear war?

Kreisky: Yes, it means nuclear war. Since one is not ready to carry out such a military intervention, and does not have the moral right to undertake it....

PROFIL: ....the frontiers of lack of freedom and of starvation in Europe must remain unchanged forever.

Kreisky: No. What happened in Poland certainly was possible only because of the policy of detente. Without the policy of detente and without Helsinki, Solidarity would have never been possible at all.

PROFIL: Hungary '56 and the CSSR '68 happened before Helsinki.

Kreisky: But at that time the defeat was only a question of a few days or weeks. In Poland the whole thing did last as long as 1 and 1/2 years, and presumably there will be no intervention from outside, either. In this situation one cannot say: "either -- or." Where are those people, actually, who are ready to fight for Poland if the Poles themselves were ready to do so only to a very limited extent? Although one can say this from here only with great inhibitions: Realistically, the Solidarity leadership would have had to reckon with such a measure from the moment that a military man was assigned to the leading post in the state. From that moment on, one would have had to ask: "What shall we do in the event of such a development?" But the degree of organization of Solidarity was obviously not advanced enough to be prepared for such a situation.

PROFIL: Do you regard it as impossible for the West to buy Poland's freedom?

Kreisky: Yes. However, there are moral possibilities which the West must utilize in Poland's interest.

PROFIL: Which?

Kreisky: Strong words alone will not impress anyone. They may give oneself the feeling of having done something -- no more.

We all are rather strongly involved financially regarding Poland. There is no question that the Polish side is attempting to prove that all commitments can be fulfilled. Obviously, the Soviets have promised the Poles that they will pay the due interest. This is to express: "We want to maintain our economic relations with you." Thus one sits at the conference table with the Poles and will automatically have to talk about what is to be done. Poland continues to be materially indebted to the West. This situation must be used for reminding the Poles to keep the promises they have made over the past 1 and 1/2 years.

PROFIL: Do you really think that we could compel the military regime to adopt another course only because the Poles owe us a few billion schillings?

Kreisky: We certainly can expect appropriate endeavors leading to an internal reconciliation and democratization. That is nothing new at all. We have done that also vis-a-vis Turkey. But there the West is always blind in one eye. If a military dictatorship suits it, it tends to overlook its brutality. This is indeed turning us into hypocrites. We Austrians have always adopted this position toward Turkey and we are now also adopting it toward Poland. If one wants more aid from us, it must be clear to the other side that we will also make certain claims.

PROFIL: Are we not giving up our ideals, and thus ourselves, if we do no more than that, if our readiness to aid is confined to sending food parcels? Is all the artfulness of Western statesmen not capable of really helping the Poles? Your friend Mitterrand says: "Anything permitting us to overcome Yalta is good." Your friend Schmidt says: "Any alteration of Yalta would mean war." Which of them is right, in your opinion? How do you feel about morality?

Kreisky: Anyone opposing a peace treaty that has caused injustice is adopting a moral position. But the Yalta treaties are the result of World War II. To make an issue of Yalta now is, in my opinion, completely unrealistic. In Yalta the victorious powers reached a deal. This deal has turned out in such a way because the Western powers undertook their military effort only very late, and thereby spared themselves millions of dead. Since the West at that time was not able to set up a second front early enough, the main burden of the war against Hitler was carried by the Soviet Union. It conquered large parts of Europe before the West. This is how this division came about. No matter how one feels about Yalta, it is an injustice. But no war has ever brought justice. To think that one could now alter, through the example of Poland, a peace settlement no matter how unjust it maybe, is an illusion in my opinion. Morally, it would certainly be more just to give all people the right to self-determination. But we, too, have been unable to achieve this for ourselves. Everyone would reprimand us if we wanted to get South Tirol back.

PROFIL: As far as you are concerned, one notes a strange difference between what you said in 1968 regarding the Soviet intervention in the CSSR and what you are saying today about Poland. At that time you warned against the "appeasers." [English term used] Today one could regard you, in contrast to Mitterrand, as one of the "appeasers." Is this different approach due to the fact that in 1968 you were opposition leader while today you are chancellor?

Kreisky: No. I only warned the Poles at a very early stage and unfortunately proved to be right in that one cannot merely strike, one also must bear responsibility. Trade union slogans alone are not enough. It would have been necessary for the trade union to show a readiness to take on a share in managing things and in responsibility. The trade union always demanded of the other side that it should improve the situation, but it could not do that because the country's leadership was completely impotent. Solidarity has again and again demonstrated before the whole people how little the government was able to govern -- and thus it contributed to bringing about this military development. I said very clearly, 3 or 4 months ago, what disastrous consequences a military intervention would have. Probably we thereby even contributed a great deal toward preventing a Soviet invasion of Poland. But even such a military intervention could not have been prevented by the West.

PROFIL: How about our future policy regarding relations with the Polish military dictators?

Kreisky: It is our task to remind the Polish Government of its commitments, to constantly remind it of what it itself has promised. If the Polish Council of Ministers chairman, in a long letter to me, again commits himself by saying: We want detente in Europe, and we want to serve the process in Poland....

PROFIL: ...then you believe him?

Kreisky: I don't believe it, but I can demand again and again that he comply with it. He writes about the safeguarding of peace in Europe, of good international relations. Naturally we will constantly remind them of that. We will ask again and again: How about those that you have locked up? and so forth. We can refer to Helsinki and we will do it again and again. But here I must say something very clearly: If it wants to be honest, the West must not be blind in one eye when referring to human rights, and display a much more conciliatory attitude toward certain trends such as those occurring in Spain and elsewhere than it does regarding Poland. The West will no longer be allowed to make the certain distinction between dictatorships that are friendly or hostile toward it. We are taking a very strong moral position here. As far as Poland is concerned, although I loathe the Jaruzelski military regime just as much as the Pilsudski military dictatorship, we must see realistically the political difference of whether or not this regime is overrun by foreign intervention. That is no appeasement toward the regime -- a dictatorship is a dictatorship. As long as resistance is offered, as long as a struggle is waged, the sympathy of the democrats can only be on the side of those who offer resistance.

PROFIL: On the part of the hundreds of thousands of peace marchers there is also this certain blindness in one eye?

Kreisky: Yes, it exists. That is something I have always fought against. One must also protest against the Russian submarines which appear in foreign waters. That is something they did not like to hear at all. And one also has to protest against the Polish military dictatorship.

PROFIL: Your party friend Hindels was permitted to warn, with the support of the Socialist Party organ ARBEITER-ZEITUNG: "It must not be overlooked that in the Solidarity trade union there were forces which were not concerned with representing the workers interests but with seizing power and with tearing Poland out of the Warsaw Pact system." Is that not something which we could all only wish for politically?

Kreisky: It is certainly true that within Solidarity there was a very radical wing which wanted to lead this whole trade union movement into a revolutionary process against the ruling communists. That is a radical but quite legitimate concept, and nothing is more miserable than polemical advocates of communism who claim that this would per se be something illegitimate, something criminal. No, that is an evolutionary development, as the communists themselves have actually always depicted it. Those are the disappointed ones who believe that communism can be saved from the left. I don't believe that.

PROFIL: But Poland's example certainly proved for any half-way normal person the hostility of communism toward the workers?

Kreisky: Yes, the hostility toward the workers is simply inherent in the communist system. Poland is supplying the best proof that a new class rule was set up there. If a political system, for which we have the term nomenclature if a party actually no longer exists, for some reason collapses and reveals its hollowness, communism has no other choice but to resort to soldiers and arms. Wherever a communist system can no longer withstand the storms of the time, the soldiers march: military dictatorship in the truest sense of the word. It ranges actually from Marshal Jaruzelski in Warsaw to Marshal Brezhnev in Moscow.

PROFIL: Mr Chancellor, thank you very much for this talk.

SAUDI ARABIA'S SHAYKH AL-KHAYL VISITS KREISKY

AU201139 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 20 Jan 82 p 1

[Text] Shaykh Muhammad al-'Ali Aba al-Khayl, Saudi Arabian minister of finance and national economy, arrived in Vienna yesterday for an official visit, and in the late afternoon paid a visit to Chancellor Bruno Kreisky at his villa. Today the Saudi Arabian minister will have talks with Finance Minister Herbert Salcher on a deepening of mutual economic relations. As has been learned from the Finance Ministry in this context, the question of possible Saudi Arabian financial aid for the international conference center project at the Vienna UN City will not be discussed at these talks.

TERRORIST TRIAL SENTENCE EXPECTED THIS WEEK

[Summary] On 19 January, the second day of the Vienna trial of synagogue terrorists Marwan Hasan and Husham Rajih, several witnesses gave their testimony regarding the assassination of Vienna City Councilman Heinz Nittel, including Nittel's widow and his driver. Only one eyewitness was able to give a vague description of the assassin. After hearing the testimony of the two policemen wounded in the synagogue attack, the judge ordered the defendants' presumed case officer, Bahij Yunis, to appear in court as a witness. Yunis, who is in police custody awaiting trial, declared that he did not know either of the defendants and was seeing them now for the first time. Asked by the judge why, nevertheless, the passports and documents of the two defendants were found in his apartment, Yunis claimed to have received them from a contact man -- a man named Fuad -- who on a later occasion in Salzburg also handed him the weapon that had killed Nittel.

Asked by the prosecutor why he had made a confession to the police and to the investigating magistrate, Yunis claimed that he had been beaten and threatened with Israeli secret police arresting his relatives living in Israeli-occupied territory. Confronted with Rajih's original confession in which Rajih described himself as Nittel's murderer and Yunis as the man who had given him his orders, Yunis declared: "I have been informed that Nittel's murderer was not an Arab. I am merely talking about what Fuad has told me." He refused to give the court any information about this Fuad, stressing that to him Fuad was a "holy man." Since the testimony of the witnesses took less time than was estimated, the trial is expected to conclude before the end of this week. The trial will continue today, 20 January, with the testimony of various experts.

TWO AUSTRIANS HELD BY PLO GROUP IN BEIRUT

AU201137 Vienna KURIER in German 20 Jan 82 p 16

[Text] The situation in a cellar dungeon in Beirut is dramatically exacerbating: as KURIER has exclusively reported, 33-year-old Viennese Peter Ecker has been held captive there since 15 December. Ecker was kidnapped by the radical PLO splinter group "Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine."

The killers [English word used] argue that the Viennese cheated them out of $450,000 (over 7 million schillings) in an arms deal. As the Foreign Ministry has learned, the political-gangsters have been holding a second hostage since Sunday: a man by the name of Peter Baryli, also from Vienna and a business friend of Peter Ecker. Baryli had traveled to Beirut last weekend to intervene on behalf of his partner.

Austria's diplomatic representative in Beirut, Embassy Chancellor Othmar Wiedenhofer, cannot do much in this matter. Wiedenhofer, described by Foreign Ministry spokesman Robert Wiesner as an "able man," has so far refused to negotiate with the criminals at some meeting place. His reasons: During a similar operation the Algerian Embassy chancellor was recently killed by submachineguns in a public street; and, by capturing Wiedenhofer the PLO radicals would hold a third hostage for whom Austria would then actually have to shove 7 million through the cellar window. Steps to rescue the two hostages are currently under consideration at the Foreign Ministry. KURIER will report on the results.

LAMBSDORFF: AGREEMENTS WITH POLAND TO BE KEPT

[Text] Bonn, 20 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Economics Minister Otto Graff Lambsdorff has emphasized the Federal Government's intention to fulfill existing agreements with Poland. With reference to the U.S. economic sanctions, Lambsdorff said today in the Bundestag: "Nothing will be changed that has been agreed upon and written down." The Federal Government will keep all agreements which are jointly carried. A political decision would have to be taken in individual cases as they arise.

Lambsdorff recalled the difficulties in deciding which deliveries should be included under sanctions and which ones should be counted as food or humanitarian aid in helping the Polish population. This is particularly the case with spare parts deliveries for Polish industrial plants, specifically for mining. Without these spare parts, coal mining would come to a halt. "Without the spare parts, production cannot continue," Lambsdorff said. "If there is no production, coal is not mined. If there is no coal there will be no foreign earnings. Without earnings food cannot be paid for."

POSTAL CHARGES ON POLISH PACKAGES WAIVED

[Excerpt] Bonn, 20 Jan (DPA) -- Despite difficult financial and legal problems, the Federal Government is apparently determined to facilitate for a limited period the removal of postal charges on gift packages to Poland. Addressing the Federal Cabinet which today discussed the pros and cons of removing the charges along the lines of Sweden's example, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt affirmed his willingness, according to Government Spokesman Kurt Becker, to overcome the existing bureaucratic obstacles. The Federal Cabinet's attitude toward a corresponding Bundestag motion is one of "a great deal of sympathy."

The obstacles, according to Becker include the fact that Poland and the GDR have refused in talks with the Federal Ministry of Posts and Telecommunications to forgo their portion of the charges in the case of gift packages. Waiving the charges on 2 million packages, the number sent to Poland over Christmas alone by federal citizens, would lead to the post office losing an income of DM42.5 million, according to Becker.

POLISH UNIVERSITY DIRECTORS VISIT CANCELLED

LD210305 Hamburg DPA in German 1717 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 20 Jan (DPA) -- An official visit, which has been planned for some time, of a delegation of Polish university directors to the FRG in February has been cancelled by Warsaw. It might now only take place in 1983. In connection with this cancellation, the president of the German rectors' conference, Prof. George Turner, said in a letter to the charge d'affaires at the Polish Embassy that the imposition of martial law in Poland, with all its "clear negative consequences" for the universities of that country, made the German universities very concerned.

SPOKESMAN CONFIRMS 'EMPLOYMENT PACKAGE' PLANS

LD201604 Hamburg DPA in German 1500 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 20 Jan (DPA) -- Government Spokesman Kurt Becker confirmed today the Federal Government's plans for an "employment package."

He stressed that there had so far been no decision as to its scale and how it would be financed. Newspaper figures of DM6-7 billion were described as pure speculation by Becker. This sum corresponds with the wishes of the trade unions.

In an interview in QUICK magazine published today, Federal Economics Minister Lambsdorff emphasized his rejection of an economics program financed through higher taxes or higher loans. He expressed his opposition to a reduction of working time. "I know it is difficult to understand, but even though we have too few jobs, my answer is: If we want to get more jobs, then we must work more, not less, to get them," the FDP politician said. "We must work more and thus become more competitive and offer cheaper goods," he said.

U.S. CHARGED WITH 'HYPOCRISY' OVER POLAND

DW201257 [Editorial Report] Hamburg ARD Television Network in German at 2100 GMT on 19 January carries in its regularly scheduled program "Panorama" a 13-minute Horst Hahno report which draws attention to the "hypocrisy" of U.S. foreign policy where military dictatorships are involved. The report is intended to show the difference in U.S. attitude toward the Polish military regime and the military dictatorships elsewhere, above all in Central and Latin America.

Moderator Peter Gatter introduces the report by saying that even as respected a newspaper as the New York TIMES has already come up with the idea "that somebody interested in morals only and always in the sphere of the other superpower may well be considered a hypocrite." In his report Horst Hahno begins with Turkey and cites the death sentences, the persecution of trade unions and other drastic actions by the military regime. "In November the U.S. secretary of defense congratulated the military regime in Turkey on the extraordinary manner in which it restored law and order." Washington promptly increased military aid. "Sanctions against the military dictatorship in Poland, and money and arms for the military dictatorship in Turkey," Hahno says, asking: "Does this not testify to double standards?"

At this point Hahno inserts a film clip containing statements by U.S. Secretary of State Haig in Brussels concerning "double standards." Hahno says that it may be that the military men in Turkey prevented civil war, yet at present the prosecutors in uniform "demand nearly 3,000 death penalties, 35,000 people are detained in prisons and camps," and suspects are being "tortured to death. Is this compatible with the values about which the U.S. secretary of state is talking?" Hahno asks.

As for Chile Hahno asks: "Are we tearing down our values masochistically if we recall Chilean President Salvador Allende?" Though elected democratically he was boycotted by the U.S. Government from the very beginning. Then the "military came with the support of the U.S. intelligence service, CIA, to save the fatherland," Hahno points out, adding that when Pinochet established his military dictatorship, the U.S. Government lifted all boycott measures and granted the dictator every support. After the putsch the military outlawed parties and the democratic trade unions: "Their leaders were arrested, tortured and murdered, and to this day anyone advocating freedom and democracy is threatened with the same fate.

Last year President Reagan lifted all sanctions which his predecessor Carter had imposed on Chile for violation of human rights."

Hahno maintains that while Haig's outrage over Poland is justified, it might just as well be directed against most governments in Latin America. Referring to the many lives lost last year in El Salvador, the reporter says that "the army, police, and rightwing gangs are murdering and terrorizing people who oppose them, innocent people, even women and children." Behind all this is the small upper class in El Salvador which holds power. Hahno says that "1,500 soldiers and officers from El Salvador are currently being given special training in the United States. The Reagan government plans to increase military and financial aid to the junta."

In Guatemala, the report continues, more than 500 people a month are murdered by rightist radical terror gangs on the order, or at least with the tacit agreement, of the government.

"The Reagan government has announced that it will again cultivate normal relations with Guatemala. Carter's policy of isolating Guatemala because of violations of human rights was a mistake, the Reagan government says."

In Argentina, Hahno continues, thousands of women are still searching in vain for their missing sons and husbands. Anmesty International estimates the number of people abducted by terror commandos during the past 6 years at nearly 20,000. "The Reagan government helped the military regime in Buenos Aires limit a critical investigation by the United Nations into the missing people. Secretary of State Haig declared that the United States and Argentina are allied through common values, above all by the belief in God."

Horst Hahno then continues by saying: "Ronald Reagan is consistent. The facts make it clear that what stands in the foreground of his policy is the interests of the United States as a great power. The President has never denied this." At this point a film clip is shown of President Reagan during a speech when he said: "To those neighbors and allies who share our freedom, we will strengthen our historic ties and assure them of our support and firm commitment. We will match with loyalty." However this holds true even if "the subjects of the dictators do not share America's freedom." Hahno comments saying this is "loyalty and support even to the most brutal generals who in their own country have extinguished every spark of freedom, as long as they offer the guarantee of the preservation of the political and economic interests of the United States."

It is only in Poland that "the military" are seen as "enemies of freedom," Hahno says. "The great power Soviet Union does not tolerate any freedom in its sphere of influence. The workers movement in Poland is being oppressed by the military dictatorship and the hopes of the Polish people for democracy have been smashed for the time being. Yet the concern of the United States as a great power and in particular of the Reagan government over the rights of liberty for which Solidarity and Lech Walesa have fought, is incredible as long as the United States remains blind in its right eye," the correspondent declares.

Peter Gatter concludes this "Panorama" feature by saying that "it is nothing new that great powers are inclined to be hypocritical when it benefits their political interests. This will probably never change."

CORRESPONDENT VIEWS REAGAN'S FIRST YEAR

[Jan Reifenberg article]

[Excerpts] Washington, 19 January -- The great hopes and promises of Ronald Reagan which impressed the voters in 1980, have yielded to sobriety 1 year after he took office. After 12 months the 40th president of the United States understands that neither U.S. domestic nor foreign policies can be pursued according to popular election campaign slogans, but that these policies must be adapted to certain facts created mainly by economic and world policy forces. Opinion polls show that a majority of people believe they are worse off in January 1982 than 1 year ago.

It seems that this president, for whom the unity and strength of the Atlantic alliance were a matter of belief and conviction, must lend a hand in the coming 3 years in newly defining NATO tasks. Forces of deterioration are apparently at work in the alliance and particularly in the Federal Republic, as was demonstrated by the Polish example. Many Europeans are apparently more afraid of being protected by modern arms in the face of a clear threat by the Soviet Union than they are of the stern demonstration of Soviet toughness in Poland. One year after Reagan assumed office, the following must be clearly said: The impression currently created in the United States by those allies who fear for their lives and hang on to the "detente" illusion, is fanning the existing basic trend toward consideration of one's own interests and at least spiritual isolationism. Those who elected Reagan are particularly capable of implementing such feelings politically if their disappointment over the European attitude grows.

AMENDED NATIONALIZATION BILL TO BE RESUBMITTED

[Summary] The cabinet discussed this morning the new amended bill on nationalizations and decided to submit it to parliament immediately. The procedure will be adopted whereby the text will be considered to have been passed unless the opposition submits a censure motion in parliament. Pierre Beregovoy, secretary general to the presidency, commenting on the decision of the Constitutional Council to reject certain provisions of the original bill, said that anyone who sets himself the object of preventing the nationalizations desired by the country will be committing a serious mistake.

CHEYSSON RECEIVES EL SALVADOR REBEL LEADER

[Excerpt] Salvadoran opposition leader Guillermo Ungo was received by External Relations Minister Cheysson in Paris on 14 January. On Wednesday Mr Ungo had talks with PS First Secretary Lionel Jospin and with Mr Jacques Huntziger, deputy national secretary for international questions.

The Salvadoran opposition comprises the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front and the Democratic Revolutionary Front, which have been allied since last year. Mr Ungo pointed out that his talks with the head of French diplomacy corresponded to the desire to "extend the Salvadoran opposition's alliances in all sectors likely to encourage a negotiated political solution in El Salvador." Mr Ungo also reaffirmed the opposition front's refusal to take part in the elections scheduled to be held in El Salvador in March, which, he said, "will not facilitate any real solution and merely represent a bloody political farce."

GROUP CLAIMS RESPONSIBILITY FOR ATTACK ON REACTOR

[Text] Those responsible for the attack on Monday evening against the construction site of the Phoenix breeder reactor at Creys-Malville gave some details about their commando operation this evening. They telephoned AFP and confirmed that they fired five rockets. They made it clear that the fifth hit the dome of the reactor; that is, a vital spot, and that this will therefore delay the project, which was their objective. They stated that they did not intend a spectacular act and that they had taken all necessary measures to avoid wounding anyone. As for the Soviet origin of the launcher, they said that this is unrelated to either their composition or their objectives, and they reaffirmed that they are ecologists and pacifists.

SOVIET HUNGER STRIKER ASKS MITTERRAND FOR HELP

[Text] In Moscow a 43-year-old woman, Inna Lavrovna, has been on a hunger strike for 1 month because the Soviet authorities are preventing her from marrying a French engineer. The Russians do not like hearts to cross borders. Inna Lavrovna will carry the hunger strike through to the end. Here she is in an interview with our Moscow correspondent: [Begin Lavrovna recording] I now think only the French president can do something for us. I take the liberty of requesting, of appealing to President Mitterrand to intervene directly with Mr Brezhnev on our behalf. All our hopes are with him. [end recording] Scarcely 15 minutes after making that appeal to the French president, Inna Lavrovna was taken to the hospital in serious condition. I remind you that she has been on a hunger strike for 1 month.

BERLINGUER 11 JAN REPORT TO PCI CENTRAL COMMITTEE

PM181501 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 12 Jan 82 pp 1, 8, 9

[Apparent text of PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 11 January report to PCI Central Committee session in Rome: "PCI's critique, research, action stem from commitment to start in Europe new phase of struggle for socialism"]

[Text] This meeting of the Central Committee and Central Control Commission was called primarily because the party feels the need for a further in-depth study and at the same time for a consistent and more specific working commitment on the international plane and in Italy as a result of the issues that have arisen in connection with events in Poland and the assessment we have issued.

This is a just demand because the objectives we have set for ourselves -- to help eliminate the increased threats to detente and peace and to act in full awareness that we are in a new phase of the struggle for socialism -- are objectives that necessitate the maximum mobilization of all the party's energies and therefore the utmost lucidity of approach and conduct.

This demands that we develop at the same time the debate already underway in the various party forums, the initiative to ensure that our aims are promoted in practice and in people's minds and a calm and combative response to our adversaries' presumptions, maneuvers and attacks.

The aim of this meeting is to impart a thrust in these directions, which also involves a verification of the support of the Central Committee and Central Control Commission for the stances adopted by the Directorate, bearing in mind that one Directorate member, Comrade Cossutta, has expressed his sharp disagreement.

In our 30 December resolution we made a full analysis of the events in Poland and some more general historical and political observations about socialist-type societies and about relations among East European countries.

I do not believe there is any need to repeat one by one the assessments and stances contained in the document. What I do think would be useful, however, would be to return to some of the points that have raised and are still raising the most serious and disquieting questions -- and not only among our own comrades.

The public is asking whether the army's intervention and the recourse to martial law had not become inevitable in the Polish situation -- an admittedly serious and painful decision, but a necessary and "realistic" one in view of the threat of worse situations. We decided, and remain steadfastly convinced, that failure to express an immediate and resolute condemnation would be a major error, not only from the viewpoint of the principles and ideals in which we believe and the prospects of socialism, nor even just from the viewpoint of our responsibilities toward the Italian working class and people, but on account of Poland's specific needs of salvation and recovery. Moreover, we cannot accept that the Polish issue be reduced to the question of whether or not the 13 December military intervention was inevitable. A correct and responsible answer to this question too requires the kind of analysis that we felt the need and duty to make of the entire process that stemmed from the profound uprising of August 1980, which was initiated by the major part of the working class and by broad people's masses and which raised -- in different forms and with different protagonists and certainly in more drastic terms that at previous, albeit serious, moments of crisis (such as 1956, 1970 and 1976) -- the issue of renewal in the socioeconomic field and in the political system. For what reasons and due to which responsibilities was this problem not resolved positively and the outcome of 13 December reached?

It was in answer to this question that we pointed out first the importance of the substantial failure of the attempt that was, after all, made by the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] to extricate itself from a profound crisis and rupture in its relations with society and the working masses, in its leading role and its prestige.

The necessary renewal was hindered and challenged by the persistence of dogmatic and conservative stances and by vacillations and conflicts within the leadership groups and the entire party. We saw this as the final consequence of a prolonged atrophy in the party's life, which made it unable to withstand the test.

At the same time we cited the responsibility of the USSR and other Warsaw Pact countries for a line that was in general characterized by a substantial incomprehension of the profundity and nature of the Polish crisis, by mistrust and reservations with respect to the renewal process in which major sections of the PZPR, Solidarity and the Church were involved, which was reflected not only in an insistent ideological and political campaign but even in open and direct political interventions in the PZPR's life and decisions.

During this troubled and difficult ordeal we have not failed to mention the instances and dangers of tendencies toward confrontation and of the emergence of antisocialist and anti-communist stances. And there is no doubt that there were exaggerations and extremism in the demands, attitude and conduct of the new trade union too, in both the economic and political fields, which were mistaken and which had negative repercussions. But even the foothold gained by the extremist exaggerations and the inability to isolate them politically points to the party's responsibility -- its protracted inertia in promoting the working masses' real and continuous participation in political life, thanks partly to the absence of suitable instruments for giving the workers and citizens a voice and for expressing and resolving social conflicts.

From the moment the crisis exploded we never felt uninvolved in it. How could we have failed to give our most careful attention and to feel involved and bound up in an experience in which what was at stake was not only the possibilities of reform and development in a socialist-type society, but the future -- of a people like the Poles, whose history is rich in heroism and severe ordeals, national disasters and disappointments -- and, moreover, the independence and autonomy of a key nation with regard to the prospects of peace and detente in Europe? Our entire conduct since August 1980 has been inspired by our aim to contribute our utmost to the establishment of a policy of renewal, to dialogue and to the building of national understanding among the various political, social, cultural and religious components of Polish society. We intervened -- and I have no hesitation in using the word, because I believe we must not feel inhibited by any hypocritical confusion between the duty of noninterference (but who has really observed it?) in parties' and states' internal affairs and a suspension of judgment, excessive tact and reticence, which in any case constitute a stance in themselves -- we intervened with a constant sense of responsibility and moderation vis-a-vis the various forces involved, by means of discussion and public declarations, expressing the same opinions and attitudes both in direct and in confidential relations.

This policy of constant and consistent backing for Poland's socialist and national needs and interests entitles us to express our assessments openly, as we have done. So it was not only for our love and respect for the truth that we tried in our 30 December resolution to highlight the distant and recent causes of the tragic Polish crisis, and particularly of the failure of the aspirations and plans for renewal. Our denunciation and criticism, which we have often issued in different cases and situations, of the damage done -- by bureaucratic paralysis and high-handedness, by ideological and political conservatism and rigidity, by the loss of ideological and moral drive due to the merging of the party and the state and by extremism and the thrusts to corporative and anarchic excess -- are valid for two reasons: because of the duty to provide solidarity and assistance to the Polish people and nation and as a warning, from which we too must learn a lesson with regard to our own political outlook and battle.

Some sectors have asked us another question: Why have our stances of criticism and condemnation of the decisions taken 13 December been more severe and drastic than the stances adopted by other parties and governments that are not leftwing? I really do not believe this should cause any surprise. The severity and lucidity of our rejection are the result of the fact that the military coup and repression took place in a country led for decades by a communist party and in the name of socialism, that is, in the name of ideals that are the same as ours and that we feel have received a heavy blow.

Others might regard Poland with a certain detachment, or even from the viewpoint of a pure reason of state, which in so many parts of the world justifies the use of force, military regimes and even reactionary authoriatarianism. Not us -- and not only because we are among those, whom Sandro Pertini cited, who have never, anywhere or under any circumstances (from Latin America to Turkey) tolerated attacks and blows against the peoples' rights and freedoms, but because in this instance our history and ideals are called into question. All the more reason, then, for our protest and condemnation to be obligatory and clear and lucid. But having said that, I must specify at once that it is not at all true that our stances are the same as those of the conservative and rightwing forces or that they ultimately grant them some endorsement and help. In fact we differ quite clearly on what line should not be pursued with respect to Poland. Since we are resolutely opposed (as I will explain later) to the U.S. stances and to the attempts to impose on the EC countries too a policy of financial and economic sanctions against Poland and the USSR.

So what should we aim at and what should we do for Poland? This is now the crucial question.

A month after the proclamation of martial law and the military council's seizure of power, the situation is still grave and remains unacceptable. The current measures to violate people's consciences are particularly unacceptable. But despite everything, I do not believe it is rash to consider some improvement possible, that there will be a relaxation of the military's grip and that the essential conditions for a resumption of dialogue will be established. And obviously this is the direction in which to aim our initiative and commitment and, we believe, those of all the democratic forces and governments in Europe and Italy.

Indeed, nobody can be unaware that a deterioration, which would be disastrous, in the socioeconomic field -- which is unfortunately still a possibility -- would have catastrophic consequences, primarily for the whole of Poland, and would cause vast and terrible repercussions for everyone. If Poland were to experience a bloody conflict or economic collapse it would obviously cause a rupture in East-West relations, which would return to the rigidities and tensions of the cold war. It would affect the whole of Europe, and particularly the FRG's balanced stance and policy, which has been and remains a decisive condition for detente. The inevitable increased rigidity of the blocs and the exacerbation of the logic of confrontation would primarily damage the possibilities of renewal in the Warsaw Pact countries and, in Western Europe, all the leftwing, progressive and peace-loving workers forces and the fundamental objectives of detente, disarmament and democratic development in Western Europe. This is why, apart from condemning the military intervention, we immediately exerted pressure, which must be kept vigorous and strong, for the prompt release of the citizens arrested, for the restoration of conditions of greater freedom in civil and social life and for a resumption of the quest for dialogue and understanding among the various forces of Polish society, with the Church and with the trade union, so that the Poles can resolve their country's problems independently and autonomously, not by the use of force and repression but politically, along a peaceful and democratic path.

The policy of reprisals and sanctions is entirely wrong and foolish. Any attempt to isolate or throttle the Polish people is cynical and would be considered so by them. This could only exacerbate the hardships and suffering of the people's masses, further burden the bad economic situation and encourage desperate solutions, but certainly could not create prospects for a resumption of freedoms and of a democratic recovery. Exactly the opposite must be done: Poland must be helped to recover. It is specific and responsible acts of solidarity and support that can facilitate progress beyond the military forces' emergency regime. Another factor that could exert a decisive influence to this end is a resumption of the detente process in Europe and worldwide. It would be dangerous if the United States and other countries were to continue along the path of economic reprisals, even against the USSR (and we must denounce the fact that Italy stands out among these countries on account of the postures adopted by the government and some of the majority parties with a view to suspending and deferring cooperation accords and agreements for the construction of the methane gas pipeline from the USSR to Europe), and it would be very dangerous if there were a halt in the Geneva negotiations and in all attempts at dialogue and agreement on disarmament. Any step that reduces tension and alleviates the climate of mistrust and suspicion and which support the demand for and possibility of nuclear arms reduction in Europe is in line with the shared interests of all countries on the continent and is also an essential contribution to Poland's independence and freedom.

The events in Poland demanded an examination of our verdict on the present state of the East European socialist-oriented societies. The analysis of the document was designed to embrace the basic elements, typical factors and phenomena of a general nature, though obviously there are differences among the various contries. These differences can in some cases be considerable and qualitative, and from this viewpoint one could cite -- apart from the specific case of Yugoslavia, which has a separate history of its own based on the longest and broadest people's resistance and liberation struggle in Europe -- the situation in Hungary, for instance. Nevertheless, I believe it was correct to stress, in our historical and political deliberations on the overall situation in these societies, the negative consequences and damage that have in general resulted from the substantial adoption of a single model -- the Soviet kind -- with regard to not only the economy but above all the political system (of which an official ideological system is an essential component) and the obstacles that have been raised to the demands for cricital updating, for reforms and for renewal. These demands were, moreover, noticed and acknowledged, starting with the USSR and the failures in which these attempts resulted because of a tenacious clinging to this model.

It was on the basis of facts that we reached the conclusion that the "phase of socialist develpment that began with the October Revolution has exhausted its propulsive capacity" and that in those countries a crisis has come about in the capacity for political, economic and cultural renewal, with the danger not only of continuous conflicts between demands for renewal and authoritarian rigidity but of regressive elements.

People are asking why we have only now issued such a clear-cut and substantial verdict. The fact is that over the years there has been no lack of open and specific criticisms and more general elements of analysis from us whenever we have been confronted with manifestations of crisis or conservative or regressive-type trends or actions. There is no need to repeat the stances that we adopted from the 20th Congress through the Yalta memorandum and the intervention in Czechoslovakia. Whoever remembers the documents and debate of our latest congress and the fundamental arguments behind our strategic options cannot feign surprise and must recognize that they embodied essential premises for the general verdict that we have now reached. Nevertheless it would be absurd to underestimate the impact of the Polish tragedy. Why only now? Were the hopes of a positive outcome to the Polish crisis justified? We wonder.

Let whoever did not believe in the possibility of a new phase, of a change in a democratic direction in Polish life, cast the first stone. Of course we did not close our eyes to the difficulties and dangers of a movement that was profoundly shaking social and political orders but which showed new characteristics -- even with respect to previous crises in Poland -- because the essential workers' forces had become directly and vigorously involved, because the PZPR and even the Catholic Church, which in Poland has historically had a special and very important role and influence, were substantially committed to the reform process. This is why we -- but not only we, I repeat -- hoped for and believed it possible for Polish socialism to develop in a democratic and pluralistic direction. However, this outcome did not materialize. This, then, is why the need for a comprehensive and in-depth examination of the reasons for the failure of this attempt too -- following the one in Czechoslovakia and the previous cases in Poland after the substantial lapse of the ideas of renewal launched at the 20th CPSU Congress -- became more pressing; this is why it was necessary to carry out a thorough identification of the causes of the critical phenomena that characterize the East European countries. One cannot either eliminate or ignore -- as I believe Comrade Cossutta does -- past and present facts, and I am not referring only to Poland and the tragedy still looming over it. One must not forget or adultorate the real facts -- for instance, the economic constrictions that still force the USSR to purchase 23 million tons of grain from the enemy power; the permanent and lamentable limitations of rights of freedom; the lack of participation; and the widespread phenomena of depoliticization among the younger generations and of disorientation among intellectuals.

We must not close our eyes to all this or to the risk of further negative and dangerous factors emerging unless there are real changes and a serious effort of reform. If we now failed to observe this need for truth and lucidity, if we hesitated to shoulder this responsibility, we would be failing in our internationalist duty as communists and, above all, would be committing the unpardonable sin of not preparing and forearming our party in a situation bristling with so many difficulties and in the face of such extremely difficult tests. This is why in the Directorate document we wanted to state, with scrupulous objectivity and a responsible sense of moderation, what we believe has been put at stake in the socialist-type societies and in the economic and political system of the East European countries.

To say that a historical phase in socialist development has exhausted its propulsive thrust certainly does not mean obscuring the extraordinary value of the October Revolution and the step forward that it signified for mankind. There is certainly no intention to dismiss the importance -- on a world scale -- of the gains and changes that there have been in the USSR and the other East European countries and of those that have been realized over the decades or to deny the reality, the objective weight and the role in today's world of the USSR and the other socialist-oriented societies.

It would be entirely absurd for us -- not only because we are communists but because we have been taught an awareness of history which nobody with any education and intellectual honesty at all should lack -- to use as our criterion for interpreting and appraising processes of worldwide dimensions and very complex transformations the idea that it was an interconnected and inevitable series of errors or to go as far as to identify the October Revolution as a kind of original sin! After which, however, we would still be grappling with the problems of a history and a reality that have had and still have a great influence in the modern world and which have played and still play a major role in so much of mankind's development.

The Method of Examination and Historical Judgment

It would be equally absurd for us now to judge existing socialism on the basis of empty ideological methods or preconditions; in other words, after indulging in the past in a kind of critical mythicization, for us now to allow ourselves to be involved in an opposite but similar manichean concept of diabolization, of identifying "evil" in the USSR and socialist-type societies and hence carrying out ritual excommunications and formal declarations of a break!

Our method is different, and we intend to follow it with increasing stringency and consistency: It is the method of precise examination and historical judgment, of differentiated analysis of reality, careful consideration of the effective policy and assessments based on facts.

It has happened and can happen that societies and states created by radical revolutions may stagnate, regress and experience periods of crisis. If we look at socialist-type countries (aside from the fact that for some of them it is difficult to find, as a foundation, a real and original revolutionary movement, in other words a mass, people's and national movement) it has been the case that, through the interaction of international and external factors, which had a powerful influence, and the mistakes made, particularly in the economic sphere (the forcing of development, authoritarian centralization and so forth), through the phenomena of bureaucratization (the party state, monolithism, the loss of the party's specific political function, Marxism distorted into a state ideology), through the prevalence of a closed dogmatism, even with some fanaticism (and it is worth noting that egalitarian concepts are particularly exposed to this danger as happened for centuries in Christianity), it is true that there has been a curious reversal of Marx's fundamental philosophical innovation: his criticism of ideology. Instead of reality, the transforming and creative practice of new facts and new ideas coming to the fore, ideology has come to the fore, and even a kind of ideological "credo" which is so-called "Marxism-Leninism" seen as an immovable body of doctrine of an almost metaphysical type and as a set of formulas which should inspire and guarantee a type of economic-political structure, a universally valid model to which the various situations and sectors of society must adapt and which it is the party's role to implement and impose as an inviolable principle.

This is one of the basic reasons for the difficulties, stagnation and crises. This is why we maintain that those societies need democratic innovations. But precisely because we are moved by historical inspiration our work should be aimed at objective and factual criticism and proposals. On the other hand I think there is little meaning or point in working on the basis of abstract definitions, in an intellectualistic search for the prerequisites of a socialist society which leaves out of consideration historical and political reality, or on the basis of peremptory assertions like, for example, the assertion of the "immutability" of the socialist-type society -- a theory whose soundness can be disputed at great length and which, moreover, does not help those who, like us, intend to fight for a new phase in the struggle for socialism and think that precisely by so doing we can also contribute to a democratic development of the East European countries.

We cannot say and do not know when or how these processes of renewal and democratic development will be able to progress. We definitely know that they are necessary. If they do not take place the risks would be great for everybody. If a process of reforms in these societies were not considered possible and if we did not intend to encourage it, what conclusion would have to be drawn? Possibly the resumption of the old policy of "rolling back" the Eastern Bloc countries? Or even the call for destabilizing insurrections if not direct preparations for war? That ought to be clear to all those who want to reason and not to exercise a demagogic "verbal heroism," to cite Willy Brandt.

Therefore it is not tension but detente which can encourage reform and democratic development in the Eastern bloc societies -- detente which is, at the same time, an essential objective of common interest to all countries in Europe and the world.

At last October's Central Committee meeting we analyzed and discussed the current international situation, the gravity and dangers of the existing crises and the responsibilities the United States and the Soviet Union bear for them. I do not intend to go back over that analysis; it has been confirmed by the events of the past few weeks. Indeed since then only one positive fact has been recorded: the start (not interrupted by the Polish events) of the Geneva negotiations due to the strong pressure exerted by an impressive European peace movement, a vast lineup of European political forces, the Catholic and other churches and some governments.

The Dialogue and Detente Policy

On the whole, however, the international situation is tending to deteriorate. Martial law in Poland, the provocative annexation of the Golan Heights by the state of Israel, the increased reactionary repression in Turkey, the explosive situation in Central America, South Africa's repeated acts of war against Angola, the persistence of all hotbeds of crisis -- from Kampuchea to Afghanistan, to the war between Iran and Iraq -- show how far we are from overcoming the difficult and dangerous international situation.

I would like to dwell on the problems of detente as seen after the Polish events.

I have already said that the economic sanctions proposed by the United States against Poland and the USSR dangerously heighten the already high level of conflict between the two superpowers and in addition cannot be of any help in reopening a renewal process in Poland.

If the sanctions proposal put forward and already partly implemented by the United States were to be accepted by the European allies, a rigid bloc concept, which should, instead, be gradually overcome, would emerge stronger and certainly not weaker on both sides.

Therefore it is easy to understand the resistance and opposition to this line shown by some European countries and particularly by the FRG (and by the SPD). It is being said that the rejection of sanctions is based solely on mercenary interests or that the line taken by the FRG is based only on German interests. It should be noted above all that both East-West trade and the development of relaxed relations between the FRG and GDR are very important for European and world peace.

In addition, refusing sanctions amounts to defending a policy of dialogue and detente, which remains one of the main conditions for encouraging both links among the various countries within the Warsaw Pact and increased autonomy within the Atlantic pact.

The ostpolitik -- to which our party made a practical contribution at Comrade Luigi Longo's initiative -- has certainly been one of the most fruitful ideas of detente in Europe and the one which has had the most positive effects on trends in Eastern bloc societies. But it is necessary to recall that conditions which prevented its full development since it had to coexist with a general frame work of East-West relations strictly governed by bilateral relations between the two superpowers, which continued to work for the rigid maintenance of the blocs and their logic and, in more general terms, for the defense and possible extension of their respective spheres of influence.

If the decisive decade of the seventies is analyzed objectively, it is not difficult to understand that the root of the present grave international crisis is not detente but the lack of a coherent development of detente. As Togliatti said 20 years ago, detente should have also produced a new chapter in relations between the two blocs with a view to overcoming them, without that representating a danger to anybody's security.

And it was intended to pave the way for seeking new forms of political and economic cooperation between the two superpowers, especially for the purpose of relieving regions of underdevelopment and hunger.

Instead of that there have only been agreements between the United States and the USSR regulating their respective strategic nuclear potentials, (SALT I and SALT II, and the latter has not yet been ratified and is even being called into question by the United States); a basis which, on its own, is too weak not to be gradually eroded, so that we are now on the threshold of a gigantic new step forward in rearmament.

Only the efforts of some Western and also Eastern European countries -- in addition to the nonaligned movement -- have secured results which are not negligible. It is no accident that it has been possible to talk of European detente even in these past few years of increased confrontation between the superpowers and of growing crisis in various parts of the world. But in the final analysis the international crisis has been aggravated partly by lack of initiative and unity in Europe. This means that the detente policy must not only be saved but enriched with new content and that all its dynamism must be channeled into the direction of disarmament and cooperation based on a new concept of security.

From this viewpoint the objective of overcoming blocs can no longer be a historical prospect discussed every now and then, but must become a practical political objective.

We confirm that we are not in favor of, nor are we seeking, destabilizing upsets in the balance between the two blocs because in the present international situation they would increase the threats to peace. But there is reason to wonder whether blocs conceived as the maximum guarantee of security are not becoming factors contributing to insecurity, whether, after being elements in European stability, they are not increasingly becoming causes of instability and whether, after being apparanetly unifying aggregations, they are not increasingly turning into causes of splits and divisions in a succession of crises and tensions among the allies in both blocs.

We are fully aware of the fact that the process of overcoming the blocs can progress only gradually and on the basis of reciprocal concessions.

This is not an easy problem because the delicate problem of security is at stake -- a problem which is more acute for the USSR and Europe for historical and geographical reasons, but which is also acute for the United States. No responsible political force or government can ignore the existence and importance of this problem and hence of the reciprocal security guarantees which should be given to the USSR and the United States, as well as to the whole of Europe, in terms of arms balance and control, mutual confidence-building measures and protection from the fear of a "first strike."

Through this course -- disarmament, economic cooperation, political agreements and guarantees of security with a view to the prospect of overcoming the blocs -- democracy and reforms can advance throughout Europe, also creating more favorable conditions for autonomous and peaceful development by the emergent peoples and for the assertion of the world role, which falls not only to the United States, the USSR and Europe but also to countries like China and India, in building a world order of peace and cooperation.

We can already take steps toward greater links between the blocs.

Why could not Europe -- Eastern and Western Europe -- be associated with the Geneva negotiations on the Euromissiles, with representatives taking part from the two alliances?

The presence of countries like Romania and the Netherlands, for instance, which take different positions from those of the respective blocs to which they belong, and also of other countries could be of help at the appropirate time in speeding up the negotiations and bringing them to a positive conclusion.

Other steps toward detente, disarmament and cooperation could be taken by the resumption of the Madrid conference; provided it is no longer used by anybody as a platform for propaganda and polemics; by the development of the Vienna negotiations on conventional weapons; and by the opening of other negotiations which might reduce tension and increase the channels for dialogue, thus breaking the spiral of the crisis in detente which is making everybody more insecure and more afraid of any change. And it is also possible to explore a sphere of negotiation — which, however, the Eastern and Western bloc countries regarded as explorable even in the cold war years -- through the creation of zones of security and nuclear-free areas. This too would be a step toward overcoming the blocs, still on the basis of parity and reciprocity.

If all these objectives are to be achieved it is vital that the peace movement, which has developed in such a promising and compelling way in Italy and Europe since last summer, finds new impetus and strength. The proclamation of martial law in Poland has curbed that movement. That was bound to happen.

But woe betide us if we give up. The increased tension makes it more necessary than ever for the movement to develop, maintaining the watchwords which have characterized it but updating its objectives, including that of an end to the military regime in Poland.

This need once again raises the subject of Europe's role. There is no doubt that over the past 2 years Europe has to some extent played a role of containment and at times of positive pressure on the two superpowers' policies. We saw that after the invasion of Afghanistan and in the opening of the Geneva negotiations, and we are seeing it now in the Polish events. Of course, the whole of Europe has not decisively taken this path. The Italian Government certainly has not when you consider the decisions taken on the Comiso base, on sending Italian troops to Sinai and on breaking off negotiations with the USSR on the gas pipeline (even though it has not yet succeeded in concluding an agreement with Algeria!). We will continue to oppose such decisions forcefully and tenaciously.

Fortunately other European governments have moved in the opposite direction. Nonetheless, it has to be noted that Europe has not succeeded in doing more than curbing the opposing irritations from the two superpowers and has failed to express and fully develop its own international policy line. For instance, it succeeded in securing the start of the Geneva negotiations but took a step backward in its Middle East initiative. The truth is that, despite all its objective potential and possibilities and despite the expectations focused on it from all parts of the world, Europe is finding it difficult to find a united ground for initiatives and a full awareness of its own role. That is partly due to the grave crisis in the European Community, whose lack of reform is producing an increasing number of nationalist phenomena and is tarnishing the essential idea of placing one's own national interests within a European dimension.

It is therefore more urgent and necessary than ever for the European workers movement and the whole European left to take positive action to overcome the present crisis. It is easy to understand (but only up to a point) how the fact that the community has been led substantially [by conservative forces, has sparked off opposition] to the very idea of integration among important leftwing forces and socialist and communist parties from the Labor Party to the PCF. But if we want change, it is now that the whole European left must accept and adopt the sphere of the unification process as a necessary area for its struggle for social reform, for democratic development and for the assertion of Europe's autonomous peace role on the international stage.

This brings me to the subject of the conditions and ways whereby socialism can be advanced in the world in the historical phase through which we are passing.

We have said that the driving impulse of the models of socialism achieved in the Soviet Union and other East European countries has been exhausted.

Of course, this does not mean there is any lack of material, political and ideological reasons and requirements for socialism or of motives for attaining it in the most diverse ways, as has happened and is happening in countries where the colonial system has collapsed. Indeed, we must appreciate the full world importance of the fact that many of those countries have made a socialist-type and not a capitalist-type of choice. That constitutes a final blow to the strength and prestige of capitalism on a world scale and at the sametime enriches mankind's journey toward socialism with new and original content and forms.

We must examine these experiences and do our utmost to defend their authenticity and autonomy from whoever wants to stifle them or divert them with the establishment of models typical of the capitalist West and from those aiming to superimpose on them the schemes and ideologies characteristic of the East European regimes.

But the decisive condition for imparting a new impetus to the advance of socialism worldwide (and also for making a real contribution to the process of democratic renewal in the East European societies) is for socialism to advance in the places of highest capitalist development, starting with Western Europe.

It is precisely in reference to this area that we talk about a third phase in the struggle for socialism.

While guarding against any kind of narrow-minded presumption, we must realize that the actual facts, both here and there, demand that the decisive resolutionary initiative be taken by the West European workers movement.

In relation to what do we talk about a third phase (or third way)?

Obviously -- though it would be as well to confirm this, since there are still some misunderstandings -- it is not a matter of seeking a middle path between socialism and capitalism. It is a matter of transcending capitalism at the state it has now reached here in the industrialized and developed West, and of surmounting it by building a kind of socialism that will be realized with guarantees of the safeguarding and development of the democratic freedoms already gained.

Moreover, we talk about a third phase (or third way) inasmuch as this comes after a first and second phase.

The first phase, as we said back at the 15th Congress, was the one during which the workers movement's first major economic, trade union and political organizations emerged in Europe. This happened at the end of the 19th Century and marked the beginnings of the socialist and social democratic phase in the struggling to transcend capitalism. From then on, major economic, social and political gains were achieved, together with a broad spread among the workers masses of a class awareness and of the aspiration to socialism.

This is not the time and place to go back over all the tumultuous events experienced by the socialist and social democratic parties through the present. The fact is that at the outbreak of World War I and the approval of war loans they (except for the Russians, who were opposed to it from the start of the war, and the Italians, who maintained through 1917 the position of "neither supporting nor sabotaging") backed the governments of their respective conflicting counties, abandoning internationalism and losing their own ideological and political autonomy from the bourgeoisie and from capitalism.

But it was in that same terrible historical crisis for Europe and for the workers movement that the Bolshevik's initiative intervened and the proletarian revolution triumphed in Russia.

Lenin was great because, upsetting all the current criteria and ideas of the workers movement, whereby revolution was the automatic result of a capitalist development that had reached its culmination, he realized that in the era of imperialism, of inequitable development (as well as of war), the conditions had been created for the rupture to take place in a country -- Russia -- that was at one of the lowest points of capitalist development in Europe and on the basis of a very broad alliance of all the oppressed masses centered on the revolutionary proletariat.

Was it an error? Such an absurdity can only still be supported by those who are in the grip of the most stubborn anticommunism or do not understand that the word "error" cannot be used to explain majestic events such as the 1917 revolution and the events that stemmed from it.

Rather, it is correct to say that Lenin imposed a distortion -- I would add a huge distortion -- on the course of events, and it was a distortion that burdened the entire subsequent course of life in the USSR. But it was that very distortion that saved Russia from decline. It wrested it from the backwardness in which it found itself under tsarism and opened the way to the establishment of a society and state autonomous from capitalism.

And it is a fact that that society and that state, despite the errors and even tragedies that marked their building, especially during the Stalinist period, were a decisive factor in the defeat of Nazi fascism and were for decades a reference point and foothold for millions of fighters for workers' freedom and emancipation in Europe and other parts of the world.

Indeed, on the world scale of the 1917 revolution not only led to the birth of communist parties but also prompted and imparted a thrust to manifold social and national liberation movements on every continent, including the Chinese communists, who later managed to impart an origianal course on their own to the revolution in their country, whose victory constituted a new stage in the world movmeent of liberation from imperailism and capitalism.

The October Revolution saw the start of a second phase in the struggle of the world workers movement for socialism, connected to and linked with the first phase.

Why do we now say that we have entered and are experiencing a third phase?

Have the socialist and social democratic parties disappeared, perhaps? As we well know, they have continued to exist and are indeed a majority force within the workers movement of many West European countries. Thanks to the scope provided by the functioning of capitalist mechanisms, they have also carried out particular social reforms that have improved the living conditions of the workers masses. But we talk about the inherent inadequacy of the social democratic solution because, despite those gains and improvements, it has not managed to transcend capitalism. Moreover, we are now in a crisis of capitalism which is attacking the material foundations on which the fortunes on the social democratic parties in the metropolitan areas were built, as an expression of the section of the workers masses which Lenin called the worker aristocracy. So for the social democrats too the need to seek and attempt new paths is emerging and is indeed already the subject of more or less advanced study and attempts.

However, we talk about a third phase also with respect to the one constituted by the experiences stemming from the Soviet model. Those experiences and those situations too are part of the historical heritage that belongs to us and to the entire world workers movement, because there is no doubt that under fascism, during the resistance and during the cold war years the existence of that heritage supported the Western workers movement in waging major and decisive battles for democracy and peace. But it is equally certain -- and this is the self-critical observation that we must make and that we began to make with Togliatti after the 20th CPSU Congress -- that for some time we viewed, experienced and used that heritage in a mythical and uncritical or submissive and therefore erroneous way.

But facts have now definitively proved the following:

-- That the path purused in the Russia of 1917 is not feasible for carrying out a revolution in the high points of capitalism in the West today.

-- That the regimes that emerged on the basis of the Soviet model cannot be exported to the West.

-- And, moreover, that such regimes in some Eastern bloc countries are now experiencing a crisis.

This is why we envisage a third phase in the struggle for socialism. So we are not talking about it in an abstract or purely conceptual way, but in relation to the overall real historical process hitherto carried out by the workers movement.

Of course, without the experiences, errors, tragedies, lessons and gains of the two previous phases, we would not be thinking, working and struggling here. If we set ourselves the aim of transcending them both, it is because they have given all they can with regard to revolutionary innovation and transformation in a socialist direction of the capitalistically developed West.

Obviously the need for and possibility of a new era in the advance to socialism, driven by the workers movement of Western Europe (and we hope of other capitalistically developed countries such as Japan, for instance) do not derive automatically from the exhaustion of the two previous phases.

It is above all a necessity created objectively by the present conditions in the world, in Europe and in our own country.

The capitalist system is clearly demonstrating its inability to resolve mankind's present fundamental problems.

The Reagan presidency -- in other words, the leadership of the country that has reached the utmost peak of capitalist development -- is completely committed to imparting a thrust to a return to the free interplay of capitalist economy as the best, indeed the only feasible, solution in the world and in the United States for surmounting the present crisis.

But this presumption is rightly considered reactionary and irresponsible by all Third World countries and by large number of economic and social experts and scholars, including capitalist-trained ones. And it is indeed clear that the only results of such a policy would be to increase, continuously and alarmingly, the gap between rich and poor countries and between rich and poor within each individual country, including the United States.

As far as the latter country is concerned, far from curing its ills, Reagan's treatment is exacerbating them. Let the following figure suffice: the number of unemployed has risen to 9.5 million.

Moreover, the Reagan line, particularly through the rise in the dollar rate, is greatly exacerbating the clashes and rivalry among the capitalist countries and creating further difficulties for their economies, hitting the weakest of them -- including ours -- the hardest.

Looking at the capitalist world as a whole, certain shared elements of crisis are particularly apparent.

First, the alternation of increasingly rapid cycles of inflation and recession, often combined, are creating a state of the economy known as stagflation. Even when phenomena of production recovery occur, they are briefer and at a lower level than before.

Unemployment is growing everywhere (in the EC alone it is nearly 10 million). This increase is due not only to the present recession but is now linked to fundamental contradictions whereby many of the operations carried out to increase enterprises' profitability and competitiveness prompt a further overall fall in employment.

There is therefore a continuous fall in the size of the working population and thus an ever-increasing number of unemployed and underprivileged, who have to be supported by a smaller and smaller number of employed people (forced to defend their gains tooth and nail) and by public finance, in which there is a tendency to cut social spending so as to contain the deficit.

Hence, in default of any secure prospects, the spread of mistrust, alienation and even rebellion among millions of workers, women, young people and elderly people; and hence the uncertainty about the future on the part of broad strata of entrepreneurs on every scale and in all fields of economic activity, in both the cities and the countryside; hence the increase in tensions and phenomena of social disintegration; and hence, finally, the continuous impoverishment of the quality and humanity of life.

As the period of the "state of prosperity" comes to an end, Marx's opinion on the intrinsically anarchic and antihuman nature of the capitalist system is proving more valid than ever.

Under such conditions, the increasingly blatant contradiction between capitalism and democracy is becoming apparent once more. In many places (including Italy), under various banners and to differing degrees, there are tendencies, attempts and intentions to restrict democratic life and primarily to hit the rights and powers gained by the working class and the workers.

It is this combination of factors that creates the pressing objective need to emerge from capitalism, to transcend it.

But the objective need, the pressure of realities, is not all. The organizations, gains and power of the working class, of the peasants, of the workers, have grown. There are the growing movements, associations, organizations and groups, particularly of women, young people and intellectual workers, which express in a thousand ways -- even outside the workers parties and traditional political forms -- demands, aspirations and wills that clash and conflict with contemporary capitalism's economic mechanisms, social order and cultural products and that demand a different kind of society superior to the capitalist kind.

To prove that this is so, it is enough to consider: The demand that the working class manifests in various ways for direct and autonomous participation in the process of accumulation and allocation of investments; the substance of the battles of the women's and feminist movements; the characteristics, typical both in scale and substance, assumed by the peace and disarmament movement; the other ways in which the spirit of young men and women is expressed today, through music, art, entertainment and sport; and the movements to protect and exalt nature, the countryside and our artistic heritage. As can be seen, these and other needs and aspirations are to a large extent different from the ones at the origins of the workers and socialist movement. But they too, together with the old and still unsatisfied ones, converge (and must be made to converge) toward the gains and ideals -- of equality, justice, solidarity, freedom and freedom from poverty and emancipation from exploitation -- that constitute the essence and foundation of socialism.

But there is another important fact that shows that we have entered a new phase in the struggle for socialism and that many things are moving along the path that we set ourselves.

I am referring to the debate and research that are underway in some other communist parties and in several European socialist and social democratic forces (from France to Sweden and from Britain to Germany) -- debates and study dealing explicitly with the issue of how really to transcend the capitalist system and criticizing and updating the traditional policies pursued hitherto by social democrats.

Clearly to talk about a third way along which to advance and on which to base socialism in the capitalist West is not to talk indefinitely or to pursue chimeras. The blind, narrowminded and conservative ones are those who maintain that there are only two ways -- the Soviet way and the social democratic way -- and that therefore the process of history is unable to generate anything different from what it has already produced.

Instead the facts that I have pointed out, concerning the objective conditions and needs, the subjective thrusts and movements and current research within many European political forces, show that the process of history is turning down different paths and can reach more advanced frontiers.

For some time our party has been involved in this debate and this research, which concern all elements of the European workers and people's movement, and has set in motion relations and initiatives with communist, socialist, social democratic and progressive Christian forces in many countries.

We are committed to this activity by our character as a communist force rooted in the West and a force that has formulated and promoted Eurocommunism.

Some people fear that our critical analyses of the East European countries and, more generally, our stances on international matters could make the party lose its internationalist character. And it seems to me that Comrade Cossutta even believes that there is in us a desire to break away from certain communist parties.

This is a weighty, but unfounded, charge.

Obviously the freedom with which we express our critical assessments -- a freedom which we cannot abandon and which, moreover, we accept from others toward us -- has already prompted, and can still prompt, incomprehension and polemics. But we are not seeking ruptures. We are in fact steadfast in demanding and defending relations based on parity and autonomy.

As far as we are concerned, the end of [the concept of] leading parties and leading states has been accepted by us for a long time. We neither have nor want special ties with any party.

Unless we had practiced this principle we would not have acquired the international prestige that has enabled us to develop fruitful relations with communist parties throughout the world (including, for the past 2 years, with the Chinese party, which leads the largest population in the world, a nation called on to play a growing role in the life of the world), with the West's socialist and social democratic parties, with revolutionary, progressive and democratic movements in the developing countries. So our autonomy, far from restricting our international relations, has extended them and prompts us to extend them.

But this is not all: It is also something much more profound, a long-term commitment. Indeed, our aim is to establish a new kind of internationalism, the kind needed now and for which history is ready, in view of the scale and the dramatic nature in today's world of the problems of defending peace and of the survival and development of mankind -- a development which can only be unitary.

Well, the PCI is able to make an irreplaceable contribution to this internationalism that is needed now. It can do so because of its origins; the historical, theoretical and ideological heritage and the experiences that it has accumulated and imparted to the Italian working class and the people's masses; its organized strength and influence in Italy; and its capacity for renewal, but also because -- having understood the significance with regard to liberation, of the process begun by the October Revolution, as well as its limitations, and the importance, but also the evident inadequacy, of the social democratic experiences, as well as the radical disruption of the world order and of society caused by the appearance on the scene of the peoples formerly oppressed by colonialism and of the women's masses -- the PCI is a party capable of promoting a constant link among the situations stemming from the October Revolution, the workers movement which remained outside the communist experience (socialists, social democrats and Christians) and the revolutionary, liberation and progressive forces of other areas of the world and of other inspirations.

The general outlook toward which all our efforts are directed -- the emergence from capitalism and socialist building in peace and democracy -- is the one that enables the West European workers movement to stand as the driving and rallying force of a very broad and diversified alignment which, in individual countries and on a continental and world scale, will have the intelligence and strength to transcend conservative stances of every kind, nationalist rigidity, fanaticism, dogmatism and ideological dishonesty.

Some may wonder why we believe that this role belongs principally to the West European workers movement.

There are structural and political reasons why Europe and the Western workers movement are the epicenter of the new phase in the battle for socialism, and I will enumerate them. But before that there is another reason which I must point to and which was highlighted at the previous Central Committee session: European culture -- however numerous the ignominies with which the ruling classes have tainted themselves in individual European countries and in Europe as a whole, with respect to peoples on other continents -- has been the summit of culture worldwide. Well, European culture will decline if its energies are not fully utilized to contribute freely to the regeneration of society, the world and ideas to which the workers movement aspires and for which it is struggling.

Very Profound Crisis of European Capitalism

As for the structural, social and political reasons, I believe that the main ones, at least, are as follows:

1. European capitalism is one of the summits of the system and at the same time is now experiencing a very profound crisis of means, prospects and ideas;

2. European capitalism, unlike the U.S. and Japanese kind, has been "shaped" from within by the struggles and gains of a workers movement that has created not only powerful trade union bodies but also strong political parties -- not only socialist but also communist among which ours, through no coincidence, represents the majority of our working class;

3. The collapse of the colonial system led to an upheaval in political relations and trading terms between countries formerly subjected to European imperialism and Europe itself and its workers movement;

4. Europe is the continent most immediately threatened by a nuclear conflict (U.S. leaders are now even talking about the possibility of a nuclear war limited to the European theater), and its peoples and states are therefore the ones most directly called on to avert such a prospect, which threatens them first and foremost though it would be foolish to believe that it would not involve the whole of mankind;

5. In Europe there is a confrontation between two blocs whose balance must not be altered because, apart from the lethal threat of war, any alteration in the Warsaw Pact's favor could mean an unacceptable extension of the Soviet model of economic planning and state organization, and an alteration in the Atlantic pact's favor could mean an equally unacceptable reactionary regression in Europe. But it is now clear that it is inconceivable for the balance to be guaranteed at higher and higher levels of armament and therefore military spending -- not only because of the crushing weight that they exert on the economies and on the peoples' lives, but because the ever newer instruments of extermination that are being produced no longer permit the certainty that they will be controlled. It is therefore necessary to begin the gradual elimination of the blocs, by means of detente and arms reduction, and this is a task that belongs first and foremost to the European workers movement. This role is due to it not only and not so much on account of its traditional ideals of peace but precisely because detente, disarmament and cooperation are the precondition without which socialist building within democracy becomes just a fine dream.

Our answer to our adversaries, but also to our present or potential interlocutors, who ask us to specify the substance of the third way and to clarify the substance and specific proposals that characterize it, is not that everything has been defined. We do know, however, that the quest is underway and that, though many substantive points and objectives remain to be defined and expanded on by means of a development of thought and, above all, practice, that is, action and struggle. But we are already talking about a policy that has become of considerable importance in Italy and on the international scene.

With regard to the international issues of peace and disarmament, the new international economic order, the new kind of development that in this context must be established in the capitalist countries, the changes brought about in world relations by the nuclear dimension, Europe's role -- on all these issues and on related ones we have contributed precise and detailed ideas. Our proposals for a peace and development charter aroused the interest of states, governments and parties -- that is, important forces, have brought us into contact with them and have established the conditions for new developments in our initiative and in our cooperation with such forces. If this document has not yet met with the same response among the Italian democratic forces, it is an indication of their deafness and blindness, not of any political inarticulateness of inertia on our part.

If we look at matters to do with social and economic life, together with our untiring mobilization not only on the traditional front of the defense of the democratic trade union and workers gains, another very important element consists of our formulations and proposals aimed at expressing the new demands being put forward in the field of the economic policy, labor policy and social policy of the working masses. We have recently drawn up a lengthy document (now being examined and discussed by thousands of communists and workers, specialists, entrepreneurs and industrial leaders) containing analyses, assessments, pointers and priorities in the production, economic, financial and social fields. In other words, a combination of materials which reflect and outline a framework aimed at thoroughly transforming the present situation and at extricating the country from its crisis by regenerating it.

Then there is our research into the kind of relations to be established between planning and the market and between collective and individual consumption into the problems posed by the enduring gap between the south and the rest of Italy; into the intervention in new forms by the working class and the workers in the process of forming and utilizing investment resources into the possibilities inherent in a development of scientific and technological research.

I do not need to recall our stances and battles on the women's issue, which have made us the most open minded and vanguard force, not only in Italy but in Europe, as regards theoretical formulations and specific support for the demands and proposals of the movements of women who are changing customs, relations within the family and the couple, economic and social life and the law.

A Kind of Society Really Different From the Present Kind

Great innovatory significance can be attached to the practical experiments and many and varied achievements of the communists, together with other leftwing and people's forces, administrating municipalities, provinces and regions, in the spheres of services for children, for old people, for women, students and handicapped people, and in improving the population's quality of life from the big cities to small villages.

We have also carried out careful and original study and drawn up ideas and made proposals for the defense of the democratic system, for the reform and improvement of our state on the basis of an analysis of its present crisis and, in general, of the institutions, parties, public life and the relationships among the legislative, executive and judicial bodies.

There are indications of new spheres and fields -- we even spoke of new horizons -- which must now be assumed and adopted in politics and of the new forms and methods of behavior and action for parties by which they can be reformed and adapted to the requirements and needs emerging from those social areas which capitalist logic ostracizes, oppresses and discriminates against.

They are also our vigilant presence in the sphere of culture and of the cultural institutions, our initiatives and achievements in the sphere of art, entertainment and leisure time, our participation in the battle of ideas, our opposition to philosophies of renouncing revolution, socialism and the struggle to change this society.

Any idea of exultation is far from our minds. But this crop of ideas, actions, struggles, proposals and results, even if only partial results, means that a third way has to some extent been started and is in progress; and that it does not have the characteristics of an adjustment operation but of an operation whose characteristics and goals are the radical nature of the change and the broadest possible unity of forces for attaining it, consolidating it and promoting its development.

If the working and people's masses, the mass of young people and women, the forces of labor and production are to be mobilized it is now necessary to show them that it is possible to outline and create a society which is really an alternative to the present one but which functions smoothly and is more satisfying in human terms.

This deep need also makes it necessary for us to overcome a particular lack of depth which has hitherto existed in Marxist research. It is necessary for us to work together with some and against others to draw up a new anthropology which corresponds more closely to the richest needs and highest aspirations of contemporary mankind, to its yearning for a liberation and a happiness which are rational and rationally satisfying, not irrationally pursued and hence systematically unattainable.

There is no contradiction between the need to develop, clarify and extend the content and objectives of the third way and the need to vigorously tackle the urgent and pressing tasks stemming from the aggravation of the Italian crisis.

One task emerges as fundamental: It is necessary to thwart the attempt, which is gradually becoming clearer, to overcome the economic, social and political crisis by a swing to the right, by an authoritarian and reactionary type of solution involving a restriction of democratic life, by the violation of the constitution.

Italy's economic and political crisis is growing worse. Whole sectors of production are now collapsing, unemployment is spreading, even in northern and central regions, while in the south it is now reaching figures close to 10 percent, not of the work force but of the population. The public deficit represents 12-13 percent of the gross national product and the state's debt is reaching dizzy heights. The most serious aspect of the situation is that inflation and recession combine in a vicious circle, as in other capitalist countries, but with much greater damage here in our country. In this situation, while the government lives from day to day, undermined by the petty games of its own component parties, there are increasingly clear signs of the secret work of forces which aim to destabilize democracy and the republic.

These most recent indications demonstrate how the type of development and system of power experienced by our country from the postwar period until today has reached a point of decline. It not only has created and is creating increasingly bitter conflicts, inequalities and discriminations, but it is starting to come up against a material limit through waste, the plundering of state funds, the plundering and squandering of resources. In addition, this type of development is encountering a social limit through the new needs which have emerged and which it is no longer able to satisfy, thus creating new suffering, new poverty and vast areas of underprivilege, particularly among the mass of young people and women, which is producing powerful pressure to assert demands and values which are not mercenary and to seek work and life in society which are not increasingly alienating.

Finally, the present type of development is encountering a political limit through the crisis in the old forms of power and in the ways in which it has hitherto been exercised, through the problems of ungovernability which it continually produces, through the increasingly serious inefficiency of the public apparatuses and the slackening of the democratic relationship among the citizens, the state and the institutions by the contamination of party life and the corruption of public life.

It is the nature of this crisis and the exhaustion of the conditions which finally gave the so-called "social state" wide room for mediation, which produce the dangers for democracy, the attacks on trade unions, on democratic organizations and associations, on local autonomy and on the people of the south, the degeneration in relations among parties, the government and the state, and the impudence with which the government parties seize and distribute positions of power.

These attacks must be defeated and the country must be called upon to react. It is important to shed light on the harmful and serious nature of the proposals being put forward, which are aimed at sparking off a new and traumatic dissolution (the fourth) of Parliament. This is no way to solve economic and social problems which require urgent decisions and action. This is no way of facing the bloody offensive of terrorism and the attack by P2 and sinister powers on democratic institutions. The president of the republic has once again strongly condemned this. It only creates a dangerous vacuum and the illusion of false solutions.

Nobody is more convinced than we are of the need for a change of course, a clear change of course in a democratic direction, and therefore one based on unity of leftwing and people's forces. To achieve this it is vital and urgent to change the class and political relationships and ideological orientations. That is why our attention here is concentrated not only on the government problem; that is why all our efforts must be aimed at actively preventing — through constant initiative on our part — a weakening and division of the working class in the trade union and political sphere, the disbanding of the progressive and popular lineup and the resignation of a section of the masses.

A section of the employees is maneuvering among the ruling political forces, setting conditions on its support for a particular party, and is seeking what the Fiat chairman calls a new "political plan," which consists essentially of making the trade unions toe the line and establishing an authoritarian type of government. We hope the PSI as a whole will not give in to such requests. For our part we are working actively and positively for unity. But that end is not served by keeping silent on things which should be criticized, or by ambiguous diplomatic speech, but by political and social battles and the ability to respond justly and in a new way to the need for work, order and efficiency, and also to legitimate pressures from productive sectors. To that end we must hold steadfastly to our already complex social foundations, but we must also take every opportunity for links and consensus which emerge from a renewed interest in our positions and proposals in sections of the middle classes, among entrepreneurs, technicians and research workers.

We must prevent the country's great malaise from flowing into a confused conservative bloc.

Hence the need immediately to take a stronger initiative aimed at posing some basic problems with increasing clarity so as to help the country understand the nature of the conflict, the plans that are at stake, and hence to force everybody to show his cards, to abandon slogans and to face the questions which must be tackled.

It is therefore becoming increasingly important to the workers and to the country for us now once again to emphasize and highlight the need for the democratic alternative. It is not, as its critics suggest, a line of defense, a sectarian opposition toward the others, toward all, nor is it merely a proposal for a different lineup of the parties in their present form.

We have seen that the problems of the crisis and of governability have become exceptionally important: It is sufficient to consider the need to transfer large resources from private consumers to collective consumers, to consider what is involved in a policy of fairness and austerity, what changes must be introduced into the organization of city life, of leisure time, the employment problems and the new meaning and aims with which work is to be endowed. Since this is how things are, we must realize that the democratic alternative does indeed require (and about time, too!) honest and capable ministers, but above all requires a vast, conscious, constant social and cultural mobilization. And hence it requires a political and moral leadership which allows the masses to shoulder responsibility and to make the necessary efforts to ensure real change.

It is precisely because we think this that a broad democratic alternative is necessary, involving new sections of the population and shifting political and social forces.

There is no lack of grounds for reviving the parliamentary and mass political initiative, and all our work, especially in recent times, as I have already said, has focused on programs, analyses and ideas for extending the confrontation, winning consensus and giving battle: be it foreign policy, state reform, justice, parliamentary and government mechanisms; be it mobilization against terrorism (including the opinion poll initiative) [reference to opinion terrorism poll by PCI], the proposals for modifying the finance law, especially in defense of the municipal budgets; the struggle for housing and health; the protection of pensioners and old people; the initiatives to impose new directions in industrial policy and to reform state participation. I recall the importance of the last Central Committee meeting which debated the subject of science, technology and our initiative toward the world of intellectual work. And I also mention -- because of the importance it is bound to assume -- the southern conference which we are preparing and which will take place by February.

But if we want to influence the political situation and the imminent harsh struggle, two things are essential: a further creative effort with regard to specific policies and a major mass movement within society to defend jobs and the most elementary necessities.

The events in Poland and the consequent debate, which inevitably involves general matters concerning our movement's history and approach, constitute a difficult test for the party as a whole and for every member of it. So it is not surprising that there are, apart from the very broad agreement with the party directorate's stance, also reservations, doubts of various kinds and disagreements. We must properly understand the reasons for all this and discuss them responsibly, calmly and respectfully. These reasons are not to be sought solely or chiefly in the adherence of many party members to obsolete ideas about internationalism. The threat is -- and this is the main reason for certain reservations and mistrust -- of an attenuation or even a certain loss of our class autonomy on both the international and domestic plane, of a yielding to the pressures and influences of class adversaries and other political forces. This must be taken into account with the utmost attention.

It must emerge very clearly from our stances on the events in Poland that our entire commitment is aimed at advancing and making more incisive our struggle to transcend the capitalist system, for peace and for the emancipation of the oppressed classes and peoples of the entire world. Our ideals of thorough social and political transformation are not becoming blurred, but they can always become clearer and stronger. Our positions -- which aim to provide a more realistic, objective and critical view of what has happened and is still happening in the socialist countries (far from causing an ideological decline and reduction of activism) -- can and must prompt a new intensity in the struggle for socialism in West Europe and throughout the world and increase the force of attraction of our strategy and objectives.

This is how things stand and this is how they must be portrayed, rallying the entire party to a new stage in its regeneration and, at the same time, issuing a resolute response to the political forces urging us to adopt dismissive and, ultimately, suicidal stances.

In this way our present debate -- like the one we conducted in 1956 -- can help to advance our struggle, to surmount uncertainties and doubts and to strengthen the party's combativeness.

I am convinced that our party is capable of carrying out a delicate and complex debate such as the one that has been going on in recent weeks, deriving from it a further rapid development in the critical understanding of all members, a greater ability to understand the current changes both on a world scale and in Italy and a development of our deliberations and initiative in all fields. Only if we were unable to take this new step along the path of regeneration, which real events, both at home and abroad, oblige us to pursue, would there be cause for concern regarding our party's future.

It is therefore a matter of conducting a responsible, lucid and clear debate, respecting the opinions of every comrade but always bearing in mind the danger both of conservative stances which ignore reality, even when it is harsh, and of stances which, while questioning our past, discard everything. Both these stances would lead us into a blind alley; and a confrontation between them would split the party.

This highlights the decisive importance of maintaining and developing the PCI's special characteristics, which have distinguished and still distinguish it from the other Italian parties, from the socialist parties and from other communist parties.

Basically, this is the party's mass, organized, democratic and unitary character.

The party is not and must not become a movement of opinion, because that would make it unable to maintain and extend permanent contacts with the broad masses and to continuously develop its initiative both on the major political and ideological issues and on people's everyday problems -- in other words, to conduct mass political activity.

The party's internal life must develop in such a way as to permit a free and open debate, combined with the constant effort to safeguard and strengthen its unity -- a precious asset that must be, and certainly will be, defended even against possible outside interventions in the party's life. This all demands from everyone respect for our rules and customs. Experience shows that even formal rules are of essential importance in parties' lives, as in the lives of states. The conclusions of every debate must be binding for everyone. There must be no tolerance of manifestations of laxity or indifference on the party of the leadership bodies, or of the formations of organized groups within the party.

Looking at the experience of other communist parties (whether ruling ones or not), we can assess how much damage has been and could be caused by instances of bureaucratization and atrophy in democratic and ideological life and by instances of laziness and anarchism.

We can also draw from this a confirmation of the correctness of a method such as the one that we have tested, which has enabled us to survive so many ordeals to achieve important results.

By following this method we will remain united, will be able to fully enjoy the contribution of all members and will thus forge further ahead.

DOZIER MAY BE IN HANDS OF FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

NC211340 Paris AFP in English 1330 GMT 21 Jan 82

[Text] Verona, 21 Jan (AFP) -- U.S. Brigadier General James Lee Dozier, kidnapped by the Red Brigades here on December 17, may have been handed over to a foreign intelligence service, according to the daily CORRIERE DELLA SERA today. It gave no reasons for its theory, based on investigations by its own reporters, nor did it identify the country the service worked for. But an official police spokesman said later that "we are studying this theory with the greatest care." General Dozier is the deputy chief of staff of the allied land forces for southern Europe.

Judge Guido Papalia, the magistrate in charge of the Dozier case, told newsmen today that he believed that General Dozier was still alive after 34 days of captivity. He said the 34-day period was "unusual" because the kidnappers had issued only one photograph of the general and issued four communiques. "This silence is unusual compared to previous kidnappings, and we must find the reason," he added.

ARABS FOUND WITH ROCKET MANUALS ORDERED DEPORTED

[Text] Rome, 21 Jan (ANSA) -- Six Arab youths have been ordered to leave Italy and never return after police picked up thirty instruction manuals, printed in Arab, on the use and maintenance of missile weapons and the preparation of explosive rockets in their farmhouse outside Perugia. The six affected by the banishment order were identified as 19-year-old (El Bon Bohasi Salied) (Palestinian), (Salyed Mohid Fuad Ibrahim), 28 (Jordanian), (Awuda Husseim), 27 (Lebanese), (Wahoan Fahman), 28 (Jordanian), (Ayub Ibrahim Mohammad), 22 (Lebanese) and (Al Zagal Mawan), 28 (Lebanese). None of them had proper visas entitling them to sojourn in Italy.

The country-house in which the weaponry instructions were found belongs to the city administration of Perugia in the central Italian interior. The house was rented in October to two Jordanian students, (Mustafa' Nasir) and (Attalah Ammed), enrolled at the local university for foreigners, who apparently sublet the premises to the six Arabs just expelled from the country without City Hall's knowledge. The six youths were given until midnight Friday to leave the country.

Meanwhile, earlier in the day Wednesday, Perugia's mayor, Giorgio Casoli, put in a public protest against allegations that his city had become a meeting-ground for terrorists. The charge was aired Saturday by Rome Judge Ferdinando Imposimato, who has been handling a series of investigations into leftwing and rightwing terrorist organizations. Casoli dismissed the allegation as "serious" and "cause for alarm" in a press conference Wednesday morning.

LIBYAN OFFICIAL MAKES ARRIVAL STATEMENT IN ROME

LD201954 Tripoli JANA in English 1815 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] Tripoli, 20 Jan (JANA) -- Secretary of the People's Committee of the Foreign Liaison Bureau, Al-'Ubaydi, has stressed that relations of cooperation between Jamahiriyah and Italy have made big steps forward since the great 1st of Sept. revolution. In a statement on his arrival at Rome airport today, he said the joint Libyan Arab-Italian committee would discuss in its meetings tomorrow aspects of bilateral economic, technical and scientific relations. The committee will also dwell on topics concerning bilateral relations. [passage indistinct]

Mixed Commission Meeting

LD201956 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] An important verification of Italian-Libyan relations is underway in Rome with the meeting of the mixed commission, which opened this morning. The aim of the meeting is to carry out a general examination of the economic relations between the two countries. In his opening speech, Foreign Minister Colombo indicated that political clarity and overcoming the recent lack of understanding between the two countries represent conditions for the consolidation of economic and trade relations.

May Double Oil from Libya

LD210556 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2300 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Italian oil imports from Libya may be considerably increased and even doubled, reaching 20 million tons a year compared with the 10 million tons imported in 1981. This possibility emerged during today's talks in Rome between the minister of foreign trade, Capria, and the Libyan minister of heavy industries, Al-Muntasir. The increase in oil imports, however, is subject to an agreement on the price, which is at present very high. However, on this issue too there is a prospect of an agreement during further talks be be held tomorrow.

SPADOLINI PLEASED WITH PARTY CAUCUS TALKS

[Text] Rome, 21 Jan (ANSA) -- The Rome government was primed today for the forthcoming debate in the lower house on a series of key legislative measures after the five parties in the ruling coalition came to terms Wednesday on how to push them through. The floor leaders of the Christian Democrat (DC), Socialist (PSI), Social Democrat (PSDI), Republican (PRI) and Liberal (PLI) parties discussed the measures with Premier Giovanni Spadolini, Treasury Minister Beniamino Andreatta and Finance Minister Rino Formica at a meeting in Rome.

Spadolini gleamed about the "positive" results of the meeting while telling reporters that the most crucial issues on the Italian political scene, ranging from the government's financial legislation, to housing to anti-terrorist moves, to tax measures, were discussed in the talks with party caucus leaders. He said he held great store in such meetings, four or five of which have been held since the government took office, and it was "proper that another one was held at the start of the debate on the administration's financial legislation.." "We are sure," he added, "that we will be as compact in the house as we were in the Senate in dealing with financial legislation and the package of economic measures flanking it." Spadolini disclosed that the cabinet will be giving its approval to new housing legislation, which will be put through in the form of a government ordinance, at tomorrow's meeting.

Formica reported that the five parties had also come to terms on tax measures which will also go through with the same speedy law-making process. "If anything is urgent," he commented, "it's taxes." "Could you imagine what would happen if we tried to get the measures through with the normal legislative process," Formica asked.

PSI floor leader Silvano Labriola voiced pleasure in the "positive atmosphere" of the meeting which, he said, had "made it possible to deal with very complex matters with the right approach."

PEREZ-LLORCA COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH CHEYSSON

LD202234 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca has been in Paris where he has had meetings with his French counterpart, Cheysson, and Premier Mauroy. Afterwards he gave a press conference at the Spanish Embassy and one of the main points to arise was the unblocking by the French of our entry into the Common Market:

[Begin recording] [Perez-Llorca] There was a very important formal unblocking on 25 October. (?Up to) then there had been a formal position which in the first place was to effect that negotiations for Spain's accession depended formally on the solution of some of the community's problems and which, secondly, depended formally on the unilateral adoption by Spain of certain measures. These two questions have been removed from the negotiating table. There continue to be problems on the negotiating table, but they are not problems which are being formally presented as problems prior to our accession. They have entered into the negotiations and have done so since 25 October. During the visit by Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo to Brussels an effective plan of work was drawn up. This plan of work, adopted [words indistinct] on 25 October, is the plan which we are explaining to the member countries and that which we are setting in motion.

[Unidentified journalist] The subject of terrorism will not have been overlooked during these talks.

[Perez-Llorca] No subject has been overlooked. Ministers of (?foreign affairs) go abroad to discuss the matters which are of concern to their countries. No subject has been overlooked and positions on the subjects have been made clear.

[Unidentified journalist] Is Spain more satisfied with relations with France on this subject?

[Perez-Llorca] There are some differences -- there continue to be considerable differences with regard to the basic issue, but there is the possibility of cooperation, real new cooperation in which I believe. [end recording]

POLICE SEIZE 5-TON ETA ARMS CACHE, ARREST 2

[Text] Madrid, 20 Jan (AFP) -- Police today seized the entire arsenal -- more than five tons -- of the Basque ETA political-military (ETA-PM) organization and arrested two ETA-PM militants, a police spokesman said here. The spokesman said it was the biggest ETA-PM arms cache ever discovered in the Basque region of northern Spain.

The weapons consisted of 300 handguns, machine-guns, 500 kg. (1,100 lb.) of explosives, mortars and grenade-launchers. They were of Spanish, Belgian, and Soviet manufacture. They were found hidden in a cistern at a farm raided at dawn by the anti-terrorist brigade. Police also seized instruction manuals for the weapons and propaganda material. The arrested militants, who were at the farm, were named as Lidia Fonbelliuda and Jose Angel Bilbaopa.

Police said the arsenal was uncovered through the arrest of ETA-PM militants after the December 29 kidnapping of Dr Julio Iglesias, father of pop singer Julio Iglesias. Dr Iglesias was rescued last Sunday. One of those arrested, Jose Luis "Guti" Gutierrez, owner of the house where Dr Iglesias was held, is said to have given decisive information leading to the arms hideout. Meanwhile unconfirmed rumors circulating in the Basque country say the government has reached an agreement with the ETA-PM leadership under which the organisation will lay down its arms in return for financial aid for the Basque autonomists.

AKTUELT SEES 'EUROPEAN VIEW' ADOPTED BY NATO

PM201449 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 16 Jan 82 p 2

[Editorial: "NATO and the Soviet Union"]

[Text] There has been much to-ing and fro-ing within NATO about the alliance's attitude toward Poland and the Soviet Union, and U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig has expressed the view that the results of the NATO meeting were "better than expected." It is difficult to see on what Haig bases his satisfaction. The foreign ministers agreed on strong condemnation of those responsible for the state of martial law in Poland -- and they also agreed that sanctions should be tailored to the circumstances of individual countries.

This means that the United States can of course continue with its sanctions, which include a ban on Aeroflot aircraft landing in the United States and a ban on the export of computers to the Soviet Union -- but on the other hand the United States continues its grain exports, which are so important for the Soviet Union. Here Reagan's consideration for U.S. farmers is more important than sanctions against the Soviet Union! Europe's attitude toward Poland has been much more realistic than that of the noisy Reagan, who has pushed the whole of the responsibility for the Poland affair onto the Soviet Union in the conviction that Jaruzelski's role is that of a puppet. Europe -- West Germany, for example -- has called for the lifting of martial law, the release of those imprisoned and the resumption of the dialogue among those in power, the church and Solidarity. It is in fact this European view which won support at the NATO meeting.

PAPER VIEWS JORGENSEN PROGRAM FAVORABLY

[Editorial: "Employment"]

[Text] Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen has begun another period in government with a declaration which expresses the view that "parties which together represent a majority in the Folketing are positively disposed toward important elements in the Social Democratic Party action program." This is the foundation for the new government, and it can be further clarified -- it is a concerted effort to promote employment, especially employment for young people, and the goal is to further promote an export drive, which would at the same time help to stimulate employment and improve the Danish balance of payments situation.

No one is hiding the fact that the government's foundation in the Folketing in terms of seats is weak. To make up for this the government's invitation to all the parties in the Folketing to cooperate in a comprehensive employment program must be so strong a demarche that no responsible party can refuse it. In his statement yesterday the prime minister said that the government will be instrumental in bringing about a policy which can strengthen industry and commerce across a broad front. An appeal has been made to the Folketing -- and to the population -- to take part in a joint, concerted effort. Who dares to say "no"? The interim answer must come when the Folketing holds its first major debate this week.

SWEDEN

PAPER: MEDIAN LINE PRINCIPLE TO BE CONCEDED

PM201145 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 14 Jan 82 P 9

[Text] Sweden is prepared to compromise on the continental shelf in the Baltic in the present negotiations with the Soviet Union, DAGENS NYHETER has been told.

A Swedish compromise offer has already been made. The negotiations have been going on since 1969, and Sweden has now made its biggest concession to the Russian demands. This is inappropriate, certain members of the Foreign Ministry think, in view of Sweden's moral advantage over the Soviet Union after the submarine affair. The date for the resumption of the Swedish-Soviet negotiations was fixed in September last year. Before that Sweden and the Soviet Union had negotiated on the apportionment of the continental shelf in the Baltic east of Gotland in 1969, 1970 and 1974. Last Monday [11 January] the new negotiations began in Stockholm between the Swedish delegation led by Ambassador Hans Danelius, head of the Foreign Ministry legal department, and the Soviet delegation led by Foreign Ministry treaty and legal department chief Yuriy Rybakov. This round of talks is expected to be over by Friday [15 January].

According to reports received by DAGENS NYHETER, even on Monday there was a Swedish compromise proposal on this tough issue. The negotiations concern precisely where in the Baltic the border should be drawn between Sweden and the Soviet Union on the continental shelf, which embraces the seabed and what lies under it. Both Sweden and the Soviet Union assert the so-called median principle, but interpret it differently. It is Sweden's view that the median line should be drawn between Gotland and the Soviet coast, while the Soviet Union wants the line to be drawn between the Swedish coast in Smaaland and the Baltic coast. Sweden has support for its view in international law. Gotland is a large area of land, even though it is not connected with the Swedish mainland. In December 1977 Sweden and the Soviet Union signed a fishing agreement in which it was stated that neither country should for the time being claim any sway over the disputed area. This means that up to now this part of the Baltic has been a white zone, open sea. Both countries were aware when the fishing agreement was signed that a final demarcation agreement would have to be reached in the not too distant future. Since 1969 Sweden has been asserting the median line principle, which, it seems, it is now prepared to abandon. The Soviet Union's opening offer is shown on the map alongside. The line which the Soviet delegation originally demanded even passes inside Sweden's territorial waters, 12 nautical miles from the coast. (The territorial waters boundary means that the country has full sovereignty over its territorial waters, including the airspace above them.)

Sweden now wants to reach a final agreement on the demarcation line on the continental shelf, and is willing to compromise with the Soviet Union on where to draw the median line. "We have completely differing views but we are both just as eager to reach an agreement," said cabinet secretary Leif Leifland, the highest civil servant in the Foreign Ministry. "It is not in Sweden's interest to have an unresolved border dispute." Inside the Foreign Ministry there are divergent view on the suitability of negotiating with and primarily conceding to the Soviet Union over this important border question. Some sources have told DAGENS NYHETER that it is important that the issue be resolved and that the submarine affair not be allowed to infect a geographical dispute. Others take the view that it is particularly inappropriate to begin negotiations immediately after submarine 137's gross violation of Swedish waters and consider that it gives the impression that we are afraid of the Russians.

This criticism has acquired semiofficial status. But publicly the Foreign Ministry is unwilling to admit that there is any disagreement on the question. "It would be reasonable to put these negotiations on ice," Leif Leifland said. "We won't push this question." General negotiating practice is based on each country's making what is probably an impracticable offer and then waiting for the other side's next step. It is thought that the Russians are more interested in a so-called "grab what you can" [huggsexa] in which Sweden would give way little by little, and this is the situation which has now been reached. The Swedish compromise offer is top secret. But it involves Sweden moving "its" line a little closer to the Swedish coast, while the Soviet Union moves its line a little further out into the Baltic. This means that Sweden is abandoning its position held since 1969, but this could on the other hand mean that it will increase the possibility of agreement on a final demarcation line.

If the two sides finally on a line midway between the original Swedish line and the original Soviet line, then the Soviet Union will have won the game. But this week's negotiations will not be the last on this issue.

Caution Counseled

[Editorial: "Why the Hurry"]

[Text] For more than a decade Sweden and the Soviet Union have been negotiating without result on where the demarcation line in the Baltic should be drawn. The most recent round of talks which ended Friday [15 January] after 5 days of talks in Stockholm furnished as few results as previous rounds, and perhaps it is best so. There was no united Swedish front behind the Swedish initiative which lay behind the new talks.

The two sides have not discussed this question since 1978, and even though Sweden considers it unsatisfactory that the border problems between Sweden and a great power have been impossible to resolve -- they create problems for fishing, for example -- there is good reason to inquire why, so soon after the incident of the Soviet submarine inside the Karlskrona restricted area, the Swedish Government was eager to resume negotiations which up to now have proceeded at a snail's pace.

The firmness shown toward the Soviet Union since last fall seems less convincing now, even though we are still refusing official visits. If on the other hand there has been speculation that after submarine 137 and with its East European problems the Soviet Union may prove to be more willing to negotiate than before, these have been vain hopes -- as one might have expected.

Those ruling in Moscow have always shown themselves to be richly endowed with patience and to be intent on waiting for the negotiating situation most advantageous for them. They were probably more surprised at the Swedish urgency than they would have been annoyed had Sweden announced that consulations could wait for a while.

For a long time the Swedish position on the question of the demarcation line has been that it should be drawn along the median line between Gotland and the Baltic coast, while the Soviet Union claims that this median line should be drawn between the coast of the Swedish mainland and the Baltic coast.

It is international practice that the median line between two states serves as a border, and it is only in extreme cases that this principle has been waived. This has chiefly been the case when the dispute concerned islands with a significantly smaller area than Gotland.

To break the deadlock Sweden was prepared to move on the median line principle. Several proposals were drawn up and one of these was presented in Stockholm to the Soviet negotiators, who in their turn presented their own proposals.

It is not known which side was more prepared to abandon its principles, since the negotiations were secret. But at the same time as it can be said that it is unsatisfactory from the Swedish viewpoint not to resolve border disputes with a superpower, it can also be said that there are obvious risks in ignoring international principles when negotiating with a party which has made itself known as one of the leading international sticklers for principle, and which because of its position of power is not averse to taking more than the outstretched hand when conditions are right.

The defense forces leadership is against any change contained in the various proposals sketched by the Swedish negotiators, even though they reluctantly agreed to one of them being presented to the Soviet Union. Recent events have given us a reminder of how Sweden is more secure the further away from our coast the Soviet border is drawn, and there is no reason for Sweden to be in any hurry at the present time to seek to resolve the ossified deadlock with any concessions.

CARRINGTON BLAMES SOVIET UNION FOR POLISH CRISIS

[Robin Gedye report]

[Text] Lord Carrington made it clear yesterday that the Soviet Union would bear the brunt of any future measures taken by European governments against martial law in Poland.

The foreign secretary said he hoped that a meeting on Tuesday of NATO economic officials would result in the announcement of measures "comparable to the Americans."

Lord Carrington told the Commons Foreign Affairs Committee that he would rather not catalogue what he felt these measures should be, but that they would be directed against the Soviet Union.

There was no doubt about the extent to which Russia was directly and indirectly involved in Poland's military clamp down.

"What has happened in Poland is in breach of the Helsinki agreement (on human rights). There is no doubt about the complicity of the Soviet Union," he said.

Preparations for martial law had been co-ordinated carefully, events would not have turned out as they did if Poland "did not belong to the monolithic Soviet Union."

Evidence for the Soviet Union's complicity lay in the endless visits to Poland by Marshal Kulikov, commander-in-chief of the Warsaw Pact, and in America's discovery that the martial law proclamation had been printed in Russia.

"And though they may not have chosen the timing, they were explicitly involved in the planning," said Lord Carrington.

Until Poland met the three conditions laid down by NATO's 15 foreign ministers at a meeting last week, there would be no further credits or discussions about the scheduling of foreign debts for Poland, although humanitarian aid would continue.

The allies' three basic demands were: a release of prisoners arrested under martial law; a lifting of martial law and other repressive measures, and the establishment of a dialogue between the Roman Catholic Church, Solidarity and the Warsaw government.

"What has happened in Poland has soured the atmosphere" (of detente).

Lord Carrington rejected claims that Russia was not worried by threats of sanctions by the West, although he admitted they could only have limited results in the present circumstances.

"The West is sending a signal saying: If you go any further certain things are going to happen."

DAILY TELEGRAPH REVIEWS REAGAN'S FIRST YEAR

PM201233 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 20 Jan 82 p 18

[Editorial: "Reagan's America"]

[Text] A year ago today when Mr Reagan came to town he was riding high.

Nothing could have been more auspicious than his inaugural address, coinciding with the release of the American hostages and ending a nightmare for the nation. And his promises of "a new beginning," of renewal of America's leadership of the free world, seemed to signal an end to the frustrations and humiliations endured during the Carter administration. Americans felt that for too long they had been kicked around by countries like Iran, Libya and Cuba. For too long the Russians had been allowed to get away with murder in Africa and Afghanistan. Mr Reagan was responding to a strong public sentiment -- and he still is today.

A year later it is largely the failure of "Reaganomics" that is losing him public confidence. From the outset the administration's maxim was that without a strong domestic economy the nation cannot strengthen and preserve its leadership role abroad. Today there is recession and 9 percent unemployment. And not surprisingly, Reaganomics has failed to pull off the magic trick of providing tax cuts, increased defence spending and a balanced budget all in one go. In foreign affairs the administration has clearly still not got its act together. Although Mr Reagan's instincts often prove good, there has been a lack of consistency and planning. So often problems in Europe, the Middle East and Far East only appear to be tackled when they reach a crisis level. Mr Reagan himself has been much to blame for not taking a stricter line with his foreign policy advisers. The year has been marked by appalling public feuding between the secretary of state, the secretary of defence and the recently ousted National Security Adviser Mr Richard Allen, which no president should have allowed to drag on.

Much of Mr Reagan's first year in office has been characterized by hard-line, anti-Soviet verbal attacks along with a cautious and moderate policy towards the Russians. Having denounced the Soviet leadership as cheats and liars and criminals, Mr Reagan removed Mr Carter's grain embargo which was the one measure that had begun to hurt. After announcing new, far less effective sanctions over Poland, Mr Reagan indicated that it was now more important than ever to have a summit with Mr Brezhnev. To increasingly critical conservative Republicans all this appears as appeasement disguised as hard rhetoric -- a big voice and a small stick.

Mr Reagan is indeed more pragmatic, far less of an ideologue, than he is generally perceived abroad. He can change course as fast as any politician in America -- witness his recent decision to bar the sale of new, advanced warplanes to Taiwan when he realised he was getting into a crisis with Peking. Yet he has been consistent in his promise to work for a more powerful America and a stronger alliance, and cannot alone be held responsible for the divisions that have developed in NATO since he came to office. In terms of defence, despite America's economic problems, the administration has achieved a remarkable 7 percent increase, in real terms, in military spending. The forces have been given more pay and their morale and efficiency have improved. Mr Caspar Weinberger, the defense secretary, has sensibly ditched Mr Carter's wild, and astronomically expensive, plan to hide America's new MX missiles in a complex of 4,600 deep shelters over an area as large as Scotland and Wales. Instead he has decided to modernise and improve all elements of America's strategic deterrent -- the "triad of land, sea and air forces" -- and to develop the new B-1 bomber and the neutron weapon.

In dealing with the alliance over the past year the Reagan administration has made a big effort to consult and to listen to the problems of the allies. Mr Reagan, it is generally agreed, with his relaxed and amiable manner, is establishing better relations with allied leaders than Mr Carter did and he made a good impression at the meetings in Ottawa and Cancun. But the Reagan administration was slow to recognise the dangers of the growth of anti-Americanism in Europe in the anti-nuclear movement. Instead it fuelled the flames by ill-advised statements about the possibility of a limited nuclear war and anti-Americanism in Europe in turn provoked an isolationist reaction in the United States.

The sericusness of the situation was reflected by the American ambassador to Bonn, Mr Arthur Burns, who warned of the danger that America might turn back on itself; the 350,000 American troops in Europe would not stay if they were not welcome.

When the depth of the crisis within the alliance was finally recognised, Mr Reagan intervened personally and did much to defuse it with his striking offer to the Soviet Union to negotiate the elimination of all American and Soviet medium-range missiles in Europe. But just as the administration's East-West foreign policy was beginning to take shape, with talks in Geneva on medium-range missiles and plans for strategic arms negotiations and a 1982 summit with President Brezhnev, the Polish crisis threatened to derail it. Nevertheless Mr Reagan decided, despite his denunciation of the Soviet role in Poland, not to cancel the Geneva talks and is still hoping for a summit with Mr Brezhnev this year. For while he regards detente as dead, he continues to believe that there is a chance of successful hard bargaining between Washington and Moscow, especially in the area of arms reduction, that would benefit both super-powers.

In spite of the assassination attempt and the awesome domestic and international problems of the past 12 months, Mr Reagan enters his second year less aged by the responsibilities of office than any recent president. Now fully recovered from his bullet wounds, he is much the same easy going, friendly figure he was a year ago. He is clearly not overawed by his job, is not worried about delegating work, and his success in handling congress has been unmatched since Lyndon Johnson. But after the exceedingly auspicious start to his administration on Jan 20 last year, the problems confronting his second year in office involving especially the economic future of the nation and the leadership of the West, could prove daunting even for this relaxed, youthful, 70-year-old president.

DENKTAS, ATAKOL RECEIVE UN ENVOY ON ARMS THEFT

NC210836 Nicosia BOZKURT in Turkish 20 Jan 82 p 1

[Text] Nicosia -- Minister of the Interior, Foreign Affairs and Defense Kenan Atakol yesterday received the UN representative in Cyprus, Hugo Gobbi, and conferred with him for some time. It has been learned that the arms and ammunition entrusted to the control of the United Nations was discussed. In a statement following his meeting with Gobbi, Atakol said head of state Rauf Denktas invited the UN representative to his office yesterday and drew his attention to reports that large quantities of arms and ammunition under the control of the United Nations have passed into the hands of the Greek Cypriot administration, and he asked for information on this. Atakol added that yesterday's meeting was linked to the same matter. He stated that during the meeting detailed information was requested on matters that need elucidation. Atakol concluded: "The honorable Mr Gobbi answered most of our questions. He also said he is going to answer some of our questions later. The necessary disclosure will be made when all our questions have been answered."

Denktas Questions UN Honesty

NC210830 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 18 Jan 82 p 1, 11

[Ziya Akcapar report]

[Text] Nicosia (HURRIYET) -- The theft of the 10,850 cases of Czechoslovak-made weapons and ammunition from the UN headquarters at Nicosia International Airport, where they were kept under "double lock and key," and the negligence shown by those responsible has developed into a major international scandal.

TFSC President Denktas has stated that a high-level meeting will be held today to evaluate the situation and that the UN authorities will be asked officially to provide detailed information regarding this arms and ammunition theft, discovered by HURRIYET. Denktas said: "We are in possession of the exact breakdown of the arms which were under the protection of the UN peace force. The absence of even a single weapon will lead to grave consequenced. This incident will reveal the extent of confidence that the Turkish Cypriot community can have in the United Nations and its peace force."

Stating that information has reached him regarding the theft and the connivance of those responsible, Denktas added: "The documentation on the 10,850 cases of weapons, showing whether these arms are still there and whether they still tally with our records, is a matter linked directly with the respectability of the United Nations."

Our reports on the arms theft have aroused the interest of all foreign missions in Cyprus. Foreign diplomatic circles and foreign intelligence organizations in Nicosia have begun investigating the issue of the arms and ammunition which ought to be under UN control. The TFSC foreign ministry, too, formed a working group over the weekend and began to review documents connected with all the agreements, protocols and other procedures concluded at the Security Council and in Nicosia since 1972 concerning the Czechoslovak arms and ammunition.

The Greek Cypriot administration and Greece, which never fail to issue statements on the same day, have remained silent about the arms theft. This is considered significant by diplomatic circles. Meanwhile, the Greek Cypriot administration yesterday, without any provocation, issued a communique in which it accuses TFSC President Denktas of creating "tension." Greek Prime Minister Papandreou, on the other hand, has asked Kiprianou to visit Athens on 24 January.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS SESSION HELD 20 JANUARY

[Text] A new meeting was held this afternoon within the framework of the intercommunal negotiations. During the 3-hour meeting there was a continuation of the discussion on all four issues on the daily agenda, as agreed last August. A UN statement says there was further discussion and work on points of coincidence on the constitutional aspect. The next meeting will be held Monday afternoon, 1 February.

In statements to the press prior to today's meeting the special envoy of the UN secretary general in Cyprus, Gobbi, denied allegations by the Turkish Cypriot leaders that arms and ammunition have been stolen while under the control of the UN forces. All arms and ammunition under the direct control of the UN forces, he said, are in their place and have not been stolen by anybody. Gobbi also said he informed Denktas and Atakol on the matter. He emphasized that rumors of the theft of arms and ammunition are unfounded and lack any seriousness.

Answering a question on his latest contacts with both sides, Gobbi said these were routine contacts on the exchange of views in an effort to achieve progress. We are studying the probability of more frequent meetings, he said.

The representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the talks, Ioannidhis, said efforts are continuing to discover points of coincidence, specifically on the constitutional aspect. At the present stage, he added, we are dealing with the basic articles of the constitution. Answering a question on whether there are any points of coincidence on the territorial aspect, Ioannidhis replied that unfortunately there are no such points on the territorial issue. As you know, he added, the territorial issue is an issue on which one can either agree or disagree totally. In conclusion, Ioannidhis said that during President Kiprianou's talks in Athens with Greek Prime Minister Papandreou there will be a general review of the inter-Cypriot talks and the Cyprus problem.

The Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, Onan, stated that the discussion on points of coincidence would be continued and that efforts would be made to find more such points. Answering an observation that his statement last week, that there are also points of coincidence on the territorial aspect, is contrary to today's statement by Ioannidhis, Onan said there is a misunderstanding. He added that he could not speak of points of coincidence since there is not yet any comparative discussion of proposals on the territorial issue.

GDR DELEGATION RECEIVED BY KIPRIANOU 20 JAN

[Excerpt] President Kiprianou today received the GDR parliamentary delegation which is on an official visit to Cyprus as guests of the House of Representatives. Welcoming the delegation, President Kiprianou expressed the deep appreciation and gratitude of the people of Cyprus for the wholehearted support and firm position of the GDR in support of the Cyprus struggle. The president emphasized that this year's visit by Honecker to Cyprus will further strengthen cooperation between the two countries in all sectors.

In his reply, the head of the delegation, Schulmeister, pledged the continuing support of the GDR for Cyprus' struggle in the future, both at the United Nations and in all other international forums. He said President Kiprianou's visit to his country had begun a new era in the relations between the two countries. Schulmeister said that President Kiprianou enjoys the respect of the people of the GDR because he is the symbol of a nonaligned policy which supports detente and world peace.

TURKISH GUNBOAT SAID ON MISSION FOR NATO

[Text] The Turkish gunboat detected last Tuesday south of Evvoia was on a NATO mission to shadow ships of the Soviet Navy which were passing through the Aegean on their way from the Dardanelles. This was announced yesterday by the Ministry of National Defense in the form of reports from ministry "sources," adding that the Greek authorities were cognizant of the Turkish gunboat's mission.

It has been noted that in essence the entrusting of such a mission to a Turkish ship directly and actively questions the status now in force for operational control by which Greece is responsible for control over international waters in the Aegean.

This is the second time since the Papandreou government came to power that NATO has adopted Turkey's position questioning Greek sovereign rights in the Aegean. Approximately a month ago an alliance naval exercise in the area was called off because the Turks refused -- even after protracted negotiations -- to recognize the Greek command. Political observers describe the NATO position as a reaction to the wrong moves by Papandreou within the alliance and, at the same time, an indication of the gradual isolation toward which Greece is being led in the West.

The government itself appears to be concerned over the issue created by the Turkish gunboat. Already the Greek military representative at NATO, Air Force General Papaevstratiou, has been recalled to Athens. He conferred yesterday with Prime Minister Papandreou. A new attempt to minimize the Turkish gunboat's appearance off Evvoia was undertaken by the government late last night. "The Greek authorities," the government spokesman said, "know the movement of every ship in the Aegean and they knew all the movements of the Turkish gunboat. This gunboat only violated the rules of safe navigation by undertaking dangerous maneuvers around the Greek ferryboat Khrisi Ammos, and it is for this very reason that we lodged our protest with Ankara."

It appears, however, that the government was rather too hasty with its protest, which was emphatically and somewhat ironically rejected by Ankara. It is a fact that the strongly worded demarche spoke of violation of Greek territorial waters, while the subsequent contacts by our ambassador in Ankara, Papoulias, with the secretary general of the Turkish Foreign Ministry, confined the protest to the framework of regulations for safe navigation. These fluctuations on the Greek side are the cause of recent ironic comments by Ankara diplomatic circles. It has alsobeen emphasized that the Greek protest was only handed in last Friday, 3 whole days after the appearance of the Turkish gunboat. This is more proof of the confusion that prevailed within the government over the handling of the matter.

RIZOSPASTIS: NATO PRIMARY THREAT TO COUNTRY

NC202021 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 20 Jan 82 p 2

[From the "Radical" column: "Imperialist Extortion"]

[Excerpts] Day by day the U.S. and NATO imperialists are increasing their pressure and open blackmail on Greece for the purpose of incorporating it into their piratical cold war plans. The fact that the imperialists consider our country a second-class member of their wolfish alliance is well known. For them Greece is simply an attack base for their aggressive plans against the socialist countries and the progressive regimes of the Middle East and the Greek Army is cannon fodder. The warlike Luns only confirms something the Greek people have learned through bitter experience: that they have no place in the imperialist, warlike NATO coalition which not only fails to guarantee our national security and sovereignty but which on the contrary is the primary threat to Greek national independence and territorial integrity.

FOREIGN MINISTRY PROBING CYPRUS ARMS THEFT CLAIM

NC210810 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 17 Jan 82 pp 1, 11

[Text] Ankara (HURRIYET) -- The Foreign Ministry is investigating the theft by the Greek Cypriots of the arms and ammunition of Czechoslovak origin from the depot under the control of the UN peace force. The authorities have stated that investigations into this theft have been going on for some time.

The Turkish Government seriously pursued the question of smuggling into the island during 1971 and 1972 by the Greek junta of 15,000 Greek troops and of arms and ammunition illegally purchased from Czechoslovakia, and it communicated its evaluation of the situation to both Greece and Britain. The same government gave an ultimatium to the Greeks, demanding either the immediate removal of the Czechoslovak arms from the island or putting them under UN control, as well as removal of the 15,000 Greek soldiers and Grivas from Cyprus in 15 days. As a result of the ultimatium and the resolute stand of the Turkish Government, the Greek Government realized that a conflict was highly probable and loaded its 15,000 troops on ships and withdrew them in a short time. The UN peace force then placed the arms and ammunition in depots under the control of the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus.

Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman had this comment on the subject: "We are investigating the matter. There is no development at the moment in connection with the arms which would warrant a statement."

DEFENSE MINISTER REVIEWS RELATIONS WITH GREECE

TA201117 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken says the commitment of the Turkish armed forces to the democratic system is undeniable and that the process of a return to a democratic, secular and law-abiding order is progressing in a definite and speedy way. Bayulken made this statement in reply to criticisms leveled in the Constituent Assembly during the debate on the budget for his ministry. He added that Turkey is pursuing a solid, progressive policy directed toward contemporary Western civilization and development aimed at insuring Turkey's security. Bayulken said the Turkish armed forces are fulfilling their task of protecting and defending the Turkish Republic and are alert, strong and resolute at all times against foreign threats.

Noting that 1981 was a year of tension for the whole world, Bayulken said the process of detente between East and West was damaged as a result of the developments in Afghanistan and Poland. Bayulken continued: The areas of unrest are widening -- mostly in the region of which Turkey is a part -- with no signs to the effect that this will ever stop. That is why for our defense forces preserving sufficient deterrent power has special importance. No one can deny that a strong Turkey in which domestic peace and tranquillity reigns is a very valuable factor in preserving the security, peace and stability of the region.

After pointing out the importance of solidarity and cooperation among the NATO members under these circumstances, Bayulken said: It is becoming difficult to understand the negative stand adopted by our neighbor Greece in NATO. Turkey has pursued a very clear foreign policy toward Greece since 1923. Turkey believes that because of the strategic position of the two countries, mutual cooperation is to our benefit. Turkey also believes differences with Greece can be solved through negotiations. Recalling Turkey's good-faith rational stand in the face of the stand adopted by Greece -- particularly after the new government assumed power -- and the unsubstantiated allegations leveled by that country at the NATO meeting, Bayulken said: The intransigent stand of Greece -- our neighbor and ally, which refuses to negotiate and thus causes tension -- will only result in frustration for Greece.

Reiterating that Turkey does not covet the territory of any country, Bayulken said Turkey would not concede an inch to others. Bayulken recalled that Turkey, as in the past, will continue to place the greatest emphasis on national defense, adding that the improvemnet in the economic situation in the country was taken into consideration by the armed forces in assessing domestic and foreign needs and in creating a balance between our national resources and defense needs.

Bayulken continued: The fact is being acknowledged that the country's defense power cannot be developed beyond a point that can be met by the country's financial, economic and individual means and that a steady and organized defense force can only be provided by sources made available by the country's own economy. However, we must also keep in mind -- as proved by bitter experience -- that in our times sometimes wars break out before a peiod of preparations has been completed and that therefore we must at all times keep our forces at a level that compares favorably with the standards and technology of the enemy.

Reiterating that taking into consideration its economic situation, Turkey is the country contributing the most to NATO defense, Bayulken said Turkey, which has a standing army of 600,000, should receive more economic aid from its allies.

In reply to a question on Greek militarization of the Aegean islands -- in violation of treaties -- Bayulken said rights stipulated by international agreements cannot be eliminated unilaterally by faits accomplis. He added that Turkey was taking all necessary steps in all international forums on this issue. Let me point out this fact, Bayulken said: That the Turkish armed forces are always ready for all eventualities.

After the debate on the national defense budget a proposal was passed to extend the Consultative Assembly's gratitude to the Turkish armed forces. Later the defense budget draft law was approved in the assembly.

ANKARA PROTESTS NORWAY'S BAN ON NATO ARMS SUPPLY

TA201654 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] Turkey has protested the last-minute decision by Norway not to deliver 34 antiaircraft guns it had earlier agreed to supply. According to a statement issued by the Foreign Ministry information directorate general, the Turkish Government's protest note was submitted to the temporary Norwegian charge d'affaires in Ankara by Deputy Foreign Ministry Secretary General Oktay Cankardes at the Foreign Ministry. The statement said the L-60 type antiaircraft guns Norway was to deliver to Turkey within the framework of NATO were actually to be used for training purposes and that their contribution to Turkey's defense capability was not a consideration.

According to the Foreign Ministry statement, the protest note pointed out that the decision to suspend delivery of the arms in question and implementation of this decision was contrary to the rules of international conduct. The note said: The fact that the decision was announced to the public through the Norwegian media without the prior knowledge of the Turkish Government can, to say the least, be described as an unacceptable act. The Turkish Government is aware of the realities behind the reasons put forward by the Norwegian Government. The Norwegian Government seems to have disregarded the basic principle of noninterference in other countries' internal affairs. No just reason can be found in international law or in the developments in Turkey for this deplorable and regrettable behavior.

The Turkish Government had, at the time, informed the Norwegian Government that it could not accept any economic or military aid dependent on political conditions. Thus, the Norwegian Government's act is artificial and uncalled-for. The Turkish Government strongly protests the Norwegian Government's action and informs the government in question that it will investigate what kind of measures will be necessitated in the event the Norwegian Government insists on its current policy.

MINISTRY REBUTS CHEYSSON REMARK ON CYPRUS FORCE

TA201711 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman has said that the statement by French Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson to the effect that the number of Turkish troops in Cyprus has been increased from 26,000 to 36,000 is a groundless allegation. Cheysson made this claim in an interview on French radio and television some time ago. The statement was reported widely by the official Greek news agency.

Answering a question on the issue by ANATOLIA agency, Akiman noted that the statement was denied earlier by Rolandhis, who is in charge of foreign affairs in the Greek Cypriot administration, and by the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus. Akiman said: These unfounded reports that the Turkish forces on the island are being reinforced are being spread by circles intending to create tension by giving prominence to military issues and hoping to internationalize the problem. It is regrettable that the French minister of external relations has become a tool of those spreading such ill-intentioned reports. We would like to hope that he will be more careful in investigating the truth in his future statements.

TURKISH-TUNISIAN COMMUNIQUE ISSUED IN ANKARA

TA201846 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] The joint communique on the visit to Turkey by Tunisian Foreign Ministry State Secretary (Mahmoud Mestiri) has been issued. The communique states that the two countries wish further to develop relations and the economic cooperation between Turkey and Tunisia. The communique adds that the parties decided to continue efforts for implementation of the projects formulated at the Turkish-Tunisian joint economic committee meeting in Ankara last year. The communique notes that the sides to a great extent share similar views in connection with political issues concerning both countries, and especially the Middle East and the Palestinian issues.

(Mestiri), who is in Turkey as the official guest of Foreign Ministry Secretary General Kamuran Gurun, left Ankara for Istanbul this morning. He will leave Turkey tomorrow.

SINAI PEACEKEEPING ROLE REAFFIRMED TO ISRAEL

["M.D." report]

[Text] On 13 January the ambassadors of the four European countries which will take part in the Sinai peacekeeping force (France, Britain, Italy and the Netherlands) handed Israeli Foreign Minister Shamir the reply to the U.S.-Israeli declaration of 3 December, reliable French circles confirm. This new reply from the four merely reaffirms the reply they gave on 23 November to the request for participation in the Sinai force. They confirm that they agree to take part in that force "on the bases of the Egyptian-Israeli treaty and its appendices." So the four are not going back on any of what they said on 23 November, in other words that the multinational force "has no other role" than maintaining peace in Sinai, that the implementation of the Egyptian-Israeli treaty is, in their view, "completely separate from the rest of the Camp David process," that their policy is still that of the 1980 Venice declaration, recognizing the Palestinian people's right "to self-determination" and demanding that the PLO be involved in a "comprehensive peace" process.

The four's new reply will not be published, probably to avoid controversy. Israel and the United States replied to the 23 November declaration by a (3 December) declaration stressing the two countries' attachment to the Camp David agreements, which implies support for a different solution to the Palestinian problem ("autonomy" for the West Bank). The four would have preferred to leave it at that, but Israel insisted that they reply again, which they have just done, reaffirming their previous stance.

FOREIGN MINISTER DENIES DIFFICULTIES WITH SPAIN

LD210100 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Text] The foreign minister today denied that there are difficulties between Lisbon and Madrid over Spain's entry into NATO and over their candidatures for membership in the EEC. Goncalves Pereira denied recent reports in the weekly paper EXPRESSO, which is owned by Prime Minister Balsemao, according to which the Lisbon government is reportedly delaying Spain's entry into NATO. This is not true, he said, and the opposition parties have been called to a meeting on 2 February (?by which time) the Spanish NATO entry will be studied by all the sovereign bodies.

The minister confirms that Lisbon is demanding in writing that Spanish entry into NATO will not reduce the areas of strategic interest for Portugal, but if there are problems, he says, they will notbe between Spain and Portugal, but between Portugal and the NATO member countries. With regard to the two countries' entry into the EEC the minister stresses that his government has no indication that Spain might have carried out public activities which would delay this entry. According to Goncalves Pereira the only statements which count are those by Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo respecting the autonomy of the two integration processes.

TRANSPORT STRIKE PARALYZES LISBON 21 JAN

[Excerpts] Lisbon, 21 Jan (AFP) -- A total transport stoppage paralyzed the Portuguese capital today, as bus and tram workers joined underground employees on strike since yesterday. The situation is expected to deteriorate tomorrow, when inter-city buses and local ferries join the stoppage.

SALCHER FAVORS POLISH DEBT RESCHEDULING TALKS

[Summary] "Finance Minister Herbert Salcher declared that Austria, irrespective of decisions by other states, is interested in continuing the debt rescheduling talks with Poland, at a state level." Last week in Paris, NATO government representatives had decided upon recommending that for the time being, the NATO foreign ministers not hold any more rescheduling talks with Warsaw, which will apply to repayments coming due this year.

"As far as Austria is concerned, repayments of state-guaranteed loans amounting to $400 million (or 6.4 billion schillings) come due this year, as well as repayments for commercial loans amounting to about $100 million (about 1.6 billion schillings)." Negotiations with Poland on the repayment of state-guaranteed loans will be conducted by the Finance Ministry, while Austrian banks will be represented by the Credit-Anstalt and Bawag Banks within the international bank syndicate negotiating on rescheduling commerical loan repayments.

FINANCE MINISTER MEETS SAUDI COUNTERPART

[Summary] "Austria will receive from Saudi Arabia substantial funds this year for partly covering the budget deficit and for Kontrollbank [export-financing] loans. That was agreed on by Finance Minister Salcher and Saudi Arabian Finance and Economy Minister Shaykh Muhammad al-'Ali Aba al-Khayl in a talk yesterday. Following the negotiations Salcher declared that the financing quota for this year had been fixed but refused to say anything about its amount." To date, Austria has received Saudi Arabian loans in the amount of 15 billion schillings.

The sides also agreed to set up a body for joint ventures and activities in third countries. Talks about this are to be held regularly at least once a year and, if necessary, more often. "Salcher stressed that the financing of the UN City Conference Center was not discussed at the talks." Al-Khayl invited Finance Minister Salcher to Riyadh where the topics talked about in Vienna are to be further discussed and made more specific. "According to Salcher the talks were held in a 'very good climate' and the economic relations between the two countries are not burdened by any problems."

Shaykh al-Khayl also visited the Simmering-Graz-Pauker works in Simmering where he was shown newly developed large diesel engines particularly suited for powerplants. On this occasion he suggested further talks to sound out possibilities for cooperation between Austrian and Saudi Arabian firms with the support of the Saudi Arabian Government. Al-Khayl will return to his country today.

MINISTER CHEYSSON SEES 'NO PROGRESS' IN POLAND

[G.P. report]

[Text] Monaco -- During a press conference on 19 January at the end of his official visit to Monaco, External Relations Minister Cheysson stated that "France was more determined than ever to ask General Jaruzelski and the Polish authorities to stand by what they say in each of their letters."

According to the minister, there is "no progress" on the three basic demands made by the EEC members on "martial law, the internment of a large number of Poles, and particularly trade union leaders," and on "the absence of any dialogue with all the political and social forces." "The promises must be kept," Mr Cheysson concluded, "and that might enable us to resume some form of dialogue. For the time being we do not think that is possible as yet, either as regards the rescheduling of the debt or as regards the credit which might be given to facilitate the supplies which Poland undoubtedly needs. Consequently the situation in Poland has been frozen to a considerable extent and, in any case, that is true of the situation between Poland and us."

Speaking about French-Monacan relations Mr Cheysson described them as "excellent in most spheres." The principality, he said, is administered "with a great deal of efficiency" and employment for French people is constantly increasing because the big projects being carried out in Monaco mean major contracts for French enterprises.

MITTERRAND ADVISER: FRG NOT 'NEUTRALIST'

PM211015 Paris LE MONDE in French 19 Jan 82 p 4

[Text] Mr Jacques Attali, special adviser to the president, stated on the Europe 1 Press Club on 17 January that "the rather simplistic way in which people have spoken of German cowardice" with regard to the FRG's reactions on Poland "is neither true, nor acceptable, nor accurate." "The West German and French Governments share common areas of thinking and responsibility," he said, "and the same desire to denounce all the attacks and limitations of freedom following the 13 December coup, to demand the release of prisoners, a return to workers' rights and the restoration of former freedoms. At government level Europe has voiced its opinion in an entirely coherent way." Mr Attali said that he believed that there was not "one ounce of neutralist thinking in the FRG Government's behavior."

Mr Mitterrand's adviser also said that the next summit of the seven major industrialized countries, to be held at the Chateau de Versailles, will take place in early June. "We will obviously talk mainly about employment," he said.

BYELECTION DEFEATS PLAYED DOWN BY OFFICIAL

PM211455 Paris LE MONDE in French 19 Jan 82 p 12

[Text] On Sunday evening Mr Gaston Defferre, minister of state and minister of the interior and decentralization, said: "A spade must be called a spade; the by-elections are a success for the government. The constituencies in question have been held by the right without interruption since 1958. The conservative forces lost them by a narrow margin in June 1981 in the great wave that followed the presidential election. The electorate of the left, assured of a big government majority in parliament, mobilized itself less than the electorate of the right which wanted to take its revenge."

"In this respect, the high rate of abstentions and the first analyses of the results are revealing. Four by-elections do not constitute a national test, unlike the surveys carried out on representative samples from all over France. These four constituencies, sociologically very exceptional, do not reflect French opinion as a whole. The pre-1981 opposition was told that by-elections won by it had no general political significance often enough for that statement to be remembered this evening."

PCF PLEDGES SUPPORT FOR TURKISH TRADE UNIONISTS

PM211223 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 15 Jan 82 p 8

[Text] PCF Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz had a meeting at Central Committee headquarters on 14 January with Kemal Deysal, confederal secretary of the Confederation of Revolutionary Working Unions (DISK), and (Memet) Karaca, secretary general of the Metal Workers' Federation.

They gave information on the present situation in Turkey, where an increasing number of arrests are being made, where torture is practiced daily and numerous death sentences are requested against democrats. They thanked the PCF for its active solidarity and stressed the importance which the expression of international public opinion and Western government stances has for their struggle. After expressing the emotion and fraternal feelings with which the French communists are following the Turkish people's and DISK's courageous struggle, Maxime Gremetz stated in particular:

"In view of the increasing repression, torture and the death threats hanging over Turkish trade unionists, the PCF intends to extend and strengthen its action to ensure that the solidarity of the workers and all democrats in our country is vigorously expressed. We call upon them to use all possible ways to protest and condemn this bloody dictatorship in the pay of the United States. We call on them to demand that the lives of the 52 Turkish trade unionists be spared and that repression and torture be ended and to demand freedom for Turkey."

CZECH SPYING ON DISSIDENTS IN PARIS PROTESTED

[Text] Francois Mitterrand is angry with the Czechoslovak secret services. The Prague authorities have tapped the telephones of Czech dissidents on French territory, and moreover, it was they who started the fuss. In December, Prague Radio broadcast recordings made clandestinely in the office of TEMOIGNAGES, a Czechoslovak [word indistinct] magazine edited in Paris. These deliberately collected tape recordings were meant to prove the connivance of dissidents with Western spy services and neo-nazis.

Obviously when the Czech dissidents in Paris were alerted they rapidly found the microphones installed in their offices, and the most famous among them, Artur London, wrote a protest letter to President Mitterrand. The president's reply reached them yesterday. Francois Mitterrand considers the process intolerable and even unacceptable. A very firm protest should shortly reach the Czechoslovak Embassy in Paris.

MATERIAL ON PCI CENTRAL COMMITTEE SESSION

Cossutta Speech

PM191505 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 13 Jan 82 p 8

[Report on speech by Armando Cossutta at 12 January debate on main report at PCI Central Committee meeting in Rome]

[Text] I do not believe, Armando Cossutta said, that I can be accused of underestimating the innovations (in the positive sense of the word, that is) contained in the resolution: namely the indication of the need for and the commitment to a new "phase" in the struggle for socialism.

I do think however, that it is precisely the points on which I have expressed my disagreement that threaten the coherence and the persuasive force of this albeit fundamental assertion.

In the article I wrote I maintained that the resolution represents a "break" with even our most recent formulations on a number of fundamental points. And were this to be acknowledged, I believe also that the majority of comrades would not hesitate to conclude that the resolution itself is unlikely to contribute positively to our revolutionary awareness or practice.

First, we might look at the verdict on the socialist societies, which I still consider overall to be erroneously dismissive.

I am accused of unwillingness to face facts. But we know that facts never speak for themselves; they have to be interpreted in the light of some kind of general concept of reality.

In this connection, the criticism I am inclined to make on analyzing the document (and also to some extent Berlinguer's report) is that the facts are approached more often from illuminist and sociological premises than on the basis of Marxist premises.

Is it possible to talk about analysis in our sense of the term with respect to an approach to the evaluation of facts characteristic of the socialist societies in general and of the Polish events in particular which fails to demonstrate the ability to pull together the threads linking social and political processes with the characteristics and limitations -- which are not fortuitous -- of a determinate economic structure? a structure which consists, in the socialist countries, precisely in the planned economy system.

Failure to understand this is the only explanation for the attempt, to paraphrase Guicciardini, to "make an ox run like a horse." When the ox proves unequal to the task, it is accused of not being -- or of no longer being -- a "good horse." And, what is more, the size and nature of the contributions it has made, is making and may still be destined to make to the emancipation of all mankind is ignored. Meanwhile the horse itself can no longer be called a champion. Indeed, it cannot even be heard to neigh.

Abandoning the metaphor, I would like to ask the comrades how it is possible to consider the socialist societies' limitations -- and they do exist -- without also comparing them with the state of the countries which are the object and not the subject of dominance and exploitation within the framework of the capitalist market.

It may seem paradoxical, but it is none the less true that the summary verdict expressed on the socialist societies contains a vestige, perhaps more than a vestige of the subordinate, passive mentality with respect to the USSR and the other socialist countries. The verdict can only be explained in terms of a delusion with regard to the claim that those countries, particularly the USSR -- provided that they are willing and that they consequently reform -- must and can produce solutions capable of achieving the necessary revolutionary transformation even in the "citadels" of capitalist development.

Quite the contrary: The observation that for at least 20 years the fabric of the societies which have escaped from capitalism has undoubtedly been showing signs of contradictions and even cracks is one which we should regard only as a strong and pressing reason for self-criticism, because /we/ [in italics] have proved unable to advance the revolutionary processes in such a way as to give those countries by way of a reference point in the West not more or less developed capitalism but the first effective experiences of a different realization of socialism based on a marriage of socialism and democracy. That is, at least, if we still believe that our task is not to contemplate the world, albeit in lamentation, but to transform it.

The incredible and unfounded historical systemization of the last 35 years of glorious workers' struggle is part of the same dismissive line. It is a history which was in reality characterized, after the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombs, by a long period of U.S. atomic monopoly, by Churchill's Fulton speech, by the expulsion of the European communist parties from the governments of countries like Italy and France which the Red Army never reached, and by unceasing efforts on the part of capitalist conservatism, especially the British and French Governments, to counter the possibility envisaged by Roosevelt and Stalin in Yalta of extending the wartime alliance between the two countries into an alliance of peace.

So the Yalta plan for a world setup striving in unity for the maintenance of peace and for emancipation and growth from states and peoples, with the support and cooperation of the two greatest powers, has been progressively reduced to reciprocal recognition -- as the only guarantee against another war -- of the existence of two "security zones" for the same two major powers.

It is within this more restricted framework that the workers movement, in the East and in the West, has been forced to fight: on the one hand reinforcing, even through coercion and violence, the ties between the USSR and the countries acknowledged to be part of its zone of security, to the point of transposing the so-called Soviet model by force to them, while in the West, encountering the regrettable yet unbreakable resistance of the Eastern parties and countries, the communist parties have been able to produce the great stage of democratic development which has carried the European capitalist countries to the threshold either of socialism or anarcho-corporative involution.

The dismissive verdict on the socialist societies and on the last 35 years of the communist workers movement's history is summed up in the formula of the "exhaustion" of the revolutionary propellant capacity of the socialist societies realized hitherto. It is claimed that these societies can be acknowledged to have historical merits but not a /current/ [in italics] role in the world revolutionary process. I wonder whether this is not a break with, but only a development of, the thesis approved by the congress defining such a role as fundamental. But let us stick to considering facts.

The USSR is not just the country which has been able to achieve -- and is achieving -- with honor the building of a society without capitalism, without private incomes, aiming within the limitations of historical possibilities at raising mankind and meeting his most urgent and important needs; which, to this end, succeeded brilliantly in accomplishing a tremendous task in World War II, or which after World War I became the great bulwark which broke the world market in two. In addition to all that, the USSR is also the country which opened up and which keeps open otherwise inconceivable opportunities for the parties fighting in the citadels of developed capitalism. And for all these reasons, even though it does not constitute a model (we have been repeating this for decades now), it remains a fundamental reference point not only for the peoples of the Third and Fourth Worlds but also for the working class of the capitalist countries.

On the basis of all the assessments contained in the document that I have so far challenged and on the basis of the same assessments -- which are in fact drastic and final -- reasserted in Comrade Berlinguer's report (as is well known, words carry weight, and these are weighty pronouncements indeed), it is really arbitrary to wonder whether in fact the real intention is an actual rupture with CPSU and the other parties of so-called "real socialism." The answer given to me is that it is a serious matter even to ask this question. If that is what is believed, I am the first to welcome the fact, since I consider a policy of disavowal or rupture disastrous for our party.

Indeed, Natta gives assurances that in our relations with all the workers, liberation and progressive forces, there is certainly no intention to ignore or to tone down political distinctions and differences. This assertion could suit all ears, because in fact it does not say what we consider the essential distinguishing criteria. It does not say, for instance, whether autonomy and commitment to the anticapitalist and anti-imperialist struggle are the main factors from which to expect a shared awareness of the situation and different -- and entirely autonomous and equal-based -- role played within it by each force and each party.

Comrades, my belief is that all the points in the document that I have criticized are a premise, not the consequence, of the verdict of condemnation issued with regard to the establishment of martial law in Poland.

For a different analysis of the events in Poland, I need only refer to Comrade Santarelli's article, which L'UNITA published on page 3 a few days after martial law was announced.

The theory of the "three phases" can indeed constitute a thrust to the resumption of the revolutionary process in the West and inspiration that will impart impetus and ideological vigor to the new generations and the weapon that will restore a revolutionary prospect to a process that is degenerating toward warlike outcomes.

But for this very reason it is essential that this theory be very rigorously defined and put into practice, not on the basis or premises that are ambiguous, to say the least, such as the ones that I have tried to criticize. Moreover, I would like to add that it seems to me that we are still -- even with Comrade Berlinguer's report -- a long way even from an awareness of a general line of socialist transformation in West Europe. It is certainly not by producing documents such as the one on the present economic crisis that we will lay the foundations of a platform for socialism, for an effective escape from Western capitalism.

Just as I reject a verdict that I believe fails to recognize the present role in the revolutionary process of the countries of socialism as hitherto realized, I sharply reject verdicts that dismiss our own party's revolutionary vocation and role, such as those issued by RUDE PRAVO, and every attempt to depict the debate that has opened up within our party on the Directorate's resolution as the prelude to a potentially splittist battle. Our party has all the will, the means and the time needed to transform these disputes into a loftier, unitary theoretical awareness.

Natta Article Answers Cossutta

[PCI Secretariat Member Alessandro Natta article: "Reply to Comrade Cossutta"]

[Text] Comrade Cossutta has decided to publicly express his disagreement with the party Directorate's recent resolution on the tragic events in Poland. However unusual, this is certainly a legitimate action, since there is no explicit approval by the entire Directorate of the final draft of the document. Moreover, he exercised this right to criticize and disagree at the October Central Committee meeting, adopting on the foreign policy line and on the proposals and initiatives for peace and development stances very similar to his present ones.

I do not mean that the unanimous deliberations of that Central Committee session and now the gravity of the present situation, the binding nature of the decisions that we made on 13 and 30 December and the substantial agreement of the Directorate with this stance (I leave aside outside pressures -- so obviously for ulterior motives -- for the expression of individual ideas) should have been considered sufficient to advise against this kind of intervention. What I do feel should be openly challenged, however, is the reason why Comrade Cossutta considered it necessary to make his disavowal and disagreement formal and explicit, namely that the Directorate document allegedly did not form a valid basis for an open and clear debate and exchange of views throughout the party -- which we all consider indispensable and which are in fact already underway -- and did not permit the attainment of a stance behind which the entire party could find itself resolutely united.

Such an opinion can only stem from an error which seems difficult to excuse: I mean from the lack of a clear and precise awareness that the deliberations, assessments and options embodied in that document undoubtedly constitute a very significant and innovative factor, but at the same time represent the necessary and consistent development of an inspiration and a policy line that the PCI has pursued, tested and asserted through long and arduous experience. Others might show some surprise, whether genuine or otherwise, but is it possible for a communist to talk in terms of a "wrench" or an eradication? Is it permissible to refer to a contradiction with the theses of the 15th congress of 1979? Perhaps -- and if so I consider it a very serious matter -- it was not realized that that congress embodies the clearest and most binding precedents for the present stances. Does it really need to be pointed out that those theses clearly stated, in connection with the peoples' liberation movement, the progress of socialism and the building of new societies, that "there are no possible universal models, no chairs of ideological orthodoxy and no exclusive centers of political leadership"?

Does it need to be pointed out that, together with the acknowledgement of the importance of the great historical experience that began with the October Revolution, there was an indication, in precise critical terms, of the "limitations, contradictions and errors which, even after the 20th congress, have affected the domestic economic and political life of socialist-oriented societies and relations among the various countries that have limited the force of attraction of the socialist ideals throughout the world?" Is it necessary to point out the major realization of the need to identify West Europe as the focal point of the struggle for socialism, the assertion of the need for the European workers movement to seek and promote new paths for democratic and socialist change, the definite emphasis placed on the historical importance of this task and on the essential contribution that could thus be made "to the struggle against imperialist and neocolonialist forces, to the building of a fully democratic kind of socialism, to the establishment of a new international order of peace and cooperation and therefore also to the democratic development of existing socialist societies?"

Strategic View

I have permitted myself these references to the 15th Congress theses certainly not in order to attenuate the innovative significance and profound importance of the steps that we have taken in the past few years, but to make it clear once again that our stance on the Polish events -- from August 1980 through the tragic outcome of the state of martial law -- our condemnation of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan; our deliberations on the problems of the economic and political crisis affecting and burdening the world, both East and West; and our initiatives on the European and international plane are not the result of improvisations, of astute tactical defenses or, worse, of concessions for ulterior motives, but calmly reflect a strategic view on which, albeit via a complex and difficult path, the PCI has built its particular image, its strength and its prestige as a major political group.

So these references are designed partly to say that we really could jeopardize our party's future -- as has happened and is still happening to other communist parties -- if we considered entrusting it to some clumsy kind of alignment, if we now lacked the courage and the capacity that we have had at other crucial moments in our history to commit ourselves to an analysis of the real situation, to carefully and responsibly learn from events and to promote and carry out the necessary changes of direction. I do not want to discuss general issues any further. The substance of the disagreement is important, but to form an objective assessment it is helpful to clear away certain distortions. It is a distortion to portray a critical and unquestionably severe and drastic verdict on the damage caused by the adoption of a single model, on the failure of repeated attempts to regenerate the East European countries, as a "dismissive and final" verdict on "all" socialist-type societies.

It is a distortion -- indeed, a contortion -- the gravity of which I would like Comrade Cossutta to realize, to ask whether our party's international position and the conception of its internationalism and relations in Europe and worldwide, as confirmed in the resolution, do not signify "the desire for a real 'break'" with respect to the communist parties. Of course we abandoned long ago any ideas of biased and binding choices of camp, of a communist movement viewed as a homogeneous body from both the theoretical and the political viewpoint. But when we talk about a new kind of internationalism, when we assert the intention of seeking and developing open political relations with all workers, liberation and progressive forces, we are aiming at a goal completely opposite to that of ruptures or of a different and diametrically opposed choice of camp, as others in Italy would like the communists to do. We intend to act to involve as many forces as possible in the struggle for socialism. We claim for our party and for others the right of and opportunity for "political action," including in the international field -- without resumption, of course, but without any inhibitions either. To regard relations with all communist parties and with every other socialist, revolutionary and progressive force "in the same way" does not, of course, mean ignoring or effacing the political distinctions and diversities. It means an unconfessional approach to international relations "based on absolute autonomy of political thought and action, without ideological, political or organizational ties." And this is a fixed and inalienable point for us.

Poland's Present Tragedy

So what is the real reason for the disagreement? It is, first, the appraisal of the fundamental causes of the Polish crisis. One is struck in Comrade Cossutta's article by the essential dismissal of the subject of Poland and one forms a negative impression from the fact that with regard to the socialist societies it is simply stated that "the very results achieved pose more and more serious problems with regard to freedoms and also the economy and consumption." But we are faced with a very different problem: It is the tragedy now being experienced by the Polish people and nation, following a series of repeated and increasingly serious and disruptive economic and political crises. The problem is the harsh halt called by the military to a need and desire for democratic renewal that emerged from the depths of that society and that were recognized as valid and shared by a broad sector of the Polish United Workers Party. So it is a pressing duty for us as communists to be entirely thorough in our historical analysis and political deliberations.

Of course, it is not enough to issue an appeal -- though this is contained in the Directorate document -- not to deny the importance and complexity of historical processes and the reality and objective weight of the USSR and other socialist-oriented countries in the world today.

"Nor is it right or permissible to say or insinuate that our party Directorate's intention with that document was to respond to such very tragic events and to matters with such vast and serious dimensions by producing hasty ideological repudiations or dismissive indictments or, worse, by aligning or siding with those who exaggerate the scale of the difficulties, the economic and political constrictions, of the regressive processes in East European societies and who see all this as "a sufficient argument to explain even tragic events such as Poland's." Comrade Cossutta does not try to provide any kind of different explanation of these facts. Of course he does not agree with the reasoned verdict of the resolution or the conclusions drawn from it. But how is it possible to so seriously underestimate the real facts?

When he mentioned the exhaustion of the propulsive force of a phase in the development of socialism, we were referring to specific factors -- not only to what Togliatti already considered a missed opportunity, even despite the emergence of the Cold War, to consistently develop the experience of the peoples' democracies and the lapse into "servile imitation" of the Soviet model, but also, and above all, to the lapse of the challenge that seemed to emerge with the ideas asserted at the 20th Congress, to the failure and stifling of attempts at reform and democratization, from Czechoslovakia to Poland; and to the restrictions imposed on various nations' autonomous development by the prevalence of a rigid conception of the "socialist camp" as an ideological-military body rather than as a political community.

The critical analysis that we have formed and which must certainly be extended and expanded must not be thought by anyone to imply any indifference or dismissiveness with respect to very major problems -- such as the security of the USSR, the threat to peace that could be posed by dramatic disruptions in strategic balances between the blocs and the role that a major power such as the USSR can play as an objective reference point for countries and peoples combating imperialism and reactionary regimes and fighting for liberation and national independence. Whoever believes or suspects that our condemnation of the recourse to the army in Poland, our criticism of the USSR's pressures in this specific case and more generally of its responsibilities in the events in East European societies can make us attentuate the rigor and resoluteness of our denunciation of the responsibilities of imperialism, our struggle against the U.S. aims and desire for domination, and our open polemic and battle against even the Italian Government and against tendencies to align with the United States at present in irresponsible and damaging measures such as economic and financial sanctions against Poland and the USSR or the suspension of agreements, such as the one for the construction of the methane gas pipeline, is mistaken.

There is certainly reason to wonder whether a serious weakening of or a crisis in the USSR could not ultimately limit the possibilities of the struggle for socialism in West Europe too and pose the threat of reactionary prospects. But I do not see how we can give this question any other answer than the one which we have tried to give: It is events like those in Czechoslovakia, Poland and Afghanistan which obscure the USSR's image and weaken its role. It is actions which conflict with a policy of detente, of respect for each nation's fundamental right to independence and sovereignty, of real support for the people's liberation and independence movement, of overcoming the Third and Fourth World countries' backward and underdeveloped conditions, and not our criticisms and condemnations which undermine the vigor and persuasive strength of an anti-imperialist policy and role. We know and should at least have learned how complex the connection was and still is between national requirements of the struggle for peace, for the liberation and emancipation of peoples and for socialism. We have seen and suffered the contradictions which emerged in this historic process; the conflicts, divisions and clashes among the countries governed by communist parties.

We have gauged the damage done by the static, closed policies of the policy of alliances, by stagnation and regression when faced with even a cautious demand and steps to gradually overcome the logic of opposing blocs and their interpretation in accordance with the old solution of "cuius regio eius religio" [whoever rules dictates the religion]. We have gauged the damage done by erroneous theoretical and political answers which are unsuited to the problems and also by hesitations and delays on our part in reckoning with the situation and boldly and courageously finding new solutions. The criterion behind our judgment cannot be that of ideology but instead always that of the effective policy, of means of being able to act, as far as we can, with the greatest effect to move things in the direction which we regard as just.

The Ideals of Socialism

It is therefore our duty to intervene, to adopt a position which is truthful and responsibly firm; above all it is our duty to spread the facts, to progress in the struggle for democratic and socialist change in Italy and Europe. This is the logic behind the Directorate's text: the deep-seated conviction that the phenomena of stagnation and regression in East European societies, and at the same time the crisis which capitalism is failing to overcome, the conflicts which cast doubt on the very possibilities of developing, defending and increasing civilization, raise once again in a more compelling and pressing way the need for socialism, for the struggle for a socialism to be built in new ways, with full democracy on the basis of consensus and participation, with the contribution of all the workers movement's forces. To tell the truth, we have never thought that socialism could be a kind of fruit ripened elsewhere to be imported into our country. We have constantly worked to open up and follow our own path. And today the "third path" does not refer to a vague and possibly nonexistent continent -- as critics and opponents of our party claim. The possibilities of not stopping at noble exhortations and not falling into the excuses of inconclusive reformism lie in the facts which characterize the Italian and European situation, in the very path which the PCI has followed, in the deliberations which we have completed just recently and also in critical thinking and a search for new ideas and solutions by other socialist and social democratic forces, by the workers movement and by the European left.

Comrade Cossutta seems to attribute the problems in ideological tension and political militancy to our critical thinking on the situation in the socialist countries. And he does not seem to understand, on the other hand, the influence which the events, some of them grave events, in these countries -- from border conflicts, some violent, to military interventions, as in Afghanistan and the tragedy of Poland, and the strangling of economic development -- have had on the awareness of the broad masses.

Therefore it is on this policy of strongly reviving socialist ideals, of deep commitment to the great objectives of peace, disarmament and overcoming blocs, of peoples' liberation, development and equality among nations, it is in this new and realistic sense of the struggle for socialism that there can be a recovery of militancy and that the political task can be given a boost and a new nature. Of course, to win militants' active and full consensus on this vision of socialism, to ensure that it becomes a mass conviction and to achieve even deeper unity of policy in our party, the debate must go to the root of the problems and no room must be left for doubts and reservations, and all remnants of mythical approaches, the constraints imposed by an overindulgent attitude and ideological doubts must be cleared out and destroyed.

It is in the directness and clarity of positions, the scrupulous consistency of principles, socialist ideals and political practice that our party's unity of line and action must increasingly be founded and given life.

Ingrao Backs Berlinguer

PM200945 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 13 Jan 82 pp 7-8

[Report on speech by PCI Directorate Member Pietro Ingrao at Central Committee meeting in Rome 12 January]

[Text] I approve of the Directorate's document and the line of Comrade Berlinguer's report, Pietro Ingrao said, dwelling on those parts of the report which stress the link between the Polish events and developments in the world crisis. Precisely because this strikes me as the key point, I do not think that the workers' revolt which erupted in Poland in the summer of 1980 can be regarded solely as a struggle to win a few essential rights to freedom. It seems to me to prove that in the East too the economic and social order built over the past 30 years and which brought great innovations and considerable social achievements now no longer holds water. This also applies to the organization of production, which is also unable to withstand the challenge posed by the world crisis. Behind all this are the changes which have come about in the international situation: new problems of shortages and of the way in which resources are used, energy costs and sources, food problems in a growing world, changes in the relationship between science and production, the effects of restructuring and technological innovations on the international division of labor, on the forms of production and the organization of work, on systems of knowledge, training and mass communications, we draw all the necessary distinctions between East and West and also within each of these areas. But the break which has come about in Poland is directly connected with these things.

The sociopolitical system existing in that country has proved tragically unable even to introduce the social innovations which that crisis required: and it is trying to conceal that inability with the intervention of tanks. And I would like to stress that point to Comrade Cossutta: that system did not stand up at all with regard to production structures, the relationship which exists between the production system and the producers, the relations between a state which claims to be a workers and socialist state and the living working class.

We are well aware that there has been a far-reaching change and a modification of the production structures in this century in Poland and in the other East bloc countries. But for the very sake of the battle for socialism we must clearly see that the absolute collectivization of the means of production, its extremely centralized form, the monopoly of state administration held by a single authoritarian-type party are not seen to be capable of meeting the challenge posed by the changes which have come about in awareness and in production processes. This monolithic collectivization, separated from the working masses' participation and control, not only fails to produce a gradual socialization of power but produces serious phenomena of new bureaucratization, of despotism on the part of the apparatus, of hindering innovations and the inability to change, of a new alienation and subordination of the workers and of the collective awareness. Therefore we have condemned the outcome of the Polish events, precisely because of our hope and need for socialism. We are criticizing the Polish military regime because it denies the workers power not only in the sphere of political rights but also in the essential sphere of organizing production, the major production, social and cultural options.

We must realize, as Togliatti pointed out in the Yalta memorandum no less than 20 years ago, that this will become increasingly the context for burning rivalry and confrontation with the present ruling classes: who should handle the controls and fundamental decisions of production (which now implies the role of science, the future of the environment and the interplay with nature) and how they should be handled, and it is the context in which, week after week, the conflict will become harsher and harsher in Italy.

The Polish proof that state ownership of the means of production leads to a military regime and is unable even to grant a minimum of autonomy and representation to a trade union with 10 million members constitutes a wonderful gift to the most arrogant sector of employers in Italy and throughout the world, to Reaganism and to the champions of the most arrogant neoliberalism.

And I really do regard as hasty the comrade who, faced with such a confrontation, places his trust in the buildup of the military strength of the USSR and its allies. I consider him hasty not only because of the consequences such a decision would have with regard to peace and the further division of the world into rigid and counterposed blocs, but also because militarization implies resources, knowledge and power increasingly restricted on an authoritarian apparatus that is distant, centralized and removed from the control and influence of the workers masses.

I refuse to believe that this is the true role of the USSR. Indeed, I seriously fear that it will reduce its role, its force of attraction, in the sense of the capacity to encourage liberation movements worldwide, in the sense emphasized by Gramsci in his famous 1926 letter -- so prophetic in many respects. I do not believe that this role, which expands on the entire experience deriving from [the] October [revolution] its capacity to encourage liberation forces, has always been present and straightforward ever since October. I believe that events have been more tortuous and vicissitudinous, with major good and bad points. But I would like to issue the following reply to Cossutta, who envisages harm for everyone if the USSR's role is reduced. The USSR has lost essential friendships in broad areas of the Third World on account of the invasion of Afghanistan. It is losing them now -- on account of its pressure on Poland -- in the West, in workers movements, among the intelligentsia, among the democratic currents and in the advanced Catholic world.

When we issue pronouncements on Poland we are therefore talking about the future of socialism and are acting and speaking on matters and options decisive for the defense of the power of the workers masses in our country too, for repelling the conservative attack and for issuing a creative answer to the fundamental problems posed by the crisis. We are struggling for a government of society that will not produce new forms of bureaucratization and alienation. We assert the possibility of a strong form of government of society that is capable of directing the fundamental decisions but that does not impose state control on everything, bureaucratize the entire state or centralize all decisions in a separate and unchanging body.

We are struggling for a government of society that will smash the private monopoly on the major aspects of production and social reproduction -- but so as to extend the masses' influence on these aspects, to govern and not to suppress social conflict, to stimulate creativity and to teach self-government.

The specific struggle for socialism must now be waged by advancing this prospect, which needs to use particular state and public powers over the fundamental sectors so as to progressively socialize government, to control capitalist forms of enterprises, to increase society's capacity for self-government and to reduce the distance between those who govern and those who are governed.

Therefore the pressing task is to succeed in forming in Europe an alignment that will enable a multiplicity and plurality of workers and intellectual forces to build new powers for the guidance and public government of resources, organizing and regulating the conflicts typical of an advanced capitalist society -- flexible forms of government that can thus provide scope for democratic bourgeois forces too, by specifically setting, as Berlinguer strongly emphasizes, the objective of the reduction and gradual elimination of the blocs, securing the space that must be granted to the Third World, and thus building the timetable and transitions now needed to impart a new thrust to socialism.

Otherwise there is no point in deluding oneself: Outside such a prospect there will be corporate disintegrations, nationalistic and provincialistic fragmentations and races for survival by accepting dependence and adhering to imperial logics. And this will open the way to damaging retaliation by the strongest capitalist groups. Of course, we are only a part -- and not a large one -- of the European workers movement.

But, as Berlinguer has stressed, the European workers movement -- and within it, socialist or social democratic forces, labor unions, new liberation movements, essential currents of modern culture and democratically oriented bourgeois groups -- is also faced with the impossibility or difficulty of remaining within the confines of the "social state" and its gains, precisely because all these forces face the pressing structural problem of the management of production, of the limitations and crisis of liberal-democratic forms. Therefore not only must we not fall back on social democracy and the research and efforts that are going on within it, with respect to the broader range of socialist tradition and with respect to the important organizations of the Western trade union movement and within the Catholic world, which is again in turmoil.

I believe that it is easy to recognize in our tradition the major importance given to state power and the role of the political party. But I believe that the strenuous struggle for the participation of the masses, the view of socialism as the growth of the working class' and the people's power of intervention and decisionmaking, are also well rooted in our tradition.

Gramsci is situated within this tradition -- the Gramsci of the "Counsels" and the "Prison Letters," whose attention was centered entirely on seeking a social, political and moral revolution that would assert the producers' control over the development of society. There is the troubled history of the management councils and the land committees. There is our commitment to understand and recognize the full and original autonomy of the mass organizations as "political organizations." There is our contribution to the building of the new "Auditing Board of Councils" [sindacato dei consigli] which set in motion the workers revival in the sixties.

I believe that along this path we have also received a thrust, a tendency, albeit germinal, embodied by the October Revolution when it began and raised the flag of the Soviets but destroyed by party monolithism and, above all, by Stalinism.

Comrade Rubbi has just emphasized the absurdity of regarding the world of the East bloc countries as a frozen world about which nothing can be done. I frankly reply to Comrade Rubbi and I find it difficult to describe as "socialism as hitherto realized" regimes in which I do not see realized a real government of the workers masses over the fundamental decisions regarding the state, the economy and society. I do not presume to have exact formulas for complex situations which destroy a whole series of schemata and forecasts. I do not believe in presumptuous "dismissals." However, I do request from comrades such as Rubbi attention and respect with regard to problems that do exist, serious questions that remain unanswered in the minds of some of us, partly because in the past many of us have too easily overlooked these questions.

At the same time, I too believe that it is absurd to regard the East bloc as a static world. It would be stupid and even a surrender to regard as forzen parties with a great and tumultuous history, such as the Soviet, Chinese and Vietnamese parties and others that are a government force in the East bloc and in the broad area of the restless Third World.

But we must also extend our view and our initiative to the entire framework of the East bloc countries, to the entire turmoil and movement taking place there. This means facing up squarely to the facts, the changes in the situation and the forces that are beginning to move -- including the ones which, as in Poland, have begun a struggle against the government forces, but so as not to identify with these forces, abandoning the autonomous critique that in fact we want to pursue and assert with respect to everyone.

We cannot develop the battle for socialism just by looking at our own ranks and our own history. To have forgotten this has already cost the workers movement a great deal, when it failed to recognize in Algeria, the Middle East or Latin America other parties and movements that were not communist, and which in some cases were combating us, but which were nevertheless making a contribution to the struggle for peace and to the quest for new revolutionary paths, and a part of Italian communist tradition sought to understand what innovations those forces were contributing. I believe that by thus extending the range and area of our initiative we will not restrict but will in fact strengthen our role.

Napolitano Speech

[Report on Georgio Napolitano speech in 12 January debate on main report at PCE Central Committee meeting in Rome]

[Text] On this occasion, Napolitano said, I believe that to state our agreement with Comrade Berlinguer's report and with the successive positions expressed by Berlinguer following the proclamation of the state of siege in Poland is by no means ritualistic but constitutes for each one of us a clear assumption of responsibility at a grave and very exacting time which demands substantial unity among the party's leading forces on the basis of choices highly relevant to our own future.

This agreement stems first and foremost from our long-held and profound common convictions on the value of freedom and of democratic institutions. We are very actively concerned and saddened over the conditions being endured by the Polish people and over the destiny of that country, and at the same time we are alarmed about the dangers caused to the fragile fabric of recovery in the detente process and the start of arms reduction talks. We must be clear in maintaining the irrevocable need to avoid using the Polish drama as a reason or an excuse to interrupt those talks and to break off forms of dialogue and collaboration between East and West. We must be clear -- in recent days we have agreed on this point with authoritative leaders of the SPD -- in underlining the contribution which the detente policy has made precisely to the growth of reformatory impulses and demands for freedoms and democratic changes in the East European countries and hence in confronting us with the full complexity of the problem of how to support such impulses and demands. The brutal smothering of the renewal drive in Poland cannot in fact lead us to the conclusion that contradictions and objective needs for reform are no longer destined to ferment and to make themselves known in those countries and in the USSR itself. This is a complex problem, because the dramatic events in Poland certainly cause us to reflect on the difficulty and, at the same time, the necessity of successfully combining developments in the detente policy and recognition of the need for balance between the bloc and of the USSR's security requirements with a guarantee of national autonomy and of opportunities for democratic evolution for East Europe.

An important contribution in this area can come from a resumption of the unitary movement for peace which also takes up the objective of restoring fundamental democratic rights in Poland. And an important role can be played by the European left, provided that it does not give way to a manichean view which diabolizes the USSR and that it does not become the prisoner of a misleading comparison between the West as the realm of freedom and the Soviet Union, with the countries allied to it, as the realm of repression and the fount of all international tensions. If we slid in that direction, we would become entangled with the worst rightist positions and end by obscuring or ignoring the crisis of capitalist development and of democratic life itself in the Western countries, by concealing social and governmental structures and practices which the left is in fact meant to combat, and on the international plane by disregarding all forms of imperialist exploitation, oppression and aggressive interference which do not have a Soviet source, ignoring the positions and responsibilities of the United States and the U.S. administration, and eventually by challenging the detente policy itself.

A political force like ours and any European leftwing force which wants to be equal to its role has to treat as its own the highest traditions of Western civilization, culture and political democracy and at the same time be the voice of demands for profound transformations on the national and international planes, and it has to confront the "model," the "ideology," the various real experiences which the communist parties and the leading groups in the USSR and the Eastern countries represent, by making itself the clear representative -- as a European leftwing force -- of its own autonomous concepts and strategies for change hinging on the indissoluble link between democracy and socialism.

With this combination of stances, on the basis of the posture presented to the Central Committee by Comrade Berlinguer, we must commit ourselves to the debate that has opened up within the party. There must be strong determination and consistency from all of us in rejecting vestigial or resurgent tendencies in our ranks to an anachronistic repetition of our past verdicts on the USSR, a kind of pseudo-historical indulgence, a tendency to reassert entirely obsolete criteria regarding solidarity and to the neglect of essential elements of the PCI's heritage and strategy. There must definitely be a more thorough effort of elucidation than on other occasions, and this is dictated not by any abstract demand for consistency but by the need to make the party take a leap forward, freeing it from ambiguities and uncertainties whose weight we underestimate and risk underestimating even more. One can wonder whether at particular periods our effort should not have been more determined and continuous. Let us recall the impetus and the contributions, including some bold ones, given to us in bygone years by Togliatti and in less distant times by Longo, the moments of fertile collective deliberation on the part of our leadership group and also the moments of great turmoil, such as the one in which some of us were involved in the Central Committee debate just over 20 years ago on the 22d CPSU Congress report. But apart from an analysis of the past, there must now be a complete awareness of the developments, including some recent developments, and of what we regard as a lamentable regression in the situation in the USSR, of the conditions that have become increasingly crystallized and of the attitudes that have prevailed with the CPSU.

The questions involved in the historical analysis of the development of the USSR and the other countries in which so-called real socialism is to be found remain very complex, and it is difficult to understand how anybody can seriously blame us for failing to provide all the answers to questions with which so many scholars are still grappling. Obviously this criticism is being leveled at us by people -- for instance in the PSI -- who never ask themselves those questions and do not seek those answers or who think that they can leave the historical analysis out of consideration and impose their own views.

We must stand firm on this ground, while succeeding in reaching the possible and necessary critical conclusions.

We must also be able to face the analyses of Italian communist scholars themselves and extract from them material for a more truly political thorough examination and clarification in our party. In our debate we must bluntly put the facts on the table, however painful they may be, from those relating to the military elements and elements of power politics which have been asserted in Soviet foreign policy since the end of the Vietnam war to the situation of crisis in society and the loss of consensus among the working class itself, which have reached a disastrous point in Poland and which in recent weeks were transformed into extremely serious deeds -- weighty deeds indeed -- of repression and restriction and, I must add, in the past few days into unacceptable arbitrary actions in the Polish party. How can anybody deny that these actions -- and not our criticism of them, as Cossutta maintains -- have had the effect of constantly undermining the ideological force of attraction exerted by the first socialist state which emerged from the October Revolution, of the other states modeled on it and of a communist movement which identifies with it?

It is perhaps necessary above all to face more openly the question which has always concerned us; in other words the fact that the class and socialist awareness of a fundamental part of the Italian workers movement has been developed for decades, taking as one of its yardsticks the relationship with the Soviet Union in the framework of a specific concept of the struggle for socialism and against imperialism. We have arrived at a different concept, corresponding to the terms of long historical experience and of the reality of the world today, and there must be different yardsticks and tests. These are provided by our party for itself too, with its commitment to research and to action for a new way of progressing toward socialism in a period which seems to us to present very different characteristics from the two great periods which embrace the history of the world workers' movement.

It is a way which has not been exhausted in the European dimension and which does not involve the dimissal -- nobody expects this of us -- of our heritage and our experience, nor even summary judgments of the situation of European social democracy taken as a whole, but the best use of all the achievements of the Italian and European workers movements in emancipation and progress. Unless we start by putting these to the best use, we lack a decisive assumption of faith in the goal to be pursued. The "third way" does not have to be built from scratch, and this is because it is not a whim or an illusion, however acutely aware we should be of the objective difficulties and the scale of the problems which still have to be solved. Of course it is necessary to go beyond the considerable mistakes and limitations, the inconsistencies and crises in the social democratic experiments, and it is surprising that some PSI leaders take hasty negative attitudes toward this attitude of ours when the same ideas are emerging in various socialist and social democratic parties.

Indeed, in this sphere it is possible to achieve a fruitful dialogue, a rapprochement and, eventually, as we said at the 15th Congress, a unitary realignment among the various forces in the workers and leftwing movement in Western Europe. We Italian Communists are in a position to make a unique contribution to that effort with our original aspects, and especially with the experience and development we have accumulated on the subjects of democracy, democratic participation and even more specifically on the subject -- which has a great deal to do with socialism -- of intervention and control by the working class itself in running the economy and managing the means of production. The problems which still have to be solved in full, but which have been and are part of our commitment therefore include -- unlike what Comrade Cossutta's article shows him to believe -- the problems of a new structure for social and production relationships.

However, these cannot be solved by invoking them in a propagandist way; in more general terms any attempt to reduce our concept of the struggle for socialism to propagandist plans following the blueprint of the dogmatic attitudes prevalent in the Soviet Union has been a serious matter and is likely to be more serious than ever. This would have an irreversible effect -- we are looking at the fate suffered by other communist parties in Europe, which have certainly not been any better than we in Italy at promoting a revolutionary process, however serious the limitations of the results we have attained -- it would therefore have an irreversible and definite effect on the role of our party, which needs all its ideological and political independence -- and for this reason too it should be determined to defend it in face of anybody -- to fulfill its historical role of contributing to the advance of the socialist cause in deeds and not in words in our country and in this part of the world.

Rubbi Speech

LD200849 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 13 Jan 82 p 7

[Report on PCI Foreign Section Chief Antonio Rubbi's speech in 12 January debate on main report at PCI Central Committee meeting in Rome]

[Text] Rubbi expressed full agreement with the Directorate resolution and Berlinguer's report. This new element of elaboration represents a leap in quality, in terms of the verdict given with respect to the societies following a socialist course, which relates directly to the political system on which they rest, and, in the second place, in terms of the pithy and substantial definition given of a third phase of struggle for socialism in West Europe. These innovations must be made clear and explicit to the entire party. The debate within the party must be conducted in the forms and modes proper to the PCI. It is a negative factor that Comrade Cossutta, whose ideas I do not share, should have chosen so unprecedented a manner to express his own dissent, knowing that there are plenty of opportunities and forums for doing so, and that his action would create a certain element of disturbance for party unity. But a constructive, open and genuine debate, which must nonetheless be conducted in a measured and balanced way, requires that we rebut the dismissive positions of those who deny the existence of any form of socialism in the Eastern countries or talk about imperial logic.

I want to dwell especially on two topics raised in the report. The first concerns the question of whether talking about crisis and regression means making a dismissive analysis of socialist-type societies. Closing our eyes to the dramatic events in Poland and Afghanistan or to the manifest or latent crises in some of those countries means putting ourselves in the position of justifying political acts which we really condemn and, objectively, or endorsing the existing state of affairs, the policies of authoritarian restrictions and the aspects of power politics practiced by the Soviet Union. But this is to do a disservice to those very countries which need a policy of profound reforms and changes in their economic and political system in order to escape from this situation. It would be a mistake to consider the world of the Eastern countries a frozen world in which nothing further remained to be done. It is hardly constructive or sensible to hold a debate about whether or not those societies are reformable. What kind of prospects should there be for such a vast area of the planet, which encompasses a billion and a half people? What contribution do they still have to make to the overall process of human emancipation? What areas of struggle are indicated for the forces of renewal and reform which do indeed exist in those countries? And finally, what should be the basis of our relations with those countries and those parties?

It is certainly not for the Italian communists to point out the specific methods for change to be applied in the societies of Eastern Europe, the content of the reforms to be adopted, or the forms of the institutional structures capable of winning consensus, promoting participation and organizing control by the masses; whereas it certainly is their business to select and propose much exigencies as a basis for relations and to develop relations on that basis. This is a manifestation of genuine internationalism.

It has been quite clear since the 1976 Berlin conference, and it was made explicit in its final document, that an international communist movement in the strict sense no longer exists and that references to Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism or to hierarchies of particular roles are now obsolete concepts and as such are discarded; also that anyone who advocates all possible types of collaboration with socialist, labor and social democratic parties and every other revolutionary force is a progressive. Others are to blame for failing to take account of this new and significant ground and for wanting to carry on in the old way.

An element of this persists even in some sectors of our party, like a kind of conditioned reflex which tends to identify the USSR with internationalism and leans toward an alignment in terms of ideological and political camps which in turn becomes the basis for all kinds of justifications. But this is not our policy, nor is it the way be behave on the international level. It is untrue to say that a communist party is stronger and more closely linked to the masses the closer it is to these obsolete concepts. On the contrary, experience exists to demonstrate the progressive deterioration and constantly decreasing weight and importance on the international and internal levels of those parties which still follow that road. The road chosen by the PCI, whose validity is fully confirmed in the light of the events of recent times, is the road of a new internationalism, and the PCI must follow that road consistently.

Rodano Speech

[Report on PCI Central Committee Member Marisa Rodano 12 January speech at Central Committee and Central Control Commission session in Rome]

[Text] The 30 December document and, more broadly and more thoroughly, the report delivered at this Central Committee session, Marisa Rodano said, undoubtedly contain a valuable innovative element with respect to stances adopted in similar circumstances (Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan). There is not merely the expression of a verdict on specific facts -- the events in Poland -- taken in isolation, but an analysis closely linked with consequent responsibilities and new tasks for us, with a view to socialist building in Italy and, more generally, in West Europe. This avoids the danger of our verdict seeming merely like a "dissociation," a kind of distancing that would in some way ultimately inhabit the moral rather than the political plane.

Instead the Polish tragedy is taken as the starting point for defining the fundamental traits of a new phase, a third phase in the struggle for socialism, in which a prominent role must be played by the communists and workers movement in the West. So the choice that has been made is a positive one. But the quality of the form of that document could involve the following danger: That any comrades who do not consider the analysis of events in the Warsaw Pact countries credible and convincing might be prompted to reject the political outlook that it creates for us, and that, on the other hand, those who uncritically accept the analysis will not appreciate the full significance and novelty of the political proposal.

Basically, as Berlinguer said, there is a danger of some people lapsing into a conservative defense of our tradition and of others imagining that democracy alone is enough to transform society, ultimately returning more or less to a social democratic stance. The emphasis placed on the original, innovative and revolutionary nature of our party's objectives and characteristics was opportune.

However, the historical analysis contained in the document is unconvincing. There is, for instance, the matter of the application of the "Soviet model" in the East European countries. There is no doubt about the grave consequences that this caused, but the way in which the document describes the process that led to the establishment of that model is unconvincing. It is correct to say that that process was not an inevitable consequence of the Yalta agreements. But it should also be stated that what has happened is outside and against the spirit of Yalta, which basically envisaged a transformation of the wartime antifiscist alliance into a peacetime alliance for the building of a new peaceful world order.

This was the context of the prospect, both in the West, and in the Eastern bloc, of "progressive democracy," that is, of a kind of democracy that should have set in motion a process of radical social transformation. The decline in these prospects took place not with the Comintern's first meeting, as the document states, but before. It happened not only in the Eastern bloc, but first in the West and later in the Eastern bloc. It is enough to recall Churchill's speech at Fulton and the Italian and French Government's communist witch hunt. This was the result of the overthrow of the U.S. policy based on nuclear monopoly.

Was it inevitable that the Eastern bloc countries would react that way? In principle no, but historically yes, because of the communist parties' theoretical and cultural shortcomings, which must be made the subject of more thorough study, because a third phase in the sturggle for socialism cannot take place by treating the "second phase" as a parenthesis or by practicing censorhsip. The success of the struggle for socialism in the countries of mature capitalism is one of the conditions for the socialist-type countries to be able now to emerge from a dangerous spiral of recurrent crises.

Documents Approved

[Text] Rome -- "The PCI Central Committee and Central Control Commission, following a broad and in-depth debate on 11-13 January, approved Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer's report, the line pursued with regard to the events in Poland and the stances adopted by the Directorate in its 13 and 30 December 1981 resolutions." This is the text of the document approved last night by a very large majority, with only one vote against, from Comrade Armando Cossutta, and the abstention of Guido Cappelloni and Luigi Ciofi Degli Atti. The debate ended with a reply from Enrico Berlinguer (which we will publish tomorrow), after no fewer than 57 speeches, which contributed a wide-ranging and in-depth analysis of the Polish question, Eastern bloc societies, and the characteristics of the struggle for socialism in our country and in Western Europe.

Before the concluding vote on the agenda, Comrade Cossutta explained his position. "Debates are useful," he said. "Nobody, I believe, emerges from a debate with exactly the same opinions as he had when he came in, especially after a broad and committed debate such as the one we have conducted. This certainly applies to me, and I believe it will also apply to others who do not see things as I do." Cossutta added: "I have tried to take the speeches into account. I will continue to take them into account.

"They have prompted me to many deliberations, but this is not the time to refer to them. May I be allowed simply to say that some of them struck me particularly, and positively too, while others, on the other hand, struck me negatively. Now we are voting. I cannot vote for the Directorate resolution: I have expressed my disagreement and I confirm it. I appreciate and acknowledge the value of Comrade Berlinguer's report. Some parts of it sincerely convinced me. Others did not. I have reflected a great deal on the part of the report concerning the verdict on the socialist societies. I do not agree with that. I regret that I will be voting against it. Of course, the Central Committee's decisions will be binding on everyone."

The speakers on the last day of the debate were: In the morning, Angelo Rossi, Sensales, Mannino, Trivelli, Bufalini, Quercini, Occhetto, Ferrara, Segre, Adriani, Cervetti, Turkci, Macaluse and Lina Fibbi; and in the afternoon, Acano, Napoli, Carnieri, Allinovi, Anita Pasquali, Ferri, G. C. Pajetta, Vaccheri, Agostini and Oddone Longo. We are carrying reports of most of the speeches today and will report on the rest tomorrow.

After this, the Central Committee and Central Control Commission unanimously approved the directorate's proposal, presented by Alessandro Natta, to name Ugo Vetere, mayor of Rome, the the Central Committee.

MINISTER THINKS DOZIER SEARCH NOW AT 'DEAD END'

AU211515 Rome ANSA in English 1505 GMT 21 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 21 Jan (ANSA) -- Italian Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni indicated here today that investigations into the kidnapping of NATO General James Lee Dozier have reached a dead end and that authorities feared for the victim's life. "We have put all our efforts into the abduction," Rognoni said in a speech inaugurating the police academy's school year, "but we have no leads to allay our fears and alarm."

SUSPECTED TERRORISTS KILL TWO CARABINIERI

[Text] Siena, 22 Jan (ANSA) -- A shoot-out at a road block here in Italy's north-central city which claimed the lives of two Carabinieri police was the work of members of the "Front Line" subversive group, police confirmed here. The attack, which took place on Thursday, was first thought by police to have been executed by professional thieves who had robbed a near-by bank and were making their get-away. But investigators on Thursday night were able to positively identify the attack and the bank robbery as the handiwork of the extreme left-wing guerilla group, suspected of being the most powerful guerilla organization of its type after AS.

The attack took place at a road-block when police stopped a car with four individuals aboard, suspected of having just held up a bank in the area. The car's occupants got out and opened fire at the Carabinieri killing Guiseppe Savastano outright. A second policeman, Enzo Oersili, died of gun shot wounds later in the day. A third Carabinieri, who was able to return the fire, was wounded by the group, but not before he felled one of his attackers. The remaining three occupants of the car, among whom was a woman, were able to escape on foot.

Investigators learned later on in the day that the three attackers had confronted people they met in their escape routes with the declaration that they were members of "Front Line." Police also noted that the technique used in the bank robbery and the response of the group to the police at the road-block all carried the marks of terror tactics, and definitively excluded the idea that the killings had been carried out by professional thieves.

SPADOLINI CHAIRS MEETING ON FIGHTING MAFIA

[Text] Rome, 22 Jan (ANSA) -- The government of Italian Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini has pledged to defeat the powerful mafia clans operating on the Italian peninsula, concentrating on cutting off their financial resources by following through on recent investigations uncovering numerous illegal fiscal arrangements and tax evasions by people connected with the mafia.

In an international meeting here today presided over by Spadolini with the participation of the leaders of Italy's police, paramilitary Carabinieri forces and the revenue and customs police, the Guardia di Finanza, the prime minister revealed that "connections" exist between subversive groups and criminal elements. Spadolini said these connections revolve around their complicity in arms trafficking and in a "parallel" attack against the prison institutions.

In reference to the mafia clans, Italian Finance Minister Rino Formica emphasized that contract bidding for government public works projects in the south are a "great problem" and the primary source of financing for the organized crime syndicates which operate mainly in the Naples, and western Calabria and Sicily areas. Formica declared that administrative solutions and the introduction of new measures were necessary to cut back the thicket of crime rackets and special interests in which the mafia organizations prosper.

VATICAN RELEASES POPE'S 4 JAN LETTER TO REAGAN

[Text] Vatican City, 21 Jan (ANSA) -- The Vatican has released copies of the letter Pope John Paul II sent United States President Ronald Reagan January 4, expressing "appreciation" for "humanitarian" measures on behalf of the Polish people. The move to release the message was interpreted by observers as an indirect response to press accounts of Reagan's news conference this week in which the White House chief was quoted as saying he had gotten the pope's "approval" for Washington's sanctions against the Soviet Union and the Polish military government.

The Vatican OSSERVATORE ROMANO daily was one of the few papers in Italy to have skipped over Reagan's assertion about papal approval of the sanctions in its coverage of the news conference Wednesday. As speculation about the omission mounted and Vatican press chief Father Romero Panciroli was barraged with questions about the "missing" passage, the Holy See came out with a communique disclosing the letter Pope John sent Reagan earlier this month in response to two letters from him dated December 17 and 29 December.

The Polish-born pope was quoted as having voiced "appreciation for efforts designed to assure (Poland) concrete assistance, especially on a humanitarian...level." The pope also said moves by many governments, like Washington, were "surely" guided by the same sense of solidarity expressed by several other peoples, social organizations and individuals. John Paul added that such moves were not aimed against "Polish life and progress," but were designed "to sustain the Polish peoples' aspirations for freedom."

The communique took pains to stress that the Vatican did not practice politics and its support for humanitarian moves was not of a political nature. In his January 4 reply to Reagan, the pope said the American President had dealt with an issue of "extreme importance" not only for Poland, but for human rights and the rights of nations in general, in his two previous messages. "World solidarity for the Polish nation shows how widespread and deeply-felt is the desire that these fundamental principles be safeguarded in internal and international affairs," the church leader wrote.

COLOMBO MEETS WITH VISITING IRANIAN MINISTER

[Excerpts] Rome, 22 Jan (ANSA) -- The possibilities for more economic cooperation between Italy and Iran, and the question of reckoning accounts between the two nations for work completed or underway by Italian firms in the west Asian state were two topics under discussion in a meeting held here between Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and the planning and budget minister for the Tehran government, Taqi Banki. The Iranian minister is scheduled to meet today with Foreign Trade Minister Nicola Capria.

During the discussions with Colombo on Thursday afternoon described as "cordial," Banki assured the Rome diplomatic chief that the Tehran government was committed to finding a solution to the problem of financial regulation for Italian firms operating in Iran as soon as possible.

PAKISTAN'S HAQ HAS AUDIENCE WITH POPE, DEPARTS

AU201604 Rome ANSA in English 1539 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Excerpts] Rome, 20 Jan (ANSA) -- Pakistan President General Muhammad Ziaul Haq left Rome today for Bucharest after discussing the Afghan refugee and Jerusalem problem during a half-hour private audience with Pope John Paul II. According to informed sources in the Vatican, the problem of refugees in Pakistan since the Soviet Union invasion of its bordering nation, Afghanistan, was one of the principal subjects of conversation between General Ziaul and the Pope.

The sources also said that the pope discussed the Jerusalem situaion with the Islamabad leader, who then presented his delegation to the pope and exchanged [word indistinct] with the Roman Catholic leader. General Ziaul also viewed the Basilica of St. Peter's, where he remained for a brief devotional visit.

LACORIO VIEWS PROBLEMS OF MILITARY BALANCE IN EUROPE

PM211343 Rome AVANTI in Italian (Current Events and Culture Supplement) 10-11 Jan 82 p V

[Article by Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio: "Military Balance is the Only Feasible Policy of Peace Today"]

[Excerpts] In general people believe thay cannot ask a defense minister to express an opinion on disarmament. But actually it is possible; it is enough to consider that disarmament is linked with detente and that the combination of disarmament and detente is the only specific way to maintain security and therefore peace. Security means above all ensuring that neither of the major opposing blocs -- NATO and the Warsaw Pact -- has any good reasons for considering itself too secure or too insecure. Indeed, in either case the risks of an armed conflict would considerably increase. Security therefore means a balance between the military forces on the chessboard.

In fact where an imbalance between the sides exists, one side develops an overestimate of its potential, while the other develops a constant fear of being crushed. This is why a policy of military balance and of stabilization of the existing international framework is the only real policy of peace that can be pursued in our time. To realize this it is enough to analyze Soviet behavior, as it has manifested itself since the end of World War II, in every crucial phase of international relations.

First, Moscow exerts political pressure to achieve the cancellation of the West's military programs; second, it makes negotiation offers combined with a greater or smaller number of preconditions; last, having observed the difficulty of creating a breach in Western solidarity, the Soviet Government consents to serious negotiations. This line of conduct has been pursued with regard to the Euromissiles too, and this is why there is more than one reason to expect positive developments from the Geneva conference.

But this raises another problem: Who negotiates for, and on behalf of, the West? The answer is that the West cannot entrust its future to a single protagonist, the United States. Indeed, a policy of detente and stabilization must be built with the contribution of all the allies, and every country has its own particular field in which to play a role of calm, cooperation and security.

Let us take Europe. Ostpolitik -- even in the different forms in which it can manifest itself following the crisis in the spirit of Helsinki -- is a European-style foreign policy line easy to identify and of considerable substance. Apart from this, the European countries, taken singly over the years that international problems take governments by surprise and thus force our countries to tackle the most serious international issues after the event in an immediate and pragmatic way. [sentence as published] In other words, we are witnessing a kind of "introspection" on the Europeans' part and a worrying "neglect" on thier part for regional external arrangements [assetti regionali esterni]. That is to say, in the international field there is not the authoritative European presence which is needed and which, if set in motion in an organized manner, could be developed fairly quickly.

Ostpolitik can still continue even after the crisis in the Helsinki act in the two forms that are now feasible: that of gritting one's teeth and maintaining an East-West "dialogue" irrespective of conflicts and crises; and the one reflected in continuous "persuasion" action vis-a-vis the Soviets with regard to security and disarmament. This persuasion must serve to make it clear that the Soviet Union (which has always suffered, and which still suffers from an encirclement complex, has no particular reason for feeling threatened by our European countries and therefore has no particular reason to plan for a very substantial rearmament against Europe -- a rearmament that is forcing the Russian people and people of the countries allied to the Soviet Union to make major social and economic sacrifices which might ultimately prove unacceptable. Poland provides such a lesson.

The East-West confrontation is not limited to the European continent. Indeed, it is spreading into the Mediterranean in an indefinite form and with elements of risk augmented by the general situation of instability. In this area, where NATO's responsibilities are less clearly defined, it is necessary therefore to increase European initiative and solidarity, partly to safeguard overall economic and commercial interests. In this connection the Italian Socialists assert that Italy should do more, further assert its role as an important industrialized and peaceful nation, work harder to consolidate local situation, try to settle disputes and set in motion all initiatives capable of improving the regional situation. Of course everything might be less difficult if our individual countries' initiatives were not separate and could instead be placed in the context of coordinated and organizational planning among all Europeans.

To be more specific about these observations, it can be said that as far as the Italian Socialists are concerned, Italy should pay more attention to at least four points that concern us closely: 1) Our neighborly ties with Belgrade, which must be strengthened; 2) new relations with Tirana; it would be dangerous for them to remain as they are now; 3) the question being asked by both Athens and Ankara, namely whether any European country is capable of initiating a three-way dialogue on the crisis points in Cyprus and the Aegean; 4) last, the Italian-Maltese treaty, which is very valuable because it has constituted a point of neutrality in the heart of the Mediterranean and which must be made more substantial, especially now that with Mintoff's socialist victory Malta has ensured itself a long period of stability.

With regard to Yugoslavia, the post-Tito period has been proving difficult and problematical as is well known. It is true that Yugoslav policy still rests on two linchpins: self-management in domestic policy and nonalignment in foreign policy; but is must be acknowledged that self-management is in difficulty and that the economic situation is causing concern. In the foreign policy field, the prestige enjoyed by Tito as head of the nonaligned countries has found no heir; and this has, for instance, enabled Fidel Castro to create among his associates a pro-Soviet stance, a European and Italian initiative vis-a-vis friendly Yugoslavia. [sentence as published] In our opinion, Italy must be prepared to provide substantial financial support for Belgrade. This is only possible if we decide to improve the present levels of trade. A more substantial initiative to support the Yugoslav economy could be undertaken by the EEC. The French Socialists have alrady acted. Cheysson has formally given the Yugoslav president a promise to support Belgrade in its negotiations with the EEC, to which Yugoslavia is enormously in debt. In other words, Yugoslavia must be enabled to tackle its economic difficulties. Otherwise, without Europe, there could be so-called "fraternal aid" from Moscow, whose attention toward Belgrade has increased recently, especially following the forecast of Spain's entry into the Atlantic alliance.

As far as Albania is concerned, the prime minister's suicide leaves Enver Hoxha the only exponent of the policy line of absolute isolationism that has practically excluded Tirana from the rest of the world. The Albanian Workers Party congress 2 months ago, however, did show some signs of innovation, inasmuch as the new Albanian leaders seem to have espoused the prime minister's cautious overtures. Tirana does not now rule out starting trading and cultural relations that could put an end to a long isolation. For this very reason, and despite the objective difficulties, the Italian Socialists believe our country should make an effort to initiate a wide-ranging dialogue. Obviously this will be neither easy nor quick. But there is no doubt that it must be attempted, partly becuase the Soviet Union is attempting it, and Albania is one of the keys to the Adriatic.

With regard to Greece, Papandreou's recent victory must not be attributed to foreign policy considerations. Opinion polls reveal that in the Greek elections only 5 percent of the voters were guided by foreign policy considerations; the rest were influenced by economic dissatisfaction or simply wanted a change. The problems facing Greece's new socialist government are therefore mainly of a domestic nature, and Papandreou will give them priority over foreign affairs. But there are still a number of foreign policy problems. We should be clear about one thing: NATO is unpopular in Greece; the anti-NATO polemics are no recent invention but they reflect a widespread feeling; the Turkish question is still crucial for Athens, and Athens blames it on NATO. And it is difficult to say that the Greeks are wrong.

So much attention must be devoted to Greece and the process of evolution in Athens' policy must be followed very carefully and in a friendly spirit. Without aiming to become "mediators" in the Greek-Turkish dispute, as socialists we can expect from our country more initiative and more attention toward the problems of the Aegean, together with a very understanding attitude toward the Athens government.

Stability and peace in the Mediterranean are crucial factors in peace worldwide. It was with this conviction that we supported the peace force in Sinai -- not because Camp David is a lodestar, but because Egypt's success and consolidation could constitute a first step in initiating a constructive dialogue with all the other protagonists in the tragic Middle East situation.

NORWAY

PARLIAMENTARIANS' VISIT TO USSR POSTPONED

PM211137 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 16 Jan 82 p 7

[Nils Ottarask report]

[Text] The government had to face some tough criticism for not consulting the Storting's various bodies during the critical international situation which arose after the declaration of martial law in Poland, at yesterday's meeting of the full Foreign Affairs Committee. The criticism came chiefly from the Labor Party, but the Center Party also took the view that the Storting bodies should have been involved at an earlier stage. Committee Chairman Kaare Kristiansen (Christian People's Party), whose responsibility it is to call such confidential meetings between the government and Storting, also admitted that this could be true.

Foreign Minister Svenn Stray excused the government's hesitation by saying that the correct time for consultations between the government and the Storting on foreign and security policy questions was a matter for evaluation. For the government Prime Minister Kaare Willoch also took part in the meeting.

The meeting showed that there is broad support for the view that Norway should adopt a moderate line in its sanctions against the Soviet Union and the military regime in Poland. There was also agreement that economic sanctions should not be put into effect -- something which would also be difficult to do given the minimal trade between Norway and the Soviet Union. The steps to which the government will give further consideration will therefore be diplomatic and political reactions. The government recommended that the planned visit by a parliamentary delegation to the Soviet Union at the end of January should be postponed. Later in the day the Storting president decided to postpone the visit until the situation in Poland improves.

At the Foreign Affairs Committee meeting the foreign minister gave an account of what happened at the recent NATO meeting, at which sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union were discussed. He said that the disagreement between NATO nations, in particular between the United States and Europe, over what measures to adopt is not as great as reports have indicated, but both the foreign minister and the prime minister expressed themselves in such a way that they must be seen to be intent on a more moderate reaction than the United States advocated.

There was broad agreement on the importance of continued humanitarian aid to the Polish people.

Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Kaare Kristiansen commented that the postponement of the parliamentary delegation's visit is a suitable reaction to the present situation. "The Soviet Union in particular would have taken it as a clear political demonstration in its favor if we had gone. I also believe that we would have had some very strong reactions from Norwegian voters if we had gone ahead with the friendly visit to Moscow at the present moment," he said.

EUROPEAN SOCIAL DEMOCRATS DISCUSS POLAND

PM211203 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 16 Jan 82 p 10

[Jon Brynjar Skaara report]

[Text] "We say 'yes' to pressure, but we do not feel sure that economic sanctions against the Soviet Union are right in today's situation. However, we must make the Soviet Union feel pressured through clear political demonstrations, and the Russians cannot deny their responsibility for developments in Poland."

The statement is part of [Norwegian Labor Party leader] Gro Harlem Brundtland's summing up after a conference of European social democratic parties in Oslo on Friday [15 January]. A total of 14 delegates from 6 NATO nations took part in the conference, which was part of a series of informal meetings between the social democratic parties in the smaller NATO nations -- Norway, Denmark, Belgium and the Netherlands, with France and Britain present as observers this time.

The Norwegian Labor Party chairman, who hosted the conference, stressed that the Socialist International's statement on Poland between Christmas and the new year remains an adequate expression of the combined views of the social democratic parties. They dissociated themselves from what has happened in Poland and demand the restitution of human and trade union rights, at the same time as they direct a clear warning to the Soviet Union on the consequences Poland could have for international developments.

"There is no conflict between our view and the NATO declaration on Poland, which states that each individual member nation must evaluate sanctions in accordance with its own laws and regulations, but what are sanctions and how effective are, for example, the sanctions which the United States has implemented? We take the view that pressure is also a form of sanction. We do not have to break agreements already made, but we could hold back from entering into new economic cooperation," the Labor Party chairman said.

Naturally enough Poland dominated the talks in Oslo, but Turkey was also mentioned. "There are many similarities between what is happening in Poland and Turkey, but it would be going too far to draw direct parallels. However, we cannot close our eyes to violations of human rights in 'our' part of the world, and we must put pressure on Turkey," Harlem Brundtland said.

The French Socialist Party took part in the meeting for the first time and the party's international section chief, Jacques Huntziger, briefed his fellow social democrats on France's nuclear policy and the country's view of detente in Europe -- issues on which the French party stands out because of its somewhat divergent views. France stresses more strongly than others that it is the deployment of the Soviet SS-20 missiles which has unleashed the danger of a nuclear war in Europe. The conference agreed that France as a nuclear power should be drawn into the negotiations on strategic arms limitation.

British Labor Party leader Michael Foot briefed the conference on the situation in his own party, which in opinion polls and by-elections has lost large numbers of voters.

FISHING DISPUTE WITH SPAIN STILL UNRESOLVED

PM220823 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 15 Jan 82 p 5

[Text] The dispute between Norway and Spain on Spanish fishing in the fisheries protection zone around Spitsbergen remained unresolved after a round of negotiations between the two countries Thursday [14 January]. The negotiations were accompanied by an exchange of notes between Spanish and Norwegian authorities which show that the two countries are still far apart.

"A further meeting will be held at the end of February. The issue at stake is what actual limitation on Spanish fishing off Spitsbergen we can achieve," Fisheries Ministry departmental chief Gunnar Gundersen, who is leading the negotiations for Norway, told AFTENPOSTEN.

The disputed Spanish cod catch today totals around 10,000 tons and the bulk of this is considered to be illegal by the Norwegian authorities. In a recent note to Spain the Norwegian authorities referred to the Spanish infringements. A dismissive Spanish reply expressed doubts about the legal foundation for the establishment of a fisheries protection zone around Spitsbergen, based partly on the Spanish interpretation of the Spitsbergen treaty.

As long as disagreement remains on the principles involved, future negotiations will mostly deal with reaching practical arrangements acceptable to both countries. Ideally, attempts will be made to arrive at an amicable solution in good time before the Spanish king's visit to Norway in April.

SWEDEN

POLITICAL 'IRRITATION' ON DEMARCATION TALKS NOTED

PM220825 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 16 Jan 82 p 6

[Bo Oestlund report]

[Text] The Swedish-Soviet negotiations on the demarcation line in the Baltic east of Gotland ended Friday [15 January] without result, apart from an agreement that the two sides will meet again. At the same time political irritation within Sweden is growing. "This is not increasing respect for the firmness of our foreign policy behavior," Bertil Lidgaard (Moderate Coalition Party) said.

On Friday Lidgaard introduced a motion in the Riksdag demanding answers to a number of questions occasioned by the demarcation line negotiations with the Soviet Union. Lidgaard wants to know whether Sweden is prepared to abandon the median line principle -- that is, a demarcation line halfway between Gotland and the coast of the Baltic states -- and, if this is the case, what principle would be applied in its place.

But Lidgaard also wanted to know whether it was fitting to negotiate concessions with the Soviet Union so soon after the submarine 137 scandal: "This is not increasing respect for the firmness of our foreign policy behavior," Lidgaard said.

Along with the demarcation line negotiations which ended Friday, there will be two other sets of negotiations with the Soviet Union during 1982. First there are the annual trade consultations. These negotiations are "just around the corner," Foreign Ministry sources said. The other negotiations also take place once a year within the framework of the mixed commission for economic, industrial, scientific and technical cooperation. It is thought that these negotiations will take place in the fall. The short statement from the Foreign Ministry on the outcome of the past week's demarcation line negotiations simply states that "no agreement on the demarcation line was reached in the round of talks, but the parties are agreed to resume the negotiations at a later date."

PAPER URGES BALTIC DEMARCATION SETTLEMENT

[Olof Santesson editorial: "The Line in the Baltic"]

[Excerpts] The demarcation line in the Baltic is an old bone of contention between Sweden and the Soviet Union. There has been strong reaction in the Moderate Coalition Party to the fact that the government was prepared to make any concessions at all soon after last fall's submarine affair. According to what has emerged so far, there is no question of any changes in Sweden's position on the principles involved. There was no reason for Sweden to refrain, as some form of punishment, from attempting to make further progress in the demarcation line negotiations. Because of fishing interests in the disputed area, the possibility of discovering and exploiting oil finds and possible future military factors, it is just as important for Sweden that these talks do not peter out as it is for the Soviet Union.

Foreign Ministry sources have given assurances that Sweden is adhering to its position, which is so well founded in international law. There is absolutely no reason for us to give away valuable resources simply to have the dispute settled or to repair impaired relations with the Soviet superpower by making unilateral concessions. But both sides must try to assess where a final solution may lie -- and negotiate accordingly, otherwise it will probably be impossible to reach any form of agreement. After years of negotiations without result it is about time there was a solution.

DENKTAS URGES PROGRESS IN COALITION NEGOTIATIONS

TA211226 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 21 Jan 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has called on the leaders of the National Unity Party [NUP] and Communal Liberation Party [CLP] to set aside the points they disagree about and dwell on those they agree. He was replying to a question on the prolonged negotiations being held to set up a coalition between the two parties.

He recalled that yesterday he held separate meetings with NUP leader Mustafa Cagatay and CLP leader Alpay Durduran. He added: I suggested to them that they set aside the points they completely disagree over and to work on the points they do agree about.

I told them that if they want our help in the future on the issues they disagree about, we might be of help to them. I told them that the community should not be left without a government any longer. I hope they will achieve positive results soon.

DENKTAS STRESSES NORTH'S NEED FOR TURKISH TROOPS

TA211301 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 21 Jan 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the existence of the Turkish troops in Cyprus is based on a very sound legal foundation.

Denktas today replied to reporters' questions concerning recent reports on the status of Turkish troops in the island and said it is regrettable that an argument has been started on this issue. Pointing out that from the legal viewpoint the existence of Turkish troops in Cyprus is based on a very sound foundation, Denktas noted: If an agreement is reached with the Greek Cypriots and a (?factor) is needed to guarantee the new independence, then the issue would again be based on a sound foundation.

The existence of troops in Cyprus is essential from a humane viewpoint because we are well aware of what the Greek Cypriots are capable of doing as soon as the protection by the Turkish troops is lifted; their statements are clear and their efforts are clear. The existence of Turkish troops in Cyprus has never been and will never be an issue that will be discussed by this community. Perpetuating this argument and issuing reports as though such a discussion is underway only serves the interests of others and would be exploited to our disadvantage.

Recalling that the Turkish Cypriot community has always prayed for the arrival of Turkish troops as soon as possible to save it from the Greek Cypriots, Denktas said the Turkish Cypriots continued their strong resistance with the knowledge that Turkish troops would come and rescue them and that they cherish the Turkish troops. He noted that the Turkish Cypriot community achieved freedom and a (?tranquil) life through the protection and assistance of the Turkish troops. Denktas added that it is regrettable that such an issue has been made a subject for discussion.

CANADA

SANCTIONS AGAINST POLAND, USSR 'MAY BE NECESSARY'

LD212320 Montreal in English to Europe 1900 GMT 21 Jan 82

[Text] Canada has modified her position on sanctions against the Soviet Union. The Canadian minister for external affairs, Mark MacGuigan, says sanctions may be necessary after all. This goes against an earlier decision not to join the United States in its call to impose such measures on Moscow and on Warsaw. As (Denise Woodnicky) reports, Canada has not ruled out sanctions and the situation in Poland may affect Ottawa's final decision on the matter.

[Begin (Woodnicky) recording] Canada's position on Poland has been decscribed as muddled by the Americans, who are pushing for their allies to hit back at the Soviet Union with economic sanctions. To date Mr MacGuigan has not been inclined to stop exports to either the Soviet Union or Poland since starving the Poles is not Canada's policy. But he does recognize that the situation is getting worse, not better, and the idea of sanctions has not been rejected. Mr MacGuigan seems to be waiting for the Polish situation to become more permanent before Canada's position hardens and results in economic sanctions. Still no decision has been made and the issue has not gone before cabinet. [end recording]

FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

GENSCHER PRAISES BONN-PARIS COOPERATION

LD211338 Hamburg DPA in German 1228 GMT 21 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 21 Jan (DPA) -- Friendship and cooperation between the Germans and the French is, according to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, indispensable and irreplaceable. At a luncheon for the outgoing French ambassador, Jean-Pierre Brunet, Genscher stressed today that the Western community increasingly faces great challenges. In this situation comprehensive mutual consultations between friends is especially important. "The dialogue between Bonn and Paris could not have been more comprehensive, open and full of trust," Genscher said.

Genscher said that the Europeans would be gauged according to whether they succeed in completing the way to political union. Bonn fully shared the opinion of President Mitterrand when he attaches particular importance to the further expansion of the community. The Federal Government also agrees with Mitterrand when, from a sense of European responsibility and as a result of sober assessment of realistic possibilities he stated that "we do not want to and cannot come to terms with the division of Europe."

Ambassador Brunet represented France for 4 years in the Federal Republic and is now returning to Paris. His successor in Bonn will be the present French ambassador in Moscow, Henri Froment-Meurice.

U.S. CREDIBILITY DEPENDS ON GRAIN POLICY

DW220749 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 21 Jan 82 p 10

[Commentary signed R.H.: "Reagan's Treaty"]

[Text] President Reagan is threatening to impose further sanctions against the Soviet Union and Poland. In recent European history, the term "sanctions" is linked with a decline of the value of this instrument of international law.

Some of us still remember the ineffectiveness of sanctions imposed against Italy when it annexed Ethiopia. European skepticism regarding the value of sanctions is based on this kind of experience as well as the knowledge that war is another alternative to sanctions. Credibility is necessary regarding U.S. firmness in matters of sanctions, and this can be regained only through a revision of the grain delivery policy, that is, through risky sacrifice in the area of domestic policy and economy. This would mean a complete abandonment of detente policy, with the realization that everything provided to the Soviet Union, be it grain for baking bread or credits for pipelines, only strengthens the military power or superpower of this empire which subjugates other people. If the United States drew the consequences from such considerations and decided to impose a total embargo, the Germans would be in a bad position.

PORTUGAL

MINISTRY DENIES INVOLVEMENT IN ANGOLAN AFFAIRS

LD212108 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 21 Jan 82

ETA-PM REPORTEDLY DISCOUNTS ARMS DISCOVERY

LD211214 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1000 GMT 21 Jan 82

[Text] Sources close to ETA, Political-Military Front [ETA-PM] qouted by the daily newspaper DEIA with regard to the discovery by the police of 5,000 kg of arms at a Vizcaya country house, say that they do not attach much importance to the find and that most of the equipment seized is loot from an attack on a gunsmith's shop in Elgoibar in 1977. The newspaper believes that the ETA-PM faction, which is in favor of a return to the armed struggle, has grown considerably over the past few months.

UNITED KINGDOM

MISSILE DESTROYER TO BE SOLD TO PAKISTAN

PM211507 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 21 Jan 82 p 5

[Text] The 6,800-ton missile destroyer London is to be sold to Pakistan, the Ministry of Defence confirmed yesterday, although three months ago the Pakistan Government had rejected the offer as the price was too high. The new price for the 18-year-old ship is now thought to be well under the original 5 million pounds.

Last month the London fired the Royal Navy's last broadside after 500 years of this form of fighting at sea. It is likely that some work will now be done on the ship in Britain, mainly to remove her Seaslug I anti-aircraft missile system before she is handed over to Pakistan later in the year. Production of the early version of the missile ceased some 10 years ago, and since then large numbers have been used up as targets for more modern anti-aircraft missiles, which means it is unlikely that enough are now held in store to meet Pakistan's requirements.

SCHMIDT URGES 'GUARDED LANGUAGE' ON POLAND

[Text] Hamburg, 22 Jan (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has advocated "guarded language" and moderation in assessing events in Poland. Addressing the special Hamburg SPD party congress dealing with the forthcoming municipal elections on 6 June, Schmidt said today that by "moderating our language" the Federal Republic is able to help prevent a worldwide confrontation. Furthermore, it cannot be in the interests of the Germans to endanger through East-West confrontation what has been build in the past between the two German states.

The chancellor also said that the "rejection of any kind of military dictatorship and restrained language are not mutually exclusive." The Federal Government's call for lifting martial law in Poland, the release of political prisoners and the continuation of the reform course is not interference in the internal affairs of another state. On the basis of the Helsinki Final Act these demands must be made.

DER SPIEGEL CITES POLICY CORRECTION STUDY

[Text] Bonn, 24 Jan (DPA) -- DER SPIEGEL, citing a secret study of the planning department of the Bonn Foreign Ministry, reports that Bonn's foreign policy is to be geared more closely to the Western alliance. In view of the massive criticism leveled by Washington and other NATO capitals at the Federal Government's policy on Poland, the Foreign Ministry planners advise a policy correction and suggest that Soviet policy should not be played down.

A Bonn ministry spokesman today indirectly confirmed that such a paper exists when he said that it is the job of the planning staff to work out all kinds of alternatives. However, it is for the foreign minister to decide what options should be chosen.

Quoting a coalition discussion in the federal chancellor's office, DER SPIEGEL reports that the Federal Republic should "sail in the center of the convoy and not in the rear." If the Polish military leaders relax their grip in the weeks ahead, Bonn will be spared the necessity of making an obvious correction to its own policy and abandoning its special function as an interpreter at the boundary between West and East. DER SPIEGEL cites the planning paper: "In this situation it will be a priority task of our foreign policy to ensure the compatability of our Eastern policy and our policy regarding our alliance." Moreover, "we should learn from our experience regarding the public presentation of our policy toward Poland in the first 2 weeks following 13 December."

The study suggests close "coordination on security policy by the four great democracies in Europe," i.e. France, Great Britain, Italy and the Federal Republic. This second pillar will strengthen the alliance and, the Bonn Foreign Ministry planners hope, be regarded as constructive and not divisive in Washington.

SPD EXECUTIVE DISCUSSES SECURITY RESOLUTION

LD251030 Hamburg DPA in German 0917 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 25 Jan (DPA) -- The SPD Executive is meeting on Monday in order to prepare for the Munich SPD conference, focusing on security and employment policy. The Executive, meeting under the chairmanship of Willy Brandt, is to consider a security policy draft resolution which proposes that the SPD again define its fundamental attitude toward the NATO dual decision on nuclear medium-range weapons not at the forthcoming party conference but only in 1983.

Instead the party leadership's draft resolution, which was drawn up by a working group under the chairmanship of Presidium member and disarmament expert Egon Bahr, sets out the SPD's expectations toward the U.S.-Soviet medium-range negotiations in Geneva.

The resolution proposes a moratorium on the deployment of new short-range missiles in East and West for the duration of the Geneva negotiations so that the arms race does not continue below the level of medium-range weapons. This proposal does not entail a moratorium for medium-range missiles such as has been rejected several times by the FRG and the United States.

For the first time the resolution demands that the nuclear weapons of France and Great Britain be taken account of in establishing an approximate military balance between East and West. Up to now these forces have not been a matter for discussion at the Geneva negotiations, into which the SPD working group feels all nuclear weapons stationed in and aimed at Europe should be incorporated.

The draft resolution aims at achieving a compromise between what is thought will be a strong minority at the party conference which is hostile to the NATO dual decision and a probable majority of delegates who will for the most part support the policy of the government, which aims at achieving a reduction of European nuclear missiles in East and West on the basis of the NATO strategy in negotiation with the Soviet Union. Defense Minister Hans Apel is also a member of the working group which formulated the security resolution.

LAMBSDORFF REJECTS CALLING OFF PIPELINE DEAL

LD242300 Hamburg DPA in German 1614 GMT 24 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 24 Jan (DPA) -- The Federal Government is to honor the agreement concerning the supply of pipes in return for gas, signed by several West European states and the Soviet Union. By making this assurance, Otto Graf Lambsdorff, federal minister of economic affairs, rejected the call made by Bavarian Minister President Franz Josef Strauss, for dropping the contract as a result to events in Poland.

GENSCHER, TINDEMANS HOLD TALKS ON EC POLICY

LD232024 Hamburg DPA in German 1958 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 23 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Belgian Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans, at present chairman of the EC foreign ministers conference, discussed the financial problems of the European Community, in a meeting in Bonn on Saturday that lasted several hours. The EC foreign ministers will be meeting in Brussels on Monday in order to draw final conclusions from the discussions on contribution payments within the community and agriculture expenditures that have been going on since mid-1980. Following the talks today, a Foreign Ministry spokesman said Genscher and Tindemans, who will be having contacts with other EC countries over the weekend, agreed "that agreement will be reached on Monday." Genscher and Tindemans also discussed during their meeting in Bonn the situation in Poland.

APEL PROPOSES EXTENDING MILITARY SERVICE

[Excerpt] Bonn, 24 Jan, (DPA) -- In view of the lower birth rate Defense Minister Hans Apel believes it is necessary to lengthen the period of national service "in 6 to 8 years" in order to maintain the combat readiness of the federal army. On the ZDF television program "Bonn Perspective" which was devoted to the still unresolved reorganisation of alternative national service, the minister today spoke in favor of discussing even before the lower house elections the issues of increasing the proportion of longer-serving soldiers and possibly of using women on a voluntary basis in non-combat units. The combat-readiness of the federal army rested essentially on maintaining its full complement, "and we can't fiddle around with that," the minister said.

PALME COMMISSION ENDS NINTH PLENARY SESSION

[Text] Bonn/Hannover, 24 Jan (DPA) -- The East-West confrontation has complicated the work of the Palme international commission for disarmament, which ended its ninth plenary session on Sunday after 3 days of consultations in Bonn. "It is not easy to find common ground when commission members such as former U.S. secretary of state Cyrus Vance and Georgiy Arbatov, Soviet expert on the United States and Central Committee member, are in confrontation with each other. Even the vocabulary used is a source of conflict," SPD Bundestag deputy Egon Bahr said.

As chairman of the "Independent Commission on Disarmament and Security Issues," former Swedish prime minister Olof Palme stated at a press conference in Bonn that great progress has, however, been made in establishing a joint concept. The work of the commission, which is to pave the way for submitting a joint program at the special UN General Assembly session on disarmament in the summer focuses on three major areas: 1) nuclear weapons, particularly in Europe; 2) regional security, especially in the Third World, and 3) economic consequences of arming.

The commission, which includes leading Third World politicians, also dealt with the issue of chemical weapons at this session but failed to agree on a total ban. Palme stressed the need for halting the development of weapons not yet in existence which would, for example, be made possible by advanced molecular biology.

Soviet Central Committee member Georgiy Arbatov found "comprehensive agreement on the most important issues." He stressed primarily the significance of disarmament for the economic future of the world. Arbatov believes that the commission could complete its work in April. The Soviet expert described the "zero option" as "basically a good idea," but criticized the version proposed by U.S. President Ronald Reagan as a one-sided solution to the detriment of the Soviet Union. In this context Olof Palme regretted the curtailment of the Haig-Gromyko meeting by 1 day and expressed the hope that, apart from the Poland situation, the question of negotiations on strategic weapons would also be raised in Geneva on Tuesday. Palme emphasized the important link between the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles and the strategic sphere, which would have to be resumed in 1982. Palme explained that there has been no opportunity to discuss the Polish situation in the commission's work.

Jean-Marie Daillet, the French commission member, declined to participate on the grounds that the work of the Palme commission was determined by the Soviets. This statement was disputed by Palme on Saturday with the remark that Daillet stands alone in his views. Apart from Palme, Arbatov and Bahr, former prime ministers Jozef Cyrankiewicz (Poland) and Mrs Gro Harlem Brundtland [Norway], Japanese Foreign Ministry official Haruki Mori and Alfonso Garcia-Robles, former Mexican foreign minister, also took part in the final conference.

Palme has spoken against extending arms exports from industrialized states. In an interview with the Hannover NEUE PRESSE (Monday edition) he said that regulations on curbing it would have to be rigorous. In the politician's opinion the arms trade destroys the "economies of the developing countries" and "heightens the danger of war." He accused the exporting countries of "cynicism" on this issue.

Palme is confident of the prospects of the Geneva disarmament talks on medium-range weapons. It is true that the initial stance of the two states provides grounds for pessimism. The superpowers, however, gradually have to come to the recognition that this arms race heightens the risk of nuclear war, the politician said. The debate on the feasibility of a nuclear war illustrates, in Palme's view, that a nuclear war is total madness. There could only be losers in it. Palme said: "I believe we are in the process of winning this debate."

GENSCHER ASKS JAPAN TO SHOW EXPORT 'RESTRAINT'

LD221338 Hamburg DPA in German 1257 GMT 22 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 22 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has asked Japan to show "restraint and consideration with respect to specially sensitive areas of production in Europe." In a speech to the German-Japanese society on Friday in Bremen, Genscher emphasized his theme: "Europe's trade deficit should not be overcome in the long term by a reduction in Japanese exports to Europe, but by the reverse means of an increase in European exports to Japan."

Japanese export successes should not be seen as a threat but as an opportunity. "There is no reason for despondency. Even after the latest increases only approximately 3 percent of our imports come from Japan, and for the EEC this figure is 4.6 percent." "But we agree all the same," Genscher expressly stated, "that it is not a tolerable long-term state of affairs that Japan exports nearly three times the amount to the EEC as it imports from there."

U.S. INTERESTS' PROMOTED WITHOUT MORALS'

[Karl Grobe editorial: "Without Standards and Morals"]

[Excerpts] There will be no UN sanctions against Israel; the actual annexation of the Golan Heights by a suprise action of Prime Minister Menahem Begin and his rightist majority will not be punished. The United States saw to it that the United Nations will limit itself to mere words, as has happened so often. Why? Because UN Ambassador Jeanne Kirkpatrick believes that any other decision would have increased tension in the region. Permit me to say the opposite would have been correct. The rejection of a relatively mild resolution through the U.S. veto forces the moderate Arab states to join the Syrian fighting front. The Arab foreign ministers will certainly make the appropriate decisions in the near future.

But sanctions will be imposed against Poland and the Soviet Union, although this will almost automatically increase tensions between power blocs at a sensitive point in Europe. Why? Because the Soviet Union and the Polish people must be punished for the fact that the Polish generals have taken over. I object again: The extensive U.S. wheat export deal with the Soviet Union remains untouched, while the Europeans allies -- if need be, under pressure -- should punish the bad communists in the name of the United States.

Double standards -- or none at all? There was a military putsch in Turkey in September 1980, but U.S. Secretary of State Haig rejects any idea of taking action for Turkish democracy and becomes aggressive toward the press if it dares ask him about it. The junta of the generals has, after all, promised to return to normal conditions. Permit me to say that Wojciech Jaruzelski has done exactly the same. There is no reason to assume that one is more dishonest than the other.

Haig says that the critics of his and President Reagan's course apply double standards in comparing Poland with Turkey. In such a case he would have to prove that a rightist military ruler is more credible and "democratic" than a communist ruler.

Speaking of double standards in this connection would be putting it too nicely because Washington's foreign policy is one of interests promoted without morals just as those of the other superpower, the USSR. Superpower policy is aimed at becoming "number 1." Power policy must be cynical on both sides, it cannot afford morals, but it must maintain standards, or else it will fail.

Since the times of Lyndon Johnson, the United States has made tumbling from one credibility gap to another almost a national sport. The Reagan government is already very close to the foreign political achievements of its predecessors, and it still has 3 years to go.

CHEYSSON SAYS PALESTINIAN STATE NECESSARY

NC221930 Paris AFP in English 1921 GMT 22 Jan 82

[Text] London, 22 Jan (AFP) -- The Camp David accords have virtually exhausted their effectiveness, and further Middle East peace progress hinges on participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) as well as the Soviet Union, French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson has said in an interview published here.

"We do not see...how Camp David can lead to a final comprehensive settlement," Mr Cheysson told the English language Arab monthly, THE MIDDLE EAST. "We can't imagine negotiations leading to a settlement without the presence of the PLO as well as the other Arab states directly involved in the future of the Palestinian people," he said. "Therefore, Camp David has always been considered as insufficient by us." He said that once Israel withdraws from the Sinai on April 25, "we think Camp David can't bring any more progress."

"I hope," he said, that "the Americans will really accept their responsibility for peacekeeping in the Middle East, which means they will accept there are two parties and that the Arab side counts and the Palestinians must have a state." "The Europeans cannot work hand in hand with the Americans as long as our assessment of the situation is so different from theirs," said Mr Cheysson. "It's almost absurd to think that there could be peace in the Middle East without a guarantee by the Russians, besides, the Russians support Syria and other forces, so they are not simply going to disappear into thin air."

Mr Cheysson denied that French President Francois Mitterrand had said Jordan should be the Palestinian state. "Our attitude," he said, "is this: A Palestinian state, its borders, its relations with its neighbors, all this will be decided by negotiations. At these negotiations, the Palestinians will be represented by the PLO. Is it conceivable that the PLO will accept a Palestinian state anywhere but in the occupied territories?" He added: "But we all (?know), although it is none of our business, that the Palestinian state will have very special relations with Jordan, since there are so many Palestinians living in Jordan.... This is what the president meant."

CONTRACT SIGNED WITH USSR ON SIBERIAN GAS

[Text] Paris, 23 Jan (AFP) -- France and the Soviet Union have signed a deal for the annual supply of 8,000 million cubic metres of Siberian gas to France from 1984, the French national gas company Gaz de France announced here today. The deal is the first major Western contract with the Soviet Union since the imposition of martial law in Poland and sanctions against Moscow by the U.S., which has objected to excessive Western dependence on Soviet energy.

The Soviet gas will be piped to Europe by a 5,000 km.-(2,800 mile-) long pipeline which will be built with the help of West European firms. The U.S. has heavily criticized both the pipeline contract and the final supply of gas. The contract, which will run for 25 years, will mean that by 1990 France is receiving 30 percent of its gas supplies from the Soviet Union against 15 percent in 1981. But by 1990 overall French energy dependence on the USSR will be five percent because of an expected fall in Soviet oil exports.

Last night's signature came two days after a meeting here at COCOM, the coordinating committee on sales of strategic materials to Eastern bloc countries.

About half of the 40,000 million cubic metres of Soviet gas expected to flow through the pipeline annually is now the subject of firm contracts. Early last October Italy signed a "prelimintary contract" for the supply of 8,500 million cubic metres. And in November West Germany agreed to buy 10,500 million cubic metres at a price of 4.75 dollars a British Thermal Unit (BTU). After signing up the three major clients, the Soviet Union is now seeking contracts with Austria, the Netherlands, Belgium and Switzerland. Those countries are expected to consume the remaining 12,300 million cubic metres.

Gaz de France (GDF) management said they were given no political guidance from the Elysee presidential palace, and the contract appeared to have been settled on a commercial basis. GDF had also stressed that it would not face a major crisis if the Soviet-supplied energy were ever cut off.

GDF already has substantial underground stocks and could also step up its purchases from other suppliers such as the Netherlands, which already furnishes 32 percent of French gas needs. GDF could also cut off large industrial consumers with "interruptable" contracts in the event of a Soviet shutdown of the pipeline.

The pipeline contract is already worth 4,500 million francs (800 million dollars) to French firms. With the contract with the Soviet Union signed, GDF has now started talks with Algeria, which last year supplied 14 percent of French gas.

Labor Official Objects

LD241342 Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 24 Jan 82

[Text] The French Democratic Federation of Labor [CFDT] does not agree with the signing of the French-Soviet agreement on gas. In its view, the signing is ill-timed. The national secretary of the CFDT Jacques Chereque believes that in view of its international implications such a decision required vast information and serious consultations with the parties concerned. Without any doubt, Jacques Chereque said, this operation weakens the scope of the reaction of the French Government and of its European partners to the situation in Poland and to the strategy of the USSR.

NATIONAL CONGRESS REELECTS CHIRAC RPR LEADER

NC241428 Paris AFP in English 1425 GMT 24 Jan 82

[Text] Toulouse, southern France, 24 Jan (AFP) -- Mayor of Paris Jacques Chirac was today re-elected leader of the Gaullist RPR (Rassemblement Pour La Republique) at the party's national congress here. Mr Chirac was first elected party leader in 1976.

KING HASSAN II OF MOROCCO ARRIVES FOR TALKS

LD242320 Rabat Domestic Service in Arabic 2000 GMT 24 Jan 82

[Excerpts] King Hassan II and President Francois Mitterrand will meet in Paris on Tuesday. King Hassan II arrived in Paris this evening on his first visit to France since President Mitterrand assumed the presidency. The king was officially welcomed at Charles de Gaulle airport.

In a brief statement to the press the king replied to a question as to whether the visit means that problems between Morocco and France will be resolved. He said that problems always exist among partners. The important thing, he added, is to find a solution for them and that there should be no difficulties. The king added: So long as Morocco and France continue to have close contacts there will always be problems.

L'UNITA RESPONDS TO PRAVDA CRITICISM OF PCI

[Text] Tomorrow's issue of L'UNITA contains a reply to the attack made today in the CPSU organ PRAVDA against the PCI for its stance on the events in Poland. L'UNITA publishes the full text of the PRAVDA article, which comments on the documents approved by the PCI governing bodies on Poland. L'UNITA points out that no information about these documents has been given to the Soviet public.

After noting the authoritativeness of the article, which is unsigned, L'UNITA asserts that a diversity of assessments and judgments, however widespread, has not given rise to a confrontation of ideas but is being used as a pretext to condemn and denigrate the PCI and even to class it among the enemies of peace and socialism. We find in this article, concludes L'UNITA, further demonstration of a far from new method used in the past by the CPSU against other communist parties and which constitutes one reason, and not the least relevant, for our criticisms.

Pajetta Response

[Excerpts] Rome, 25 Jan (ANSA) -- Attention was focused on the Italian Communist Party (PCI) today after it came under a violent public attack Sunday in the Soviet Communist Party paper PRAVDA. Veteran Italian communist Giancarlo Pajetta said Sunday that naturally the party would respond to the PRAVDA attack, "because it is our duty and because we too have fraternal help to offer." "Our fraternal aid lies in our resistence, our capacity to help think and reflect. We too make use of reason and reflection," Pajetta said.

However, unlike PRAVDA, he said that the PCI would not resort to attack and insults which the party considered unsuitable among cadres. Instead, "we will respond with arguments that demonstrate what we have learned from experience and what reason has taught us," Pajetta continued.

Two weeks ago a meeting of the PCI Central Committee wound up with approval of a document that criticized the Soviet Union over events in Poland. PCI Secretary Enrico Berlinguer confirmed his party's dissent over real socialism at a rally Saturday. He said on that occasion that the Leninist theory which identifies the state with the party was no longer acceptable. Berlinguer also called on the Socialists to work with the Communists for an alternative for the old power system in Italy.

Socialist Party leader Bettino Craxi did not reply directly to Berlinguer's invitation but dwelled at length at the weekend on the theme of Italy's governability. He confirmed the desire of the Socialists to go ahead with the government verification already agreed up on with Premier Giovanni Spadolini and the other coalition partners.

TELEPHONE MESSAGE ON DOZIER PROVES ANOTHER HOAX

NC231241 Paris AFP in English 1231 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Text] Verona, 23 Jan (AFP) -- Italian police covered the eastern side of Lake Garda in northern Italy today in a fruitless search for U.S. Brigadier General James Dozier, who was reported executed in a taped message found by police. The search of the lake was prompted by a telephone call by a man saying he represented the Red Brigades leftist guerrilla group, which has claimed the abduction of General Dozier from his home in this northern Italian city on December 17. The man, who called Verona's ARENA newspaper, said police would find a tape in a lakeside telephone booth. That tape was found.

The recording said it was the last communique by the Red Brigades on the Dozier kidnapping, and that the general, who had been sentenced to death by a "people's court," would be found in a boat protected by a blue covering on the eastern side of the lake. Police have reported several differences, however, between the latest statement and the Red Brigades' usual communiques. It did not, for example, have a number.

Two Captured After Shootout

AU231959 Rome ANSA in English 1945 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Tuscany, 23 Jan (ANSA) -- Two "Prima Linea" (Front Line) terrorists who killed two Carabinieri and wounded a third after a Siena bank robbery Thursday have been captured late this afternoon during a colossal manhunt underway in the countryside around Tuscany some seventy kilometers north of Rome. The two were taken to a Carabinieri barracks where officers had some trouble keeping them safe from a crowd of angry citizens. It was not clear where the rest of the group was. Police believed the commandoes had split up and that the rest of them might be rounded up within the next few hours. The capture came after a shootout.

Syrian, W. German Arrested

[Text] Rome, 23 Jan (ANSA) -- Two foreign visitors, a Syrian and a West German, were taken into custody January 5 when they were caught entering Italy with a travel bag full of electric detonators and three extra passports on them, authorities announced today. The two, Nasrj al-Taminj and Brigitte Pagendam, were arrested at Rome's international airport shortly after landing from Belgrade. Nasrj al-Taminj told police the material was given to him from "friends" in the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, an extremist Palestinian resistance organization headed by George Habash. The two were arrested around the same time the Italian magistracy disclosed findings that showed connections between Italian terrorist groups, both rightwing and leftwing, and subversive groups abroad.

Two Egyptian nationals were formally indicted in recent days along with four Italians for the murder of two youths believed to have been members of an international arms and drug ring which channelled their proceeds into subversive groups. The bodies of the two were found recently on the bottom of a lake near Rome. This past Wednesday, the Interior Ministry ordered six Middle Eastern students to leave the country after police found a large number of instruction manuals on the use of arms and explosives in their country-home outside Perugia.

SPADOLINI BACKS 'CALCULATED PRESSURES' ON POLAND

AU231542 Rome ANSA in English 1536 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 23 Jan (ANSA) -- Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini called for a "unitary" action of "motivated condemnation" and "calculated pressures" to get the Polish military regime to change its course in an interview due for publication shortly by the ESPRESSO news weekly.

According to Spadolini, the Soviet Union was surely not "unaware" of the "coup d'etat" in Poland, a country, he said, which never really had "a Marxist-Leninist ideological experience" and whose communist party "has always been in the minority." Events in Poland, the Italian Government leader argued, brings out the "ruthless aspects" of an "absolutist raison d'etat" and shows that "the Soviet Union is more interested in maintaining its power than in advancing ideology or proletarian internationalism."

LIBYA'S AL-'UBAYDI OFFERS HELP AGAINST TERRORISM

[Text] Rome, 23 Jan (ANSA) -- Libya has offered Italy concrete help in its fight to combat terrorism. During a press conference here last night, 'Abd al-'Ati al-'Ubaydi, the Libyan Jamahiriyah's secretary (minister) for foreign relations, also categorically denied that his country was in any way implicated in the current upsurgence of terrorism in Italy. He said that it was "important to cope with the problem in a concrete way rather than spreading doubts and accusations."

Al-'Ubaydi is in Rome to take part in a mixed Italo-Libyan committee which deals primarily with economic relations between the two countries. However, during the press conference he took pains to stress that his country is against all forms of terrorism in all nations of the world, and voiced satisfaction over the fact that Italians have been unable to find even one concrete link between Libya and terrorism in this country.

He also said that Libya today was much calmer because European nations seemed to have finally understood that Tripoli's position is truly one of nonalignment. With regard to the Middle East, the Libyan official said that it was comforting to see that Italy was fully aware of the Palestinian people's rights and the need for their participation in any solution to the crisis in that part of the world.

On Trade, Cooperation

NC230836 Tripoli Domestic Service in Arabic 0600 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Text] Brother 'Abd al-'Ati al-'Ubaydi, secretary of the people's committee of the people's office for external liaison, has stressed that the Libyan Jamahiriyah views relations with Italy from more than one angle -- relations of neighborliness and the economic potential in both countries, and using them for cooperation that benefits the Libyan Arab people and the Italian people.

In a press conference yesterday at the Libyan Arab people's office in (?Rome), which was attended by a number of reporters and correspondents of radios and news agencies, Al-'Ubaydi said Italy is considered an important market for Libyan oil and that the Libyan Jamahiriyah constitutes an important market and [words indistinct] for Italian trade. He said there are business opportunities in the Libyan Jamahiriyah for Italian companies. Al-'Ubaydi stressed that these economic facts are represented in the volume of cooperation that now totals $6 billion. He stressed that oil dealings with Italy nearly total the same amount. He said this means the creation of business opportunities for Italian manpower both in Italy and in the Libyan Jamahiriyah and represents a remedy for unemployment in Italy.

Al-'Ubaydi said that from these facts we have reached a common conviction to continue our oil supplies to Italy and to have partnerships with Italian companies to implement the plans of transformation in the Libyan Jamahiriyah and to grant facilities to Italian manpower in the Libyan Jamahiriyah. Al-'Ubaydi stressed that we in the Libyan Jamahiriyah are convinced that cooperation between neighborly countries, like the Libyan Jamahiriyah and Italy, must take into account the political and economic aspects despite the fact that the political and social systems differ in both countries.

Al-'Ubaydi said he discussed with Italian officials several relevant issues and that agreement has been reached on these issues. He pointed out that certain international issues were discussed, such as the Middle East question, the Palestinian issue, the situation in the Mediterranean basin and the possibility of keeping this region free from international tension and conflict.

He said common conviction has been reached on these issues, particularly recognition of the Palestinian Arab people's rights and the need for their participation in any political solution to the Palestinian issue and for taking into account the UN resolutions on this issue. He said that regarding the situation in the Mediterranean, there is conviction about the need for cooperation among the littoral countries to create an atmosphere of neighborliness, dialogue and understanding to safeguard the area from the danger of being divided into two blocs [words indistinct] between the superpowers.

[Words indistinct] the hireling information media and involving the Libyan Jamahiriyah in the acts of terrorism in Italy. He refuted these claims, stressing what the brother leader has repeatedly stated: that the Libyan Jamahiriyah is against terrorism. Al-'Ubaydi stressed the Libyan Jamahiriyah's readiness to cooperate with any country, including Italy, to combat the phenomenon of terrorism, which threatens security and peace. He said we are satisfied with the affirmations of the Italian officials that all claims about Libyan involvement in terrorism are merely allegations.

LONGO HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE 19 JAN IN ROMANIA

AU201022 Bucharest AGERPRES in English 0815 GMT 20 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Bucharest, 19 Jan (AGERPRES) -- On January 19 Pietro Longo, secretary-general of the Italian Social Democratic Party [PSDI] met Romanian and Italian newsmen, during a press conference. The guest expressed satisfaction at the interview he had with Nicolae Ceausescu, the secretary general of the Romanian Communist Party, with whom he had had a cordial interview. From the very start -- the guest said -- I have noted many converging viewpoints. They first of all cover the problems of disarmament viewed through the angle of finding a tactical and strategic balance at as low a level as possible.

Next he referred to the withdrawal of already [words indistinct] nuclear (?systems) from Europe, to halting the emplacement of further ones, the so-called zero option, that is the total removal of missiles from Europe. At the same time there has been noted convergence as concerns the opportuneness of the European nations' voicing their will at the time when the Geneva negotiations have started between the Soviet Union and the United States of America, since the European nations must contribute to the success of the negotiations, must determine responsibly such a balance of peace [as received] that should enable each and every European country to live in full security. The same convergence of opinions, the guest said, was also manifest in relation to the need for a possible conference on disarmament, participated in by the European countries, to tackle both the nuclear and the conventional weapons, to the same end, namely reducing the forces on both sides.

We have noted converging opinions also as concerns the importance attached to observing the final act of the Helsinki European conference, the need for concrete action to be taken so that the disarmament process, that we all wish and hope will happen, the diminishing of the military spending may result in using greater -- financial and economic -- resources to the benefit of the developing countries, to ensuring a new balance of the world, a thing we deem essential for a guaranteed general [word indistinct] peace.

The convergence of opinions was also manifest on safeguarding the fundamental principles of national sovereignty, the belief that any people, any country must solve its problems by itself, without any outside interference, as well as in highlighting the necessity that the Near East issues should be settled through negotiations.

CARRILLO QUESTIONED ON POLAND, PCE CRISIS

PM221157 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 12 Jan 82 pp 3-4

[Excerpt] Madrid -- Explicit acknowledgment of the Polish communist party's failure, extending to the Soviet model, and the PCE's internal crisis -- "there is a hand behind that crisis which it is easy to identify" -- were the central issues of the press conference held at midday yesterday by PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo following last weekend's meeting of the party's Central Committee, at which various condemnatory resolutions concerning the events in Poland and the repression by the Turkish regime were unanimously approved.

"The Polish United Workers Party's failure," Santiago Carrillo said, "can only be explained as the failure of the exporting by the Soviet Union of its political and economic model to other countries and the attempt to maintain that model at all costs." According to the Communist leader, the Soviet economic model cannot be regarded as a model for the working classes, especially in the Western countries.

In Carrillo's opinion, that resolution "is important, not only because the emergence of a military junta in Poland is unacceptable from the viewpoint of our communist principles, but also because it enables us to make progress in our Eurocommunist policy, which is based primarily on the PCE's independence."

Three Ways

In Carrillo's opinion, the cause of the Polish crisis must be found in the fact that the communist party and the Polish state have clashed with the Polish people's concerns and real situation.

Carillo acknowledged that the exporting of the Soviet model had already failed on previous occasions, and he recalled the case of Czechoslovakia. After analyzing the overall situation in the East bloc countries' area, Carrillo asserted that there is no country in the world which can consider itself truly communist. "We deem a process of democratic renewal to be necessary in these countries," he stated," and there are three ways in which it can take place: radical reform of the party itself, political revolution which would change the party and, at worst, a counterrevolution which would destroy them."

"October Revolution" Is Confused With Stalinism

These assertions -- stemming, he reiterated, from the Central Committee's resolution on Poland -- were complemented by others of a similar kind concerning the mistake of confusing communism with the regime in the USSR. After emphasizing that this Soviet model is not attractive to the broad masses, and especially in the developed countries of Europe, he noted that "our mistake is that we have long identified the October Revolution with the Soviet model established by Stalin. That mistake, which was the starting point of our activity for a long time, is that which the Eurocommunist current is attempting to correct during this historical period." This mistake of identification, he also stated, is to blame for communist parties not having achieved the political transformation of the system in the Western countries.

Diversionary Maneuvers

After making various interpretations concerning what is happening to the international workers movement, emphasizing his idea of the disappearance of the blocs and advocating unity between the communist and socialist parties, with the cooperation also of the Third World liberation movements, the press conference turned to the internal crisis which the PCE is undergoing.

"This issue was not discussed at the Central Committee meeting," the secretary general said. He then criticized a section of the press, "In my opinion, excessive importance is being attached to it," he said, and he added that "it is significant that when the Central Committee was going to discuss such an important issue as that of Poland, an attempt has been made to trip us up with the issue of the internal crisis."

"An Organized Current"

Carrillo went on to state that the PCE, like any democratic community, has rules of the game which must be respected: "In our party there are some people who do not wish to respect the rules of the 10th congress; if the PCE allowed that it would cease to be a democratic party and become a zoo." He also emphasized the contradiction existing between the stance of the five Madrid city councillors, who, "while attempting not to relinquish their posts, accepted their expulsion from the party, and that of the 41 municipal councillors who are now threatening to resign from their posts; in this conduct the activity of an organized current can be seen."

Last, he pointed out that the so-called renewalist current still has not expressed its opinion, as the PCE has done, on the events in Poland. When asked about a possible resignation from his post as secretary general, he stated that "Mr Carrillo's ouster from that post is possible as soon as the Central Committee so decides; there are many people who want my ouster, and not so much within the party as outside, and outside Spain."

DENMARK

TURKEY MAY BE CHARGED WITH RIGHTS VIOLATIONS

NC231357 Paris AFP in English 1309 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Text] Copenhagen, 23 Jan (AFP) -- Denmark has notified the Turkish Government that it may be summoned to answer charges of human rights violations before the Human Rights Commission in Strasbourg, France, it was reported here today. The warning was conveyed at an interview Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen had here yesterday with Turkish Embassy Counsellor Erdinc Ulumlu.

Mr Olesen summoned the diplomat to inform him that in line with Danish policy of actively working to see that human rights were respected internationally, Denmark and some of its European partners were together studying the possibility of taking Turkey's case to the commission. The Danish Foreign Ministry indicated today that Mr Olesen had expressed his government's growing anxiety over the state of human rights in Turkey. On Thursday, the Danish charge d'affaires was summoned by Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen for a stern lecture on Danish interference in Turkish internal affairs via the EEC, the OECD and NATO.

OPENING DEBATE IN FOLKETING SUBJUED, CAUTIOUS

[G.A. report]

[Excerpt] The Folketing opening debate was for the most part subdued, characterized by caution and without the drama which had been expected in advance. It was as if everyone was waiting for everyone else. All sides stretched out hands in cooperation, but the hands glided past each other. Not a single motion was introduced, but the desire to speak was great, especially among the "rank and file" Folketing members.

Least ambiguous was Conservative leader Poul Schlueter, when he addressed [prime minister] Anker Jorgensen: "There has never been a greater need for broad cooperation than in the new Folketing, and it is therefore illogical of the government to search for a majority from issue to issue. It won't work, Mr Prime Minister! You can cooperate with either the left or the right, but not with both. The government cannot get the Folketing to approve expenditure plans with the help of the left and then expect us to pick up the tab."

The majority of opposition party chairmen took the same line.

Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen replied that he was well able to see that such maneuvering would be impossible. "It will be an enormous problem, the biggest, I believe for the new government and the Folketing. On the other hand it is impossible too for us to create an integral program, given the present composition of the Folketing. We must work piecemeal to a certain extent."

The debate, which took as its starting point the prime minister's speech the previous day and the 1982 budget, which has been resubmitted to the Folketing for its approval, covered a number of topics, including youth unemployment (with which many speakers from the Left Socialists and the Socialist People's Party concerned themselves), the government's plan of action and the plans for financial reforms.

'A Colorless Performance'

[Editorial: "Composure"]

[Text] The political opposition has attempted to evaluate Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen's opening speech to the new Folketing, and the Liberals and Conservatives agreed more or less that the prime minister "did not say much." Yesterday the prime minister's opening speech was the subject of the Folketing's opening debate, and this in its turn provided us with an opportunity to evaluate the opposition. We would prefer to wait for a while -- to have a somewhat more solid foundation on which to assess the mood of the Folketing, but it can already be said that the opening debate was the most colorless performance seen in a long time.

No motions were introduced -- and for this the parties should be complimented. The Center Democrats obviously realized that their war cry that an attempt should be made to topple the government in the opening debate was a mistake, and there was no secondary attack on the government in the debate, and this was almost sensational. If the whole affair is to be seen as an expression of the Folketing's composure, then this is progress. If Thursday's debate is also to be seen as a new line, which attaches greater importance to results and realities than to words, then the esteem in which the Folketing is held will increase -- with the likelihood that greater attention will be paid to the little that is actually said there.

CPSU DELEGATION TO VISIT, HOLD TALKS WITH SDP

LD221428 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1400 GMT 22 Jan 82

[Text] Representatives of the Soviet Communist Party will arrive in Finland in the next few days to have talks with the leadership of the Social Democratic Party [SDP]. The deputy head of the CPSU international department Vitaliy Shaposhnikov and Central Committee official Stefan Smirnov will be arriving as the guests of the SDP. The Soviet guests will prepare the visit to the USSR by the SDP Chairman Kalevi Sorsa. The CPSU representatives will also have talks with the leadership of the Finnish Communist Party on the political situation.

USSR CHANGE OF ATTITUDE TO KOIVISTO PERCEIVED

[Ingmar Lindmarker report]

[Text] Two CPSU big guns are expected to arrive in Helsinki in the next few days, to express Moscow's support for the newly elected Mauno Koivisto, SVENSKA DAGBLADET has heard. They are CPSU [Central Committee] international section members Vitaliy Shaposhnikov and Stefan Smirnov, who according to reports in Helsinki Tuesday [19 January] are coming to press the Finnish Communist Party to give its support to Koivisto.

This visit immediately after Koivisto's triumph in the presidential election would be a clear indication of Moscow's support for Finland's first Social Democratic president. In the past there has been some uncertainty about the Soviet Union's view of Koivisto. According to the sources of the reports Finnish politicians in Moscow were able to note a change in the Soviet attitude to Koivisto as much as 2 weeks before the election.

The CPSU Central Committee was strikingly positive in its statements referring to the Social Democratic presidential candidate. One of the things pointed out was that PRAVDA had never written a bad word about Koivisto nor would it ever do so.

SWEDEN

PROMISE OF OIL REINFORCES BALTIC BORDER POLICY

PM221201 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 18 Jan 82 p 6

[Erik Liden report]

[Excerpt] Large oil finds on the seabed are one of the reasons why Sweden is continuing to assert that the median line in the Baltic should be drawn between Gotland and the Soviet mainland. According to preliminary estimates there are seabed oil deposits worth more than 1 billion kronor. The Soviet proposal with the median line drawn between the mainlands of the two countries would deprive Sweden of the interesting oilfields east and southeast of Gotland. At the same time supervision of fishing activities and some military exercises in the Baltic would be made more difficult.

Foreign Ministry legal department chief Hans Danelius told SVENSKA DAGBLADET: "We were stating back in 1969 that the median line should be drawn between Gotland and the Soviet mainland. We have no reason to change our position since then. It goes without saying that we are interested in the natural resources on the seabed. The next round of negotiations will be in Moscow, and as before we are unable to engage in any exploration of the oilfields. This would be contrary to diplomatic principles."

The general defense staff has given its view of the problems surrounding the median line in a secret memorandum presented to the Foreign Ministry and has therefore kept quiet about its contents. According to information received by SVENSKA DAGBLADET the armed forces commander in chief wholeheartedly supports the idea of the median line between Gotland the Soviet Union, but also stresses the need for increased surveillance resources for such a demarcation line between the two countries to be meaningful.

Oil deposits on Gotland are now producing oil worth more than 30 million kronor a year, and Oljeprospektering AB wants to continue its exploration of the seabed when the agreement with the Soviet Union has been signed. Until this happens no exploration can take place.

"For the time being the Foreign Ministry has banned any drilling at sea," Oljeprospektering AB Director K.O. Lindeberg told SVENSKA DAGBLADET. "From test drillings 17-18 km east of Ostergarn on Gotland we know that the geology of the area is promising and that it contains considerable sedimentary deposits."

IOANNIDHIS: PROSPECTS FOR TALKS 'NOT FAVORABLE'

NC240944 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 24 Jan 82 pp 1, 15

[Interview with Greek Cypriot interlocutor Ioannidhis by chief editor A. Konstandinidhis -- date not given]

[Text] Question: Do you believe that under the present conditions it is possible to make progress in the intercommunal talks?

Answer: Under the present conditions, the prospects for making progress in the intercommunal talks are not favorable. Both the international climate and the domestic situation in Cyprus unfavorably affect every effort for a solution through the procedure of the intercommunal talks.

Question: If in the end no progress is made at the talks and we come to a new deadlock, what do you think the Greek side's position should be?

Answer: In such a case our side must remain firmly attached to the goal for a Cyprus solution through peaceful procedures. There should be no vacilation from this position or goal.

Question: If the talks are interrupted, what course should we follow?

Answer: Since the dialogue is being held within the framework of the UN secretary general's good offices, in accordance with a General Assembly resolution, the Cyprus problem should again be taken before the United Nations with a request for a more effective procedure for solution of the problem in accordance with the two summit agreements and the UN resolutions. As to what the procedure would be, there must be as of now a study and evaluation of all possible alternative peaceful procedures, including that of mediation. Along with this, international support for this course should also be sought.

Question: Do you anticipate any developments within the framework of the intercommunal dialogue during 1982?

Answer: It is still early to express any view on the results of this new phase of the talks. It is also very early to make any forecast regarding developments within the framework of the intercommunal dialogue during 1982. Besides, current facts are not encouraging with regard to favorable developments.

Question: In your opinion, which are the most serious points of divergence in the positions of the Greek and the Turkish sides?

Answer: A) The philosphy and approach in connection with the way of establishment of federation as agreed upon in the summit agreements. Our own approach and philisophy is the conversion of the constitutional structure of the Cyprus Republic from a unitary state to a federal one with two regions that would preserve its independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity and its nonalignment. The Turkish side's approach and philosophy is much different and is based on the vents created by the July-August 1974 invasion. The Turks maintain that these events have created "new realities" which we must accept -- one of these realities being the establishment of a "Turkish Cyrpiot federated state." Moreover, they maintain that the free region constitutes the other leg of the federation and they disregard the fact that we are an independent and sovereign state, and they invite us to establish the federal state as equal partners and cofounders.

B) The Turkish side's philosophy in connection with the content of the federation, as envisaged by its position on the way by which the federal state should be shaped. Specifically, the Turkish side seeks to bring into the constitution certain principles -- for example numerical equality for participation in the three authorities of the state -- as well as special provision -- for example limitation on the exercise of the three freedoms, limitation on the country's international personality and so forth -- which are neither constituent elements nor characteristics of a federal constitution nor within the concept of federation.

C) As result of the above basic differences, there are serious points of divergence on many specific issues of the constitutional aspect of the Cyprus problem.

D) Major disagreement between the two sides in connection with the settlement of the territorial aspect of the Cyprus problem.

Beyond this, there is also disagreement over the question of the resettlement of the Greek Cypriot inhabitants of Varosha, both with regard to the area and the administration status of the city. Particularly on this question it has been noted that the Turkish side is unwilling to come to an agreement.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE ON PASOK-EDEK TALKS RELEASED

NC232255 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Text] A joint communique issued on the talks held in Athens between delegations of PASOK and the socialist party EDEK says that an identity of views was established on all basic problems. Concerning the Cyprus issue, the communique says PASOK and EDEK insist on the view that any solution of the problem must be based on the unity, sovereignty, territorial integrity, and nonalignment of the Cyprus Republic; Cyprus must also be free of foreign troops and bases and the fundamental rights of all citizens safeguarded. It also stresses that the intercommunal talks must be substantive and in accordance with the UN resolutions.

GDR DELEGATION CONFERS WITH ROLANDHIS, KITTIS

NC221856 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 22 Jan 82

[Text] The GDR parliamentary delegation headed by Dr Karl-Heinz Schulmeister, member of the Presidium of the People's Chamber, met today with Foreign Minister Rolandhis. At the meeting, Mr Rolandhis briefed the delegation on the present stage of the Cyprus problem and exchanged views on Cyprus-GDR relations. Later, the delegation visited Commerce and Industry Minister Kittis. During the meeting, they reviewed bilateral trade relations and pointed out sectors in which there are possibilities for expanding trade further between the two countries, particularly concerning the prospects of increasing the export of Cyprus agricultural products to the GDR.

Delegation Leaves 23 Jan

[Text] The GDR parliamentary delegation left Cyprus today following a 5-day visit at the invitation of the House of Representatives. In a statement, delegation head Dr Karl-Heinz Schulmeister extolled the Cypriot people's just struggle for political independence and stressed that the GDR has always been on the side of the Republic of Cyprus. He also said President Kiprianou's visit to Berlin and his meeting with State Council Chairman Honecker have undoubtedly contributed to the tightening of ties between the two countries. He added: I think our visit has contributed to the improvement of cooperation between our countries. We had, he said, many meetings with members of the House of Representatives and we are convinced of the peaceful policy of the Republic of Cyprus. He concluded; We have been deeply impressed by your nonaligned policy, and we greatly appreciate the important work being carried out by President Kiprianou and the house members.

The GDR delegation was seen off at Larnaca Airport on behalf of the House of Representatives by Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Galanos, who expressed the belief that the delegation's visit was particularly useful and constructive and has helped toward the further tightening of the close ties between the two countries. He also voiced the Cypriot people's gratitude for the firm GDR support and in general for the German people's support for Cyprus' struggle. Mr Galanos concluded: We are looking forward to the visit a Cyprus house delegation will pay to the GDR this year.

PAPER REVIEWS PROBLEMS IN U.S. BASES NEGOTIATIONS

NC201400 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 1 Jan 82 pp 5, 10

[Text] The government believes 1982 will be a year of tough diplomatic activity in completing outstanding foreign policy issues. The fact that the effort will start from scratch does not mean that in the previous year, that is, during the New Democracy government, diplomatic battles were not tough and continuous, especially in the three basic foreign problems of the U.S. bases, the NATO problem and Greek-Turkish relations. On the contrary, both the strength and determination of the former government are expressed in the result of the Greek-U.S. talks, which were suspended in the summer of 1981 (not merely because the preelection period would begin), the development of negotiations with NATO on the limits of operational control in the Aegean (which were also suspended) and in the temporary break in the dialogue with Turkey because it was not possible for our country to accept our neighbor's demand that we renounce sovereign rights.

The first stage of negotiations with the United States started last January, with the optimistic prediction that the agreement on the operation of the U.S. bases in our country would definitely be signed after Easter. Perhaps the course and fluctuations of these negotiations will be useful to the current government's tactics. The optimism originally expressed quickly gave way to skepticism and doubt that an agreement would be signed, especially after it became known that three basic reasons were delaying the settlement of the bases issue.

The first reason is the Greek counterplan to the agreement, which the New Democracy government submitted early in 1981 to the U.S. side in reply to the U.S. plan submitted in the autumn of 1980 as the basis for the start of the negotiations. Indeed, this Greek counterplan contained such substantial changes made after the U.S. plan was deemed unacceptable -- that, taking into consideration their original proposals, the United States could not but ask for long negotiations in order to find the ideal solution.

The second reason, which contributed significantly to the delay in the negotiations, was a disagreement between the outgoing Carter administration and the new Reagan administration. Whereas the Carter administration wanted to finalize the bases issue, the Reagan administration demanded that it be the one to sign the Greek-U.S. defense agreement because it believed that in prolonged negotiations the U.S. side would achieve better conditions for the operation of its bases. The Reagan administration based this view on the fact that the former Greek Government insisted that Greece's outstanding NATO issues on air and sea space not be handled separately from the U.S. bases issue.

The third reason was the very content of the letters that were to be exchanged, and to which the United States refused to agree. These letters virtually constituted Greek documents since they were to safeguard Greek interests by securing A) our country's economic-military strength, B) Greece's yearly requirements for military equipment and C) the Greek side's demands in return for the operation of the bases.

Nine Causes and Reasons the Agreement Was Not Signed

During the course of the negotiations -- in addition to the above three reasons which were the cause for the prolongation of the talks -- a number of other reasons emerged which made it impossible for both the Greek and U.S. sides to sign the agreement. These reasons are analyzed below:

First, through its political-military team participating in the negotiations, the United States precluded the satisfaction of four basic demands made by our country. The first U.S. reply to the Greek counterplan:

1. Rejected any U.S. commitment to maintain the 7-10 ratio in aid to be given by the United States to Greece and Turkey. Formally they did not refuse anything. However, although they accepted that aid to our country continue "according to U.S. law and constitutional provisions within the framework of the requirements of the area's states" they claimed that the economic condition of the country to which the aid would be given would be taken into consideration. This meant that the balance could easily be upset every time by citing Turkey's economic crisis.

2. Rejected the Greek demand that the government be able to suspend the operation of the bases in special circumstances connected with critical internal events.

3. The United States rejected the validity of the Kissinger-Bitsios aide memoire through which the U.S. side would commit itself to oppose /(shall oppose)/ [in English] any resort to violence in upsetting the balance in the area.

4. Rejected the size of the lump-sum aid demanded by the Greek side.

5. Rejected revealing to the Greek Government the secret agreements signed between the United States and Turkey. This Greek demand was fair because knowledge of these agreements was necessary so that the Greek side could propose conditions that would guarantee equal treatment of Greece and Turkey.

6. Rejected the Greek demand that everything that had been envisaged in the agreement, which had been initialed in 1977 and which fully protected Greek interests, should be taken as the basis for negotiation.

7. Rejected Greek proposals for a one-time-only exchange which consisted of 1) supplying equipment to our country for /electronic surveillance/ [in English] and 2) supplying two aircraft for Hawkeye type electronic surveillance.

At the same time the United States insisted on:

8. The possibility for expanded "military and support activities" for the U.S. bases, beyond the purposes provided, for their operation within the NATO framework.

9. Having two commanders (a U.S. and a Greek officer), but where the Greek officer would not have any access to certain designated areas /(classified areas)/ [in English].

It should be noted that all these Greek positions, except the one that concerns the two commanders, are also put forth by the PASOK government as Greek demands, which confirms the correctness of the tactics and maneuvers of the former New Democracy government.

"Postelection Possibilities" Affect the U.S. Position

The negative trend in the negotiations during the first months of 1981, as a result of the U.S. refusal to satisfy Greek demands in conjunction with the upcoming termination of the 1977 parliament fostered a new U.S. "philosophy" for dealing with the bases issue. This philosophy began to take into consideration all "postelection probabilities." Thus the United States procrastinated in ending the suspension of the issue. In fact there were strong rumors in diplomatic circles that Washington favored signing an agreement before the 1981 elections but having it ratified by the new parliament.

This stance indicates that, provided Washington persists in its positions, it will follow the same "negotiating tug of war" with any Greek government.

Consequently, taking into consideration earlier statements by Papandreou on the retention of the U.S. bases in our country, the U.S. side would even risk talks with a different government. (Events proved the U.S. assessments true.)

At the same time the U.S. side was not in a hurry to conclude an agreement since prolonging the status quo of the bases proved advantageous for the following three reasons:

-- The status quo of the 1953 agreements was being retained because it provided (and continues to provide) exceptional facilities to the United States and to the personnel serving at the bases in Greece.

-- It was guaranteed that the bases could carry out "activities" that were of a nature that the new Greek Government wanted to review in a new agreement.

-- The United States would not carry an inordinate economic burden. On the contrary, through the new agreement the United States would be obliged to give a sum of aid to be agreed on.

Undoubtedly May was a critical month for Greek-U.S. negotiations because the meeting in Rome between Greece's Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and U.S. Secretary of State Haig was expected to be decisive in view of the two sides' significant differences of opinion on basic points of the agreement under negotiation. If these differences of opinion remained after the meeting, the issue would remain suspended until after the elections. The hasty return to Athens from Rome by the foreign minister in order to participate in a special conference with Prime Minister Rallis constituted a reason for the suspension of the negotiations (which took place a month later after Mitsotakis and Haig met in the Italian capital).

Finally, on 8 June 1981 negotiations between Greece and the United States were suspended when the United States put forth four new conditions. The unacceptability of the four conditions was a clear indication that Washington now desired to hold negotiations after the election with the new government. On 16 June, the then U.S. ambassador in Athens, R. McCloskey, conveyed four new conditions to the Greek Government in connection with:

A) The U.S. demand that the principal article of the agreement -- on maintaining the balance of forces in the Aegean -- be deleted from the letter, as mention of this would doubly commit the U.S. side, obliging it to fulfill its commitment. The Greek side's protection was based on this double reference to the U.S. commitment dovetailing the two written texts.

B) The U.S. demand to delete from the agreement Greece's right to suspend certain -- only -- activities of the U.S. bases whenever the Greek side considered this necessary for reasons of more general national interests, and specifically whenever the possibility arose that these activities could exceed the things agreed on by the alliance.

C) The U.S. demand for deletion of the alliance's condition that aid to be given to our country be based on what is valid for "other NATO allies."

D) The U.S. demand that a rephrasing be made in the chapter on commanders, a revision which would limit the Greek commander's jurisdiction to only the Greek part of the bases. However, this would have resulted in a revision, making substantial changes from the conceptual and interpretation aspects.

After this last disagreement, which reinforced Greek reasons for suspending the talks, the government's decision to defer solving the issue until after the elections was final since time was running out and this was contributing to bringing about a deadlock. The government attributed the suspension of the negotiations to the time factor in a very careful announcement it issued, which among other things mentioned that "the deadline set because of the expiration of the term of the Parliament that would ratify the agreement, did not allow for the completion and conclusion of the negotiations, although both sides had manifested good will and good faith and had achieved a significant approximation of positions."

Greek-Turkish Relations

The alternating movement between progress and stagnation in Greek-Turkish relations, and especially the dialogue between the two countries in 1981, perhaps gives a measure of the developments to take place in 1982 in this suspended issue. The basic reason for the temporary suspension of the dialogue, and for its remaining so, was Turkish intransigence (recent samples of which we had in the statement by Turkish Prime Minister Ulusu). On the contrary, from the outset the former Greek Government tried in fact to show its good will with practical measures. The following are within this framework:

A) The restriction of the limits of the Limnos terminal area.

B) The abolition of air corridor W14 starting from the north and heading south.

C) The abolition of the firing range at Andhros. Prime Minister Rallis, in reply to a statement by the leader of the official opposition, had made it clear that the Greek side had not made any concessions with its gestures. In justifying his government's initiatives Rallis said that:

-- The restriction of the Limnos terminal area to 1,382 miles facilitates Greek and international flights and is more than enough for the comfortable operation of the airport as a civilian and military airport. Furthermore, it more than covers Greece's needs and creates no problem for the country's defense.

-- The minimum levels of six air corridors were raised. In addition the altitude of part of another air corridor was changed and it was decided to make seasonal use of this part as dictated by air navigation needs. Greek civil aviation is not hurt but facilitated by this arrangement because, as is natural, it is Greek military aircraft more than any other that use parts of the airspace over the Aegean which are not covered by air corridors.

-- No firing range has been abolished. During Greek-Turkish technical talks the two sides considered the possibility of abolishing only some dangerous areas (three Greek and three Turkish). The abolition of these areas, which would not have any unfavorable effect on the defense capabilities and training needs of the Greek armed forces, could have been arranged reciprocally and under certain prerequisites which, however, did not coincide. Therefore the exercise areas in the Aegean absolutely have not undergone any change.

Despite these "good will" gestures by the Greek Government, particularly in the "commercial sector" of the airspace (which certainly facilitates Turkish military exercises), Ankara showed symptoms from the very beginning of intransigence and of attempts to torpedo the dialogue through provocative statements and provocative actions.

One of the most irritating Turkish actions (the repetition of which aims at creating faits accomplis in Aegean airspace) was the flagrant violation of the 10-mile national airspace in the Aegean on 8 April as well as the entry into the Athens Flight Information Region [FIR] without keeping to the rules of the International Civil Aviation Organization [ICAO] (that is, the submission of flight plans) by many formations of Turkish military aircraft. The Turks indirectly have admitted these violations, stressing that "a few entries of short duration into the Athens FIR did take place."

On the contrary, the Greek side particularly stressed the fact that the entries into the Athens FIR by formations of Turkish military aircraft constituted intentional violations of international regulations which dictate the issuing of NOTAM's and submission to the Greek authorities of flight plans -- a procedure which is compulsory for safety in air navigation. Moreover, it should be noted that in certain cases the violation of national airspace was less than 6 miles!

During April -- which proved to be very hot -- the Turkish side found the opportunity for another attempt to undermine the dialogue and the meeting to be held in May between Mitsotakis and Turkmen in Rome, using the demonstrations in Athens by Greek Armenians as a pretext. This exaggeration aimed at countering and covering up the Turkish provocations in Greek airspace by Turkish military aircraft. These Turkish tactics were revealed by the government when it pointed out that:

A) The Greek Government proved its adherence to the Greek-Turkish dialogue when, despite numerous violations of Greek airspace by Turkish military aircraft, it refrained from posing obstacles in the way of this dialogue.

B) The Turkish side makes the Greek Government ponder over the unjustified clamor Ankara has created about the Armenian demonstrations in Greece, which were of normal dimensions and were no larger than similar demonstrations in other countries.

In another wave of intransigence undermining the Greek-Turkish dialogue, Ankara threatened that it would demand the intervention... of the big guarantor powers of the London treaty of 1914 on the demilitarization of the islands! The Greek Government recalled that:

-- Article 12 of the Lausanne treaty confirmed the decision of the powers in 1914, but only insofar as that decision concerned Greece's sovereignty over Limnos, Samothraki, Lesvos, Khios, Samos and Ikaria.

-- The question of demilitarization of the islands was raised only in Article 13 of the treaty and about Limnos and Samothraki in the Lausanne convention on the status of the straits.

-- The Lausanne treaty established a status of partial demilitarization only of certain islands, which were explicitly named in Article 13 of the treaty and did not include Limnos and Samothraki. The case of the latter islands was regulated through the Lausanne convention of 1923, which was an international act, separate from the peace treaty, and concerned the status of the straits. The Lausanne convention provided for the demilitarization of the straits, Limnos and Samothraki as well as of Imroz, Bozcaada and Lagousai islands, which belong to Turkey.

The Lausanne convention on the status of the straits was replaced in 1936 by the Montreux convention, entirely abolishing the status that had been established by the Lausanne convention. Since then Turkey considers the straits and adjacent Turkish islands free from any obligation for demilitarization. However, the same applies to the Greek islands of Limnos and Samothraki which, after their status under the Lausanne convention was abolished, are equally free from any obligation for demilitarization.

An attempt officially to refute the threat of intervention by the big powers in the question of demilitarization of the Greek islands could not possibly "dispel" the true intentions of Ankara's military regime, which resorted to new "demands" and new provocations. Actually a few days after its unsuccessful attempt to create an "islands issue," Ankara climaxed its provocativeness through:

-- Continually announcing maneuvers by its air force in Greek airspace,
-- The demand that Armenian demonstrations not be staged again in Greece.
-- Its intervention within NATO and the "torpedoing" of a Greek demand.

Specifically Ankara used its veto and there was rejection of the Greek demand that the Greek Navy carry out submarine exercises in certain sea areas of the alliance in the Aegean. Moreover it should be noted that the sectors proposed by the Greek side for maneuvers had never been used in the past by the Turks. However, in addition to this war of nerves, Ankara also tried unsuccessfully to set a trap for the Greek Government.

Within the framework of the dialogue, Turkey attempted to lead our country into a "written semantic trap" by which Greece would admit that its airspace might not be 10 but 6 miles. How did the Turks contrive that?

One of their basic proposals in airspace matters was -- and still is -- that Greece should not have the right to ask for amendment or modification of the NOTAM's which Turkey would issue for its military maneuvers within the international airspace that falls in the Athens FIR. Naturally our country refused and another proposal was put forward as a Turkish concession: The agreement -- which probably will be concluded about the airspace -- should say that the settlement to be agreed on would not concern airspace limits or the submission of plans for military aircraft flights (a steadfast Turkish demand). Acceptance of this Turkish proposal by the Greek side would also mean written acceptance that there is actually a question of airspace to be negotiated along with the issue of not submitting plans for military air flights.

An end to these Turkish demands to shrink Greek airspace was finally given in a decision made by the Rallis government, a decision which also led to the temporary suspension of the Greek-Turkish dialogue.

As the former government was convinced that Ankara was not showing as much good will as the Greek side, the government decided that our country should not even agree to discuss the limits of the national airspace. At the same time, however, in a last attempt by the Greek side (which was not finally accepted by Ankara) to preserve the dialogue, it proposed to Ankara to undertake the initiative of finding a formula (with the inviolable term that the latitude of our national airspace is not for discussion) which would facilitate the Turkish maneuvers in international airspace without infringing on Greek limits. This entails an obligation on the part of Turkey that not only must Turkish aircraft not come closer than 10 miles but also that the coordinates of the Turkish announcements in the case of such maneuvers should be away from the point where Greek airspace ends. Acceptance of this Greek proposal, which would put an end to any indirect claim by Ankara on our national airspace, could possibly make the Greek side adopt a more conciliatory stand on certain pending issues of a technical nature which do not directly infringe on Greek interests.

Turkish Prime Minister Ulusu's recent statements confirm the forecast that even in the future Ankara will not abandon its tactics at the negotiations with the new Greek Government. The only change in the atmosphere, at least from what Mr Averof implied, is that the present government will enjoy stronger support from the official opposition than what the New Democracy government had from its opposition.

Our country's return to the military wing of the alliance did not automatically solve the issue of cooperation with NATO. The defining of air responsibility limits remains pending. Actually it concerns three different limits: timely warning, tactical attack actions and air defense. The problem has mainly arisen because of Turkish interventions within the air defense limits which, as far as the Greek side is concerned -- both for reasons of tradition and operational expediency and on the basis of decisions by the alliance's military committee -- coincide with the Athens FIR limits. Particularly the need to establish a new NATO air command in Larisa (under a Greek Commander), corresponding to the one in Izmir, naturally would result in charting limits of jurisdiction for that command in the Aegean.

The first talks between the Greek and NATO sides established the wide difference of views and somehow were an indication that this pending issue would not be resolved soon.

The Greek side insists that the Larisa commander's responsibility be the same as those in force before Greece's withdrawal from NATO's military wing, namely to coincide with the Athens FIR and moreover be exactly defined in degrees.

However, the NATO side first proposed that new Aegean airspace limits be defined -- with its novel proposal of movable limits -- or that the Larisa headquarters be established first and then the airspace limits as well as the responsibilities of the Greek commander of Larisa be defined.

Greece Rejects

The Greek side naturally rejected both proposals, because in the first case it was not possible to accept restricted limits -- different from those in the past -- whereby our country would have the responsibility for the administration and control of the Aegean airspace. In the second case it was not possible to have a commander without responsibilities. On one hand this would deprive him of the necessary authority in the ensuing talks and on the other hand it would constitute Greek admission of the Turkish-inspired view that there are no limits to the Aegean airspace.

And Other Pressures

In its efforts to exert pressure on Greece on the limits of the Larisa headquarters and its establishment before defining its commander's responsibilities, NATO put forth various arguments, as follows:

-- First, General Rogers maintained that the formula we had accepted for Greece's reintegration into the NATO military wing (the Rogers plan) entailed acceptance of operational control limits. Consequently, the Greek side had no legal right to renege.

-- Second, the Atlantic alliance, and mainly the U.S. factor, refused to make overdue payments toward financing of NATO infrastructure projects in our country that are worth 12 billion drachmas. These were not paid at all when our country was outside NATO's military wing. The new argument presented by NATO was that one point in the Haig-Davos agreement stated that these sums would be given to Greece after the Larisa headquarters was built.

Newer NATO proposals -- considered as having sprung from Turkish Generals Saltik and Evren -- included:

-- Not to have any limits in the Aegean.
-- Not to consider as valid the military committee's provisions that were in force before 1974 and to consider the talks and what had been agreed upon previously as not having taken place after Greece's reentry into NATO. Thus the U.S. NATO commander in Naples would be responsible for coordination of Aegean operations.

These proposals were rejected because they constituted the following unacceptable arrangements:

The Greek forces would be responsible only for Aegean air defense within the national area and would not include the larger area of the Athens FIR, in which, of course, there are Greek islands.

It is pointed out that this arrangement would have set the Greek-NATO differences back 2 years as it would be bringing the proposal in Haig's second plan for Greece's reentry into the Atlantic alliance's military wing again into the limelight. This proposal was rejected immediately by the Karamanlis government. It recommended that one of the two principles be enforced: either no limits at all, or new limits which would have no relation to the pre-1974 status and would serve the Turkish demands.

The interruption of the talks with NATO, with the intent of being continued by the new government to emerge from the October 1981 elections, was faced with the uncertainty of being governed by the following Greek positions as expressed by Mr Rallis in answer to the leader of the official opposition party:

A key figure in this plan, according to the story, is the U.S. ambassador to Ankara, said to be a close personal friend of President Reagan. The ambassador, the article said, was appointed to Ankara with the express purpose of acting as liaison between the Turkish and American Governments when the time of military action comes.

According to the magazine story, the Greek Central Intelligence Service and the Ministry of National Defense are in possession of a secret Israeli intelligence report which argues the "reasonableness" of a Turkish military move against an Aegean island, probably Limnos or Kastellorizon. The story also mentioned the recent case of "sabotage" on board the Greek ferry "Arion," as part of the same plan of provocation against Greece. It described the incident as a "charade."

SPOKESMAN DENIES REPORT ON TURKISH SUBMARINE

NC241943 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1900 GMT 24 Jan 82

[Text] Referring to a report in one of today's papers that a Turkish submarine was seen in the area of the Cyclades Islands, a government spokesman has stated: This report is absolutely inaccurate. So far there has never been a violation of our sovereign rights in this area. The government spokesman added: Such reports do not serve our national interests.

KIPRIANOU-PAPANDREOU MEETINGS BEGIN 25 JAN

NC251107 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1000 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Cyprus President Kiprianou, who is visiting Athens, visited President Karamanlis at 1100 today. Later Kiprianou conferred with Prime Minister Papandreou at the political office. He is now in a private meeting with the prime minister. A meeting will follow which will be attended by Cyprus Foreign Minister Rolandhis, the representative of the Greek Cypriot side at the intercommunal talks, Ioannidhis, Greek Deputy Foreign Minister Papoulias, Cyprus ambassador to Athens Khatzimiltis, Greek ambassador to Nicosia Zakharakis and other officials.

BRIEFS

AMBASSADORS PRESENT CREDENTIALS -- President Karamanlis today received separately the credentials of the new Japanese ambassador in Athens, Nagao Yoshida, and French Ambassador Dominique Charpy. Present at both ceremonies were Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos and Ambassador Moliviatis, secretary general of the office of the president. OFFICIAL NOTES EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT RESOLUTION

TA231450 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1440 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Text] Ankara, 23 Jan (AA) -- Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman said Saturday the resolution on Turkey adopted by the European Parliament Friday was the "direct consequence of lobbying." The resolution was adopted by 56 votes against 53 in the 434 member parliament, he noted, like a similar resolution adopted in the same manner back in April 1981. The EEC assembly's rules allowed it to pass resolutions in this manner, the Foreign Ministry spokesman added, but we did not consider it necessary to comment on the content of this particular resolution.

Parliament Delegation Arrives

[Text] Ankara, 24 Jan (AA) -- A three-man delegation from the European Parliament, headed by rapporteur of the Political Committee Uwe von Hassel, arrived in Ankara this afternoon. Former Federal German Defence Minister von Hassel, accompanied by Secretary of the Political Committee Pascal Fontaine and Christian Democrat Gerd Lemmer also of Federal Germany is to follow a full schedule of appointments with Turkish leaders and officials, from head of state Gen Kenan Evren, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, to members of the Consultative Assembly committee and Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry Kamuran Gurun.

Von Hassel said at Esenboga Airport he deplored Friday's minority resolution rushed through the European Parliament by the communist and socialist groups, but added the resolution had no significance, as what mattered concerning future Turkey-EEC relations would come after reports to the Political Committee, next month. The committee would in turn submit a proposal to the parliament some time between April and June. Von Hassel declined to predict the final outcome of the voting on Turkey in the European Parliament, but believed the majority supported Turkey and believed in the Turkish leaders' sincere determination to return to democracy. The conservative and Christian Democrat groups in the parliament overwhelmingly, and a majority of the liberals supported Turkey, he added. [sentence as received]

Delegation Begins Contacts

TA251033 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] A delegation from the European Parliament, headed by the Political Committee's rapporteur on Turkey, Uwe von Hassel, began his contacts in Ankara today. The delegation called on Foreign Ministry Secretary General Ambassador Kamuran Gurun this morning. Later they were received by Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and then by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu. The delegation members then conferred with Consultative Assembly constitutional committee chairman Orhan Aldikacti. They will complete their contacts tomorrow and leave Ankara on Wednesday.

TURKMEN INTERVIEWED ON NATO, EC TIES, SECURITY

NC230752 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 19 Jan 82 pp 1, 7

[Interview with Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen in Ankara by Danish television correspondent -- date not given]

[Text] Question: You have just returned from Brussels. You have had contacts with the European states. What are your past and present thoughts and impressions about Turkey's position?

Answer: I believe you are referring to relations between the Council of Europe and Turkey, for if you are referring to NATO, we have no disputes whatsoever with NATO. You know the United States has quite a different approach to Turkey's internal affairs than the European countries have.

The areas for which the Larisa air force headquarters, when built, would have responsibility must coincide with the pre-1974 areas of the Greek Air Force. The Rogers plan explicitly recognizes that Greece's reintegration into NATO's military wing should be based on the documents of the military committee and that all these documents are valid and determine the responsible areas of the Larisa headquarters. Nowhere in the reintegration agreement is it stated -- nor does it emerge anywhere else -- that the commanders of the headquarters in Larisa and Izmir must request a redesignation of area responsibility as long as they are confined to the NATO documents that also constitute the basis for Greece's reintegration.

SPOKESMAN: NO U.S. INVITATION TO PAPANDREOU

NC230803 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 22 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Answering questions this evening in connection with press reports that Prime Minister Papandreou will visit the United States, the government spokesman said: There is no official invitation to Prime Minister Papandreou to visit the United States. He said: Indeed there is a desire on the U.S. part for a visit to the United States by the Greek prime minister. Such a visit should not be ruled out if an invitation is extended.

PAPANDREOU ADDRESSES ECONOMY, SECURITY ISSUES

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Papandreou returned to Athens from Iraklion at 1245 after opening the congress of the Greek Central Municipalities Union. Speaking at Ellinikon Airport, Papandreou referred, among other things, to the economic situation, stressing that the budget will be presented next month and that, as a result of the 250-billion [as heard] deficit in the public sector, the situation presents difficulties. All classes, the prime minister emphasized, particularly the working class, must, if they want to improve their position, contribute toward increased productivity. After June the economic prospects for speedy development will be much more positive, he added. Papandreou also stated that if by spring private initiative, which will be assisted as much as possible by the government, does not undertake the investment initiatives which are required, then the state will take over such initiatives.

On national issues Papandreou emphasized that the first goal is to protect the country's territorial integrity and national independence. NATO, the prime minister said, sooner or later will have to decide whether it does or does not protect our frontiers. The EEC partners at the same time are attempting to deal with Greek economic problems as they were clearly presented to the community by the government. Papandreou also emphasized that there were no violations of Greek territory, as reported, and that in any eventuality the government will not tolerate any violations. The prime minister also stressed that there is no basis for the cultivation of a climate of immediate confrontation which certain sides are promoting. Naturally, he said, if there is any real threat there will also be a real answer.

On Cyprus, Turkey

[Excerpt] With regard to the EEC, Prime Minister Papandreou said: Our partners are now making an attempt, instead of having Greece withdraw and then conclude a special agreement, to formulate within the farmework of the new instructions a special status which would face the weaknesses of the Greek economy -- exactly those weaknesses which, for PASOK, were the reason for withdrawing and concluding a special agreement. I would like to give you the assurance that the Greek voice is being heard. The policy of Greece is no longer taken for granted.

Whenever our partners want to persuade Greece on a specific policy, they must really convince us; they should convince us that all this is in the interest not only of the alliance but also of Greece. I am confident that this same climate will also help improve the status of the Cyprus issue. We have undertaken a responsible mission to make it clear to all people, and particularly the governments of our partners NATO and the EEC, that the Cyprus problem is not a problem of relations between two communities -- a majority and a minority -- but a problem of an open occupation, that the dialogue is not one between Kiprianou and Evren.

The prime minister went on: In brief, I would like to refer to press reports about violations of our national waters, either by Turkish submarines, as I have read about today, or Turkish gunboats, as I have been reading about for many days. I am really sorry -- and I say this for the press in general -- that the feeling is created that violations of our national space or waters have taken place without any substantive reply by the Greek Government. I tell you that things are not like that. Many times it is difficult for the government to give details and explanations. However, at no time have we tolerated any violation of our space. It is a mistake to create the impression that because a Turkish ship, sailing in international waters in the Aegean , also enters our territorial waters, with our knowledge and permission, constitutes a violation of our national waters and therefore dictates a dynamic answer. We are absolutely determined to protect our national space by every means, and this is very well known both by Turkey and our allies. There is no doubt that, after the major discussion -- that important discussion -- in Brussels at the NATO defense ministers conference, Turkey has truly and properly sustained a blow, because for the first time -- and I stress for the first time -- at an official conference the problem of our national borders and sovereign rights against Turkish threats was raised. Turkey's answer there was that they do not have any such intention, that they have a particular love for the Greek people and that they desire a return to the climate of Venizelos and Ataturk.

But later, which is very common in their diplomacy, after enough time has elapsed the Turks are now embarking on an enlightenment campaign to convince the Europeans that Asia Minor is threatened by Greece -- an attempt which naturally can only lead to [words indistinct]. Where is Greece actually threatening? Is it that we plan to occupy part of Asia Minor? This is a joke, and it cannot be believed by even those who are unreliable within the Western alliance.

I say all this, Mr Papandreou went on, because a climate is being created of immediate danger of imminent confrontation. You are mistaken; there isn't any. These are diplomatic maneuvers. We are completely calm, and when there is a real threat there will also be a real answer. I would like to praise our country's armed forces highly. They really are in a position to safeguard our territorial integrity. The state and people must always give them all the means necessary to accomplish their high and significant mission.

U.S. OKAYS TURKISH AEGEAN INVASION PLANS

NC221515 Athens NEWS in English 22 Jan 82 p 1

[Text] Ankara has received from Washington the "green light" for military action against Greece, aimed at seizing, at the right moment, one of Greece's Aegean islands, the bi-monthly magazine THEMATA TOU DEKAPENTHIMEROU reports in its latest issue, which comes out today. The magazine, quoting a "well-informed Greek-American intelligence source," said that the recent escalation of tensions in Greek-Turkish relations, caused by Turkey's actions, is part of a U.S. intelligence plan formulated five months before the 18 October election which brought the left-wing Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK) to power in Greece.

Being certain of a PASOK victory, the magazine said, U.S. intelligence circles devised a plan to destabilize the government of Andreas Papandreou, which is expected to follow a tougher line than its predecessors vis-a-vis NATO and the United States.

The members of the Council of Europe were greatly impressed by our head of state's new year message in which he announced that parliamentary elections are to be held in the spring of 1983. They are now convinced that we are going to return to democracy, although some Council of Europe countries are abstaining in their attitude while others, have a negative attitude. One of these countries is Denmark.

Question: There are attempts by some quarters to expel Turkey from the Council of Europe. What are your views?

Answer: I do not believe there is such a problem. As you know, our participation in the European Parliament has been shelved because we have no parliament now. This makes it impossible for us to send delegates to the assembly. The question under discussion at the moment is the kind of recommendation the European Parliament is to make. However, I do not know what this recommendation will be. This will be determined at the meeting to be held toward the end of January. You know that the political and legal commissions have already visited Turkey and conferred with our head of state, our prime minister, university professors, and with me and with some private personalities as well as with press representatives in Istanbul. They are going to prepare a report on their contacts. I do not know the gist of the report, but the committee is divided within itself. Some of them left Turkey with very good impressions. Now no one can doubt our desire to return to pluralist democracy.

Question: You had asked for $600 million in aid from the EEC. This aid has now been suspended. What do you think about this?

Answer: Some countries oppose cooperation between Turkey and the EEC. However, that is not the way we look at it. All countries freely can establish relations with one another. We are not going to impose ourselves on those European countries that do not wish to cooperate with us. We have stated that we appreciate aid. But we have also stressed that we do not want aid with political strings attached. Extending aid to Turkey is left to the initiative of other countries.

It would be a mistake if some of the Council of Europe members vote us out of the council. We do not believe these countries, which are our partners as well as our allies, will make such a decision. Such a decision cannot be very constructive.

Question: Turkey is very important to the West and the NATO allies. How important is NATO to Turkey?

Answer: As important to Turkey as it is to the Western members. NATO is an organization that provides security for its members. It has a mission of deterrence. Moreover, it maintains a balance between East and West. NATO should be an organization where its member countries should support one another and cooperate with one another in a spirit of understanding. But we are terribly sorry to observe that where Turkey is concerned this function is forgotten.

Question: When the concept of security comes up, social security and social progress is as important as military security. What is your attitude toward these concepts?

Answer: I do not dispute this concept. Naturally if there is no social unity and social peace in a country and if that country is divided, it means the basic concept of security does not exist. This should not make us forget our need for physical and collective security in the area.

DETAILS GIVEN ON SYNAGOGUE TRIAL VERDICTS

AU221454 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 22 Jan 82 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] Surprising was the sentence in the trial of the two Arab terrorists Marwan Hasan, 25, and Muhammad Hasan Rajih, 21, which ended yesterday. Whereas both received life sentences for the attack on the synagogue in Vienna on 29 August 1981 in the course of which 2 persons died and some 30 were wounded, Rajih was acquitted of a murder charge in the case of Vienna City Councilman Heinz Nittel who was murdered on May Day last year. He was only found guilty of abetting a murder because he had obtained a NATO jacket for the killer. Hasan's defense counsel, Dr Weber announced that he would appeal and enter a suit of nullity; and Rajih's defense counsel, Dr Lux, appealed against the verdict claiming that the sentence was too severe. State prosecutor Dr Schindler made no statement.

COMMUNIST PARTY PAPER HITS PEOPLE'S PARTY LINE

[Excerpts] Washington -- The proposal of U.S. Congressman Toby Moffett to help Austria in coping with the problem of Polish emigres, in the amount of $5 million (some 80 million schillings), was rejected by the U.S. State Department. The cynical explanation was: The number of Polish applicants for asylum in Austria "is not big enough." (!) Moffett had visited refugee camps in Austria in January.

The Austrian People's Party has traced the U.S. decision to the "anti-U.S. attitude" of the Kreisky government. It could not think of anything more clever. People's Party deputy Ettmayer: "The refusal of U.S. assistance must be understood as an indication that a stimulus threshold has been crossed with the U.S. administration..." and further: "One cannot constantly (?) and in an insulting manner attack a country such as the United States and then expect that country to render assistance at a decisive moment...." Whereupon the line of the Austrian People's Party foreign policy seems to be quite clear: Keep your mouth shut and stretch out your hand, Your most obedient servant, Mr Reagan....

TWO SOVIET ENVOYS DECLARED 'PERSONAE NON GRATAE'

LD222014 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 22 Jan 82

[Text] The Portuguese news agency ANOP reported a few minutes ago that the government decided to declare "personae non gratae" two Soviet diplomats accredited to Lisbon. Approached by this radio station, the Foreign Ministry said that the Soviet ambassador was summoned today to the ministry to be informed of the government's decision. According to the Foreign Ministry, the two Soviet diplomats, whose identity we have not yet managed to establish, were engaged in activities which exceeded their diplomatic status. The diplomats have been given 5 days to leave Portugese territory.

BISHOPS REACT TO KREISKY CRITICISM OF CHURCH

AU251233 [Editorial Report] Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German on 24 January carries on page 2 a 330-word report on statements made by Bishop Kraetzl, vicar-general of the Vienna Archdiocese, in an interview with Vienna Radio on 23 January in connection with Chancellor Kreisky's recent critical remarks about the role of the church in Poland. Commenting on Kreisky's remark that the church had no experience in leading workers movements, and therefore had not been able to give the Polish workers the right advice, Kraetzl said, according to the paper: "Who could tell today which advice would have been right? The bishops never presumed to lead the workers, they always came out for peace and against bloodshed."

WIENER ZEITUNG continues: "Kraetzl declared that the chancellor failed to mention in his statements the fateful nature of the Polish workers movement, which indeed was fateful for the entire East bloc. Obviously, Kraetzl said, he was only thinking of the arrears in coal deliveries and Poland's debts. The chancellor's reference to the church's attitude [in Austria] in the 1930's was described as inappropriate by Kraetzl. He argued that by these remarks, Kreisky had not rendered good services to the socialists' own endeavors to build bridges between the church and the Austrian Socialist Party [SPOE] and to overcome the differences of the past. Old wounds have again been ripped open, he said, and those of good will have been snubbed. Apparently there is now a setback in church-SPOE relations."

Vienna Domestic Service in German at 0600 GMT on 25 January carries excerpts from an interview with Vienna Archbishop Cardinal Koenig, recorded on 24 January in Klagenfurt. According to the radio, Koenig declared that Kraetzl "very extensively" discussed the situation with him before making his statement in his interview on 23 January, and that Koenig "actually had nothing to add to it." The future would show whether the church-state relationship "has actually suffered damage -- at the moment it seems like it. We will have to wait and see whether that will entail any further consequences in the future."

Asked whether his remark in his speech on 24 January -- that if bishops appealed to the people's conscience this constituted no interference in party politics -- was meant only for Austria or whether it was generally valid and also applied to Poland, Koenig replied: "This is quite a general statement -- the church does not take issue with party-political questions. This is a well-known position we have stressed ever so often; and to appeal to the people's conscience does not mean anything but that we are concerning ourselves with the essential ethical questions of public life -- and these rules are valid for everyone."

Asked about what would happen next in the controversy, Koenig declared that he could not say anything at the moment and was adopting a wait-and-see attitude, but that it was to be assumed that there would be some clarifying talks in some form or other.

Vienna Domestic Service in German at 1100 GMT on 25 January carries a news report on the same interview containing the following passage: "Koenig added that he regarded a talk with the Austrian Government or with representatives of leading SPOE bodies as expedient."

REAGAN THE 'POLITICAL TACTICIAN' FACES CHALLENGES

PM261381 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 20 Jan 82 p 7

[Editorial: "A Year of Reagan"]

[Text] It is a year today since President Reagan took over the White House. At the time he promised the American people a new beginning and a new version of the American dream on the home front. In the field of foreign policy and defense he held up the prospect of the restoration of U.S. power and standing in the world.

As far as Reagan's economic policy is concerned it can already be said that in the past year reality has proved tougher than theorizing. One of the most important architects of Reagan's policy, Office of Management and Budget Director Stockman, has admitted as much in almost as many words. The magic of the "supply economy" has not worked. Massive cuts in social programs and considerable tax reductions to strengthen the position of companies have not led to the sudden expected economic revival.

Wall Street investors remained skeptical, because against the reductions in public spending in the social sector a significant expansion of military expenditure was projected. The fact that the monetary authorities kept money scarce and consequently kept interest rates high also had a braking effect on investments. This had a strangling effect on the world economy as well as on the U.S. economy.

The result of this disappointing trend is that at the beginning of his second year in office Reagan is faced with the question of whether he should alter his policies radically -- that is, must he definitely admit that he is unable to fulfill his election promise of painlessly leading the American people out of their economic difficulties to better times? This change of policy would principally involve the introduction of new taxes and cuts in military spending.

A very large number of Reagan's advisers have already spoken out in favor of such a change of course, for they fear that if the policies are left unchanged unemployment will soar to new record heights and the budget deficit will increase -- it is already expected that the budget deficit for 1982 will total around $1 billion. They also fear the negative effect on the voters of a downward economic trend, since there will soon be elections in November for a new House of Representatives and for one-third of the seats in the Senate. However, so far Reagan himself has not yet given up hope that the economy will react fairly well to his original policy in the latter half of this year.

The foreign policy demonstrated in Reagan's first year must also be described as disappointing. It is actually quite amazing to consider the lack of concepts and ideas -- apart from an ideological anticommunism -- with which Reagan's team has approached this field. It is not that the Republican Party does not have any prominent experts in this field. One only needs to think of former Secretary of State Kissinger. But they are distrusted by the new right movement, which sees weakness in the pragmatism of the experts. The resultant paradox is that despite all the talk of the restoration of U.S. power and influence there has been a glaring lack of a coherent foreign and defense policy. However, one extremely positive development can be pointed to -- the resumption of the U.S.-Soviet talks in November on nuclear arms in Europe and Washington's stated readiness to talk about other problems with the Russians in this context. In the election at the end of 1980 Reagan swept his opponent away, partly thanks to the great expectations he had raised in his election campaign. But his failure (up to now) to meet these expectations has led to a rapid decline in his popularity. At the end of last year Reagan had a worse showing in the opinion polls that his three immediate predecessors had at a similar point in their terms of office. The coming year will make great demands on Reagan the political tactician.

SPOKESMAN DENIES REPORT OF FOREIGN POLICY CHANGE

[Excerpt] Bonn, 25 Jan (DPA) -- The FRG will not change its foreign policy, government spokesmen are stressing on Monday following the publication of a confidential Foreign Ministry policy study which recommended a greater orientation in foreign policy toward the West. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker saw "no cause for the chancellor and vice chancellor" to help change the stance on the Poland issue. Becker emphatically regretted the publication of the internal ministry paper.

Referring to the political significance of the paper, a Foreign Ministry spokesman said: "There is no intention to make changes in foreign policy." He referred to the statements made by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Vice Chancellor Hans-Dietrich Genscher in the lower house debates on 14 and 19 January, in which foreign policy was portrayed with adequate clarity. The quotations from the policy study which DER SPIEGEL published are "incomplete and thus open to misunderstanding."

SPD ISSUES RESOLUTION ON NATO DUAL DECISION

LD261156 Hamburg DPA in German 1043 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 26 Jan (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt says an "overwhelming majority" of his party favors the Executive's proposal that the SPD should not make its final decision on NATO's dual decision on medium-range nuclear missiles at its Munich congress in April but should wait until fall 1983. This proposal is contained in the security policy resolution for the Munich congress which the SPD leadership explained to the press in Bonn today after it was adopted by the Executive yesterday evening.

The resolution, which was adopted by the Executive against the three opposing votes of left-wing members Erhard Eppler, Oskar Lafontaine and Herta Daubler-Gmelin, is intended to bridge the differences at the Munich congress between the opponents to the NATO decision in the party's left-wing and those supporting the government's policy, who are presumably in the majority. It stresses the SPD's right to adopt a new basic decision on the possible deployment of U.S. nuclear missiles following an examination of the outcome of U.S.-Soviet talks in Geneva in 1983: "There must be no deployment on German soil before the SPD has determined its view on the results achieved at that time."

SPD Manager Peter Glotz told the press that Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt supported the resolution and that there is "complete agreement" with the chancellor in the basic policy line. Presidium member Egon Bahr, who as a disarmament expert headed a top-level working group to draw up the resolution, said that the chancellor is pressing for "presentable negotiating results" in Geneva and that the SPD is doing its share to strengthen Schmidt's position. With regard to the SPD's right to reach a new decision at a later date on the question of deployment, Bahr said that parties do not accept directives from governments nor are they subsidiaries of them, rather they form governments. Brandt said that the SPD wants to state its views before the governments of the NATO alliance reach their final decision. The SPD's views in fall 1983 will be in the form of advice to its own government.

Bahr said it was clear that in principle the NATO decision provides for the deployment of new medium-range weapons. The alliance, however, wants to determine the need for such weapons in the light of the results of the Geneva talks.

The SPD wants to do this, too. The resolution emphasized, on the basis of the expressly endorsed 1979 congress decision, the SPD goal of making the introduction of new U.S. medium-range missiles unnecessary as a result of a reduction in Soviet nuclear missiles.

For the duration of the talks in Geneva, the SPD calls for a moratorium on new short-range missile systems in order to prevent further arming in the medium-range field. A further demand is that all nuclear weapons sited in Europe and targeted on Europe be gradually included in the negotiations. A moratorium on medium-range weapons should be looked into if there is progress at the negotiations. Lafontaine voted against this point since, according to Bahr, he desired a moratorium right at the start of the negotiations in order to prevent further Soviet SS-20's being deployed. According to Bahr, the three left-wing Executive members voted against the resolution because they want a stronger call to the superpowers to stop nuclear arming and for disarmament than is contained in the resolutions.

Bahr emphasized the resolution's frequently reiterated pledge to continue the policy of peace and detente, on which basis the party leadership also proceeds from the policy of "security and detente" determined by NATO in 1967. The SPD also wants to continue NATO policy, the SPD politician said. Referring to the debate in the United States about changing U.S. policy, he said that if others want to change their policy they stand outside or against NATO policy.

Seeks To Reopen Decision

[Editorial signed G-N.: "Will to Predominance"]

[Text] In the preparation of its party congress decision on disarmament and nuclear weapons the SPD leadership once again disassociated itself somewhat from its own government. In December 1979 the Federal Government, together with the other allies, decided that U.S. medium-range weapons would be stationed in Europe as of 1983 in the event that no satisfactory result of the disarmament negotiations with the Soviet Union was at hand. This means that the decision on the stationing was made. It is up to the Soviet Union now to render the implementation of the decision superfluous.

A draft resolution, which is being mapped out by a working group of the party leadership headed by Egon Bahr, seeks to achieve a reopening of NATO's decision so that in 1983 everything will be discussed all over again. In the meantime, the big powers are to be called upon to refrain fron introducing any new short-range (below 1,000 kilometers) nuclear missiles. Besides, all nuclear weapons stockpiled in Europe or targeted on Europe, including the French and the British, are to form part of the negotiations.

As to the details of these proposals quite a few things can be said factually in favor or against them. This can be discussed with the allies. But what must be kept in mind, above all, is the political effect that the statement expressing a demand of the German Social Democrats to the two big powers at the same time may have. Ever since 1947, after the almost complete withdrawal of the United States there has been a great superiority of Soviet conventional forces in Europe and, as of late, also in the field of nuclear weapons. This is fully attributable to the Soviet will to predominance. The question of whether disarmament will be achieved depends on a change of this Soviet will. This is what all efforts must be aimed at.

The assumption that advice should be given to the two big powers in a like manner and out of an equidistant approach not only means that the SPD is overrating itself as a party but also the Federal Republic as a state. It is above all wrong to believe that a party decision that weakens the NATO decisions would bring more pressure to bear on the negotiations than an intact NATO dual decision. On the contrary: Such pressure would be aimed at Washington, the alliance and Bonn, whereas the Soviet leadership would be induced to speculate on a further softening up in West Europe and become even more stubborn with regard to diminishing its predominance.

BRANDT COMMENTS ON JARUZELSKI 25 JAN SPEECH

[Text] Bonn, 26 Jan (DPA) -- The measures announced by head of the Polish military government Wojciech Jaruzelski for relaxing martial law do not fulfill the expectations and demands of the SPD, according to SPD Chairman Willy Brandt. Speaking to the press in Bonn today, Brandt reaffirmed the SPD's call to the Polish leadership to lift martial law, to release prisoners and to enable the independent trade unions to organize themselves again and, like the Catholic Church, to become partners in a dialogue with the government.

He would be pleased, said Brandt, if Jaruzelski's hints moved in this direction, but even this would be only minutely drawing closer to the SPD's position. Brandt intends to explain the SPD's position with regard to events in Poland today during a discussion with former Polish Premier Jozef Cyrankiewicz. Cyrankiewicz, who in 1970 as the negotiating partner of the then Federal Chancellor Brandt saw the beginnings of German-Polish reconciliation, was invited for the discussion by Brandt as member of the international disarmament commission under Swedish politician Olof Palme.

FIRMS RECEIVE NEW CONTRACTS FOR PIPELINE

LD251606 Hamburg DPA in German 1503 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Duesseldorf, 25 Jan (DPA) -- The consortium of Mannesmann Handel AG and Thyssen Stahlunion GmbH, Duesseldorf, have received an order for 1.2 million tons of large pipes from the V/O Promsyryeimport, Moscow; 550,000 tons are to be delivered in 1982 and 650,000 tons in 1983. Mannesmann announced on Monday that the 56-inch pipes will be produced in the Mulheim plant of the Mannesmann Roehrenwerke AG. The new contract continues the routine supply to the USSR of pipes of a similar size and identical specification begun in 1970. The latest order, for 550,000 tons, was received in April 1981 and is scheduled for delivery in March 1982.

GDR CITIZEN ARRESTED ON SUSPICION OF SPYING

LD262202 Hamburg DPA in German 1950 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Karlsruhe, 26 Jan (DPA) -- The investigating judge of the Federal Court at the request of Federal Prosecutor-General Kurt Rebmann, has issued an arrest warrant for a 34-year old GDR citizen who is strongly suspected of having carried out secret service activity as an agent for the [GDR] Ministry of State Security. The federal prosecutor's office stated today in response to questioning that the GDR citizens, Rainer Brandt, who entered the country several days ago from the GDR as a "courier," is strongly suspected of working as a so-called controller for the Ministry of State Security. He is said to have made contact in this capacity with FRG citizens. In addition, Brandt, who was arrested in Hamburg at the weekend, is strongly suspected of having entered the Federal Republic and West Berlin under a forged West German identity document. Investigations concerning the alleged GDR agent are continued.

BOMB DAMAGES SALVADORAN CONSULATE IN COLOGNE

PA251636 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1436 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Cologne, 25 Jan (EFE) -- The police have reported that the explosion of a bomb destroyed the door and several windows of of the honorary Salvadoran Consulate building in Cologne. The explosion occurred early this morning and the police have no clues as to the motive for this attack. The records and documents of the consulate were not damaged although the explosion broke the glass in the windows of several houses in the area.

PRACTICAL ANTI-AMERICANISM IN EUROPE VIEWED

[Commentary signed EIN: "Bastion of Freedom"]

[Text] This is how we live next to each other: German television carries excerpts from the budget debate; the U.S. Armed Forces TV network in Europe shows the burial of the murdered U.S. military attache in Paris -- the widow, silent and in despair but composed, and both children upset and in tears. It is not hard to imagine how the military TV community of our guest soldiers and their dependents reacted to these pictures. They must consider the old continent more of a hostile bridgehead than a friendly bastion. There has been too much "practical anti-Americanism" in the past weeks. The military attache, Lieutenant Colonel Ray, was murdered treacherously. Brigadier General Dozier was kidnapped. A U.S. charge d'affaires escaped the six shots of a terrorist only because of his presence of mind and a bazooka was fired at General Groesen, 7th Army commander in chief. U.S. soldiers will ask themselves why they should defend this part of the world. The politicians are increasingly leaning toward bringing the "boys" back home from this strategic zone. This is exactly the reaction the terrorists hope for.

HAMBURG SPD 'COMRADES' KNEW WHAT THEY WERE DOING

[Herbert Kremp commentary: "Misleading"]

[Text] The confusion in the government camp over the security policy decision of the Hamburg SPD congress yesterday reached an almost extraordinary level. Hamburg's Mayor Dohnanyi and flanking deputy government spokesman Ruehl described as "misleading" reports according to which there existed a contradiction between the Hamburg utterances and the policy of the Federal Government. Conceding this contradiction Defense Minister Apel stated in an interview: "In this respect, too, the party congress unfortunately made its decision though being fully aware of the problems."

What is the point?

In its decision the party congress demanded two things: First, "a nuclear-free zone in Europe" and second that "during the negotiations (between the United States and the Soviet Union in Geneva) there must be no stationing of any new, already produced short- and medium-range missiles." This formulation is in contradiction to NATO's dual decision and in fact removes the teeth from it, for NATO as well as the Federal Government deliberately had committed themselves to a date for the beginning of the stationing of modern U.S. missiles: In the event that the Geneva negotiations do not bring about any result by the fall of 1983 then the missiles will be stationed. Period.

In contrast to this, the Hamburg SPD decision says that in the fall of 1983 a Social Democratic federal party congress will decide on the "conclusions" to be drawn from the ongoing negotiations. This demolishes the wall of the NATO limit and opens the hallway to delaying tactics. It is called moratorium in the technical terminology. One continues to negotiate, without, however, acting. This is how the Soviets would like it, in contrast to the Federal Government, the chancellor and NATO. The West rejects endless talking accompanied by idleness. This was repeated by Apel when he said that NATO's dual decision does not provide for a moratorium.

It is rather doubtful, however, whether or not it was the Hamburg comrades' lack of expert knowledge that led to the decision, as Apel added apologetically. No, the comrades knew quite well what they were doing, they did not want any counterarming.

PREMIER MAUROY DEFENDS SIBERIAN GAS PROJECT

NC251547 Paris AFP in English 1525 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Cambrai, northern France, 25 Jan (AFP) -- The weekend gas deal signed by France and the Soviet Union in no way alters the Socialist-dominated government's international policies or its "solidarity with the Polish people," Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy said here today. Mr Mauroy affirmed that the French wanted their government "to be in solidarity with those who defend freedom in the world, but also to be responsible for economic and energy future of their country, responsible for the major equilibriums which we must maintain the world to preserve peace." He added that events in Poland did not mean that "there should be no more contacts, and (?that all) the agreements should be broken off." Nor should the Americans refuse to discuss disarmament, he said.

MITTERRAND, PAKISTANI PRESIDENT HOLD TALKS

Luncheon Meeting

NC251514 Paris AFP in English 1456 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Paris, 25 Jan (AFP) -- Pakistani President Mohammad Ziaul Haq had a two-hour luncheon meeting with French President Francois Mitterrand at the Elysee Palace today. Guests included Pakistani Agriculture Minister Vice-Admiral Mohammad Fazil Janjua, Pakistani Minister for Industry Elahi Bux Soomro, Pakistani Foreign Secretary of State Riaz Piracha and the Pakistani ambassador in Paris. Also invited were French Interior Minister Gaston Defferre, Minister for Research and Technology Jean-Pierre Chevenement, and Presidential Special Adviser Jacques Attali. On leaving the Elysee, President Haq thanked the French president for his "hospitality and kindness."

Haq on Mirage-2000 Purchase

LD252042 Paris Domestic Service in French 1800 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] A meeting between President Mitterrand and Ziaul Haq, president of Pakistan, took place today. There was a working lunch followed by private talks at the Elysee. On the agenda were the situation in Afghanistan, a country neighboring Pakistan, and trade exchanges between Paris and Islamabad -- delicate matters for the French president insofar as human rights are not a day-to-day preoccupation in Pakistan. In an exclusive interview with [name indistinct] Gosset, General Ziaul Haq states that the nuclear issue was not brought up with the French head of state but he does reveal on the other hand that he is prepared to take the Mirage-2000.

[Begin recording in English with superimposed French translation]

[Haq] Yes, very much so. We are very interested and Pakistan is, moreover, a longstanding customer of France's for its military equipment. That is why we are seeking to establish sustained relations with France in order to procure the means to defend our country. Pakistan is interested in the Mirages of the current generation of which we already possess some models and we are very interested in the Mirage-2000. But there is no precise contract at the moment. I have not come here with a shopping list. I have come for a friendly dialogue.

[Question] It is said that you are ready to make an atomic bomb?

[Answer] No, this is false. It is rumor and speculation. Pakistan is only concerned to develop its nuclear technology for peaceful purposes.

[Question] But do you have the means for making an atomic bomb?

[Answer] No, not for the time being. But we are trying to acquire every sort of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes. [end recording]

25 Jan Press Conference

NC251859 Paris AFP in English 1854 GMT 25 Jan 82

[By Francis Curta]

[Excerpts] Paris, 25 Jan (AFP) -- Pakistan's President Mohammad Ziaul Haq today reaffirmed that, whatever the circumstances, his country did not intend to produce nuclear weapons, though it would strive to acquire nuclear technology for peaceful purposes.

"Pakistan has neither the capability nor the intention of making an atomic bomb," General Haq told a press conference here following talks today with President Francois Mitterrand on international and bilateral issues, including questions of defense procurement, the talks however did not deal with "anything on the nuclear subject," he said. Asked about the debate surrounding the 1976 French decision to suspend the sale of a nuclear reprocessing plant to Pakistan pending agreement on design modifications to prevent its fuel from being used in the production of nuclear weapons, General Haq suggested the contract still held and he hoped "difficulties" over its implementation would be resolved at a later stage.

Talks on bilateral issues with President Mitterrand focused on cultural, economic and political questions, along with matters of defense procurement, he said. He hoped the long-standing relationship with France in weapons procurement would continue, he added.

Observers suggested Pakistan might be interested in buying a number of sophisticated Mirage-2000 fighter-bombers from France.

On international issues, the French and Pakistani leaders discussed the situation in Pakistan and Afghanistan, the Gulf war between Iran and Iraq -- in which the Islamic conference and the non-aligned movements have sought to mediate -- and relations with India. While there was no direct link between events in Poland and in Afghanistan, General Haq suggested that the Polish situation had been contained to an essentially "internal problem" mainly because of the international reaction to Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

On relations with India, General Haq said Pakistan's offer of a non-aggression pact to New Delhi aimed at furthering the 1972 similar agreement concluded after the third Pakistani-Indian war. He hoped the new round of diplomatic talks which starts Friday in New Delhi would prove to be "something positive, or the beginning of something positive."

On martial law at home, General Haq who toppled former prime minister Zulfiqar 'Ali Bhutto in 1979, said Pakistan was passing through "a transitory stage." The aim was to establish an "Islamic democracy," he said. "Islam does not give any practical form of government but Islam explains the principles of democracy," he said. His regime aimed to introduce democratic principles from the grassroots upwards, he said, adding that the government had so far succeeded "at the grassroot level."

Meanwhile, some 200 Pakistanis, most of them favourable to executed Prime Minister Bhutto, demonstrated in Paris against President Haq's visit -- viewed as a new step towards Western acceptance of his military rule. President Haq, whose one-day "working visit" here concludes a 10-day European tour which also took him to Italy, Romania and Yugoslavia, is due to leave for home Wednesday. He is expected to stop over in Saudi Arabia for talks with Saudi leaders and a pilgrimage.

SAKHAROV ASKS MITTERRAND TO HELP PRISONERS

LD251650 Paris Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Andrey Sakharov is asking Francois Mitterrand to intervene with Leonid Brezhnev in favor of political prisoners in the USSR. In a letter delivered by Mrs Sakharov to Western newsmen in Moscow, the academician draws the French president's attention to the cause of several Soviet dissidents who have been convicted, including for example Anatoliy Shcharanskiy. The academician also thanks the French president for having intervened in his favor during his hunger strike.

INTERNATIONAL LINKS NOTHING NEW TO TERRORISM

[Editorial: "A Terrorist 'International'?"]

[Excerpts] Ever since it took office the Reagan administration has continually denounced "international terrorism," which has mainly struck at the United States and, through it, at the West. The assassination of Lieutenant Colonel Ray in Paris on 18 January is bound to strengthen Washington's views.

"Infiltration is probably the only defense against terrorist attacks," the White House chief stated. In any case, as far as infiltration is concerned, the United States lags behind some other countries, such as Italy for instance.

It is true that the problem facing the United States is of a special nature: Their nationals -- especially their diplomats -- usually fall victim to terrorism abroad. But even in Italy, where political violence is rampant in the country itself and undoubtedly has a national dimension, the latest developments in connection with the investigation of the kidnapping of General Dozier and a senior judge's recent revelations have lent new impetus to the old debate concerning the international aspect of terrorism. It is true that the exceptionally bloody operation which was apparently planned against the DC at the coming meeting of its national council seemed to have an exclusively Italian dimension, but the weapons which were to be used, the increasingly frequent statements by political leaders on all sides and, quite recently, Judge Imposimato's remarks have prompted people to mention again the subject of connections between the underworld, certain secret services bent on destabilizing the democracies, and various terrorist movements.

In fact, the existence of such links is nothing new and is not peculiar to Italy. There is no doubt, for instance, that the Japanese Red Army has been training with the Palestinians and using their arsenals. It has also been established that some elements of the Italian left have repeatedly visited the Near East in order to obtain arms, and it is in Beirut that responsibility was claimed for the assassination of the U.S. diplomat in Paris. Do these obvious contacts, which the circles concerned no longer really bother to conceal, justify the assertion that a real international plot exists? The answer to this question undoubtedly depends on the degree of coordination beyond which you believe coordination becomes a joint offensive. In any case, the coincidence of certain dates (for instance, between the great turning point in Italian terrorism in 1974-1975 and the beginning of Armenian terrorism) is bound to make you wonder, even if you treat with some skepticism the thesis at one time upheld by a French interior minister that there is a "clandestine bandmaster." It is true, however, that, according to U.S. statistics, some 300 diplomats, including 20 ambassadors, have fallen victim to terrorism since 1968. This is in itself an essential aspect of this internationalization of political crime.

MINISTRY SOURCES DENY ARREST MADE IN DOZIER CASE

LD260004 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 25 Jan 82

New Communique on Dozier

AU260845 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Rome, 26 Jan (ANSA) -- The accusation that United States policy is to preserve American soil by sacrificing Europe was one the leitmotifs of Communique Number-Five released by the Red Brigades yesterday on the kidnapping of NATO Brigadier-General James Lee Dozier, according to fragmentary versions of the document circulating here.

The urban guerrillas holding the U.S. officer since they nabbed him in Verona on December 17 left the communique in a trash-can in downtown Rome and tipped off a Roman daily where to find it. The six-page statement was accompanied by a photograph of Dozier, apparently taken with a Polaroid-type camera. It showed him with a long beard and holding a placard with the words, "The capitalist crisis generates imperialist war."

The communique and the photograph were seized by police at once. The reporters who picked it up were not allowed to make a photo-copy, but they managed to transcribe a few phrases before handing it over.

As far as the reporters could see, the document contained no conditions for Dozier's release and consisted in an ideological harangue. One phrase declared war on "Argentinian-style" methods of capturing Italy's urban guerrillas and urged every means available to destroy the "structure which studies, carries out and controls the torture." In another phrase, the Red Brigades said that the "defense of the West comes down to safeguarding American territory in the lucid and criminal project of preserving the major world capitalist power thanks to the forced sacrifice of the peoples of Europe." The communique concluded with the phrase, "Honor to Comrade Lucio di Giacomo," a reference to the Prima Linea urban guerrilla slain in a shootout with Carabinieri police near Siena last Thursday.

Wounded Terrorist Discovered

AU250905 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 25 Jan (ANSA) -- One of the terrorists, a woman, involved in the Siena bank robbery Thursday and the later killing of two Carabinieri, was found wounded in a Rome apartment Sunday and taken to a hospital where she underwent an operation. She had bullet wounds in an arm and in her side and doctors said her condition was serious due to the amount of blood lost.

She was identified as Giulia Borelli, 29, and is considered one of the founders of the Front Line terrorist gang. She has been on the wanted list since 1977.

Arrested along with her were two men, but it was not immediately clear if they were involved in the Siena robbery and later shootout which cost the life of two Carabinieri officers and the wounding of a third. One of the terrorists was also killed in that exchange of gunfire. Police raided the apartment where they found Borelli on the basis of a tip from Tuscania were two of the terrorists had been rounded up Saturday. The manhunt for the remaining members of the gang was continuing.

It was not clear just how many commandoes were involved in the raid on the bank and the ensuing escape. There had been reports that a wounded female terrorist had died of her wounds, but Sunday afternoon in Milan a leaflet was found, signed by the "Organized Communists for Proletarian Liberation," stating that only one of the commandoes was killed. The leaflet was dated Saturday which could mean that the wounded Borelli arrived in Rome by that day and informed the organization that she had survived the clash.

PRESS COMMENTS ON PRAVDA CONDEMNATION OF PCI

AU251557 Rome ANSA in English 1536 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 25 Jan (ANSA) -- Moscow's "excommunication" of the Italian Communist Party (PCI), according to the description provided by CORRIERE DELLA SERA of Milan of the five-column editorial run Sunday by the official Soviet party daily, PRAVDA, was the major issue taken up in comment in the Italian dailies today. The PRAVDA spread accused the Italian party, the largest Marxist party in the West, of seeking to abandon the "grand doctrine of Marxist-Leninism" and of taking the road "of opportunism and revisionism," thereby directly aiding and abetting imperialism.

For two other Milan papers, IL GIORNO and IL GIORNALE NUOVO, the PRAVDA charges "fall only slightly short" of a formal Soviet excommunication of Italy's Communists.

The PCI organ, L'UNITA, today carried the entire PRAVDA editorial spread and told readers that the Italian party's "official" response to the allegations levelled by Moscow would be published in tomorrow's edition. In a preview of what was to come, however, the L'UNITA comment today said, "Immediately and very briefly, we must point out that the layout, the reasoning and the tone of the (PRAVDA) article unfortunately demonstrates that its writers are absolutely incapable of conducting a discussion on the basis of equality and reciprocal respect."

IL GIORNALE NUOVO, a right-of-center paper, editorialized, "We have always been very skeptical of the possibility of an authentic break between the PCI and the Soviet 'big brother,' a la Yugoslavia or China, but it would be factional to ignore or underestimate the significance of the thunderbolt unleashed by PRAVDA against the Italian comrades. This is not an excommunication but it falls only slightly short of one and might herald such a move."

CORRIERE DELLA SERA, on the other hand, affirmed that, "coming as it does from the Mecca of Marxist-Leninism, this must be considered as a real excommunication, the third after the ones against Tito and Mao. "We can expect a more official document," the big Milan paper continued, "one issued by a congress or the Central Committee, but PRAVDA is the official distributor of the communist gospel.

"There are two results involved. The first is that the PCI has disassociated itself from Moscow and Moscow from the PCI; the second is that the PCI is detached from Marxist-Leninist doctrine, in the opinion of the authoritative paper PRAVDA," CORRIERE added.

According to the pro-communist Rome paper PAESE SERA, the PRAVDA reply to the PCI position of events in Poland and the historic experience of real socialism, formalized during the January 13 PCI Central Committee meeting, was a response that could have been easily anticipated. "Even if the tone (of the PRAVDA editorial) is overly harsh, PAESE said, "it is certain to provoke comment and mediation [as received], especially because it confirms the seriousness and profound nature of the ideological conflict."

Somewhat along the same lines, IL GIORNO picked up the term "sacrilegious attempt" used in the PRAVDA piece and affirmed that "the sacrilegious attempt of the PCI Central Committee could not be met with silence, and, in fact, it was not. But the 'Moscow church', despite the invective, the insulting accusations of unusual violence and obscure threats, prudently stopped short of the threshold of excommunication." The Milan paper went on to point out that "Moscow could not, on the other hand, keep its silence because the Soviet party considers itself the leader of the communist movement and the bearer of the true word and also because the more loyal among the lesser parties called for a firm response."

IL TEMPO of Rome, another conservative paper, referred to "the arrogant move of one who has long been used to being the master. The Soviet Communist Party took off its gloves and launched a sharp and massive attack against a brother, almost an ex-brother, the Italian party. The 'communist question' has become dramatic and further decisive moves are expected."

DETAILS OF L'UNITA RESPONSE TO PRAVDA ARTICLE

AU260852 Rome ANSA in English 0843 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Rome, 26 Jan (ANSA) -- The apparently unbridgeable chasm now yawning between the Italian Communist Party (PCI) and its Soviet counterpart over the Polish crisis received new confirmation here today with an article carried by the PCI's daily, L'UNITA, in response to Soviet criticisms. The article was a reply to one published Sunday by the Soviet party daily, PRAVDA, charging the Italian Communists with abandoning Marxism-Leninism, acting against "socialism and peace", and adopting "opportunist and revisionist" policies. Most political observers agree that the tone of the Italian Communists' response indicates that the break between the two parties excludes any form of rapprochement for at least some time to come.

In effect, this morning's article maintained all the PCI's criticisms against the situation in Eastern Europe and added a harshly worded attack on the way the PRAVDA article was expressed. PRAVDA's tone, L'UNITA asserted, was not that of "someone who wants to examine the facts, answer argument with argument, reason and produce proof. Rather, (it was the tone) of someone who pretends to express a supreme political-ideological judgement deriving from a function as "center" and "guide," a function which has been declared at an end for some time and which, in any case, we have always contested and rejected in recent years."

According to L'UNITA, it was "strange and preoccupying" that the Soviet Union should have learned nothing from the "numerous grave facts and ruptures of the past, from Yugoslavia to China." On Poland, L'UNITA denied that the Italian Communists are "against the interests of socialism" and accused the leaders of the Polish communist party of pursuing an "economic, social and political line which has led a people to reject a social system and government practise which are authoritarian, mistaken and imposed from above." In a related point, the newspaper recalled that the high hopes raised by the Soviet party congress in 1956, when de-Stalinization was declared, "have found no reflection in political practise either in the Soviet Union or in relations among the countries most closely tied to it."

The Italian Communists also claimed their right to pass independent judgement on "individual acts of Soviet foreign policy," pointing out that the PCI's moves for peace are in contrast with the Soviet armed interventions in Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan. L'UNITA concluded that those who commit acts in conflict with peace "give an alibi to imperialism."

Rejects Single Center

[Excerpts] Rome, 25 Jan (AFP) -- The Italian Communist Party, in a front-page article in tomorrow's issue of the party daily L'UNITA, reiterates that it is autonomous in relation to Moscow and continues its condemnation of the military crackdown in Poland. The article is in reply to a front-page attack yesterday in the Soviet party daily PRAVDA. The attack was triggered by the Italian Communists' stand on Poland.

"The tone (of the PRAVDA article)," L'UNITA says, "is not that employed by someone who wants to examine the facts, compare the arguments, reason, and demonstrate, but rather that of someone who claims to express a supreme politico-ideological judgment."

The Italian Communists, L'UNITA continues, were expecting a reply from their Soviet comrades to their statement last month condemning martial law in Poland and rejecting Soviet communism as a model. But what, according to L'UNITA, is striking about the PRAVDA article is "the fact that the events in Poland are referred to only to accuse the Italian Communists of taking them for pretexts.

Poland, it says, is a central concern of the Italian party, adding that contrary to what PRAVDA claimed, the Italian party has always attacked the danger represented both by conservative and dogmatic resistance and by the "extremists" of the Polish renewal. The basic problem, L'UNITA says, is failure to accept that "the process of renewal means discussion of the model on which that society was constructed," a society progressing through genuine change toward "political and industrial democracy, pluralism, and genuine participation in government management."

L'UNITA terms totally unfounded PRAVDA's charge that the Italian party "misunderstands or ignores the historic victories of the October Revolution." L'UNITA stresses the Soviet contribution to the defeat of nazism, but recalls the criticism voiced as far back as 1964 by the late Palmiro Togliatti, then party leader, and echoed by the present leadership: "Why must it be that our serious criticism is always rejected, without any serious analysis of the facts?"

L'UNITA continues: "When a crisis erupts in a socialist country, as in Poland (in the seventies) for example, world public opinion is suddenly informed that social inequalities and even scandalous situations of privilege existed, that there was corruption inside the party and civil service, that the Poles themselves had to expel (former party chief) Edward Gierek from the party and institute legal proceedings against him. Do not these long-concealed facts damage the cause of socialism and peace?"

L'UNITA goes on to accuse PRAVDA of caricaturing the position of the Italian party, which PRAVDA accuses of "anti-Sovietism." "We have always rejected, and shall always reject, any attempt to liquidate the Soviet experiment and those of linked countries," L'UNITA says. But it adds: "It seems strange and disturbing to us that the leadership of the Soviet Communist Party appears to have learned nothing from the numerous grave facts and ruptures in the past (with Yugoslavia and China) which caused enormous damage (and continue to do so) not only to the cause of socialism, peace, and liberty, but to the Soviet Union itself."

The article rejects the theory of only one "true socialism" -- that of Eastern Europe. Such a concept, it says, strengthens "a political and ideological orthodoxy of the kind that would be proclaimed by an authority that has transformed the teachings of scientific socialism...into a dogmatic ideological system based on the conception of a guide-state animated by a supremacist will and mentality."

"We are faced, in fact," L'UNITA says, "with the determination to rebuild around the Soviet Union a single centre of world leadership of communist parties and of the totality of popular liberation movements." That, L'UNITA concludes, "we reject, as we reject PRAVDA's arguments and language."

No Counterrevolutionary Plots

LD260000 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] The answer of the Communist daily L'UNITA to the accusations against the Italian Communists from the CPSU organ PRAVDA has been made public today. In a long statement L'UNITA first of all rejects in a calm but firm tone the manner in which PRAVDA formulated its accusations as coming from one who claims to express an ultimate political and ideological judgment, derived from a leadership function which was declared to have come to an end a long time ago.

L'UNITA questions the accusations made by Moscow against the Polish trade union Solidarity and asks what causes the crises which periodically blow up in this or that country with a communist orientation. The answer of L'UNITA is that at the basis of such crises there are no plots by counterrevolutionary forces, as is invariably claimed by Soviet propaganda, but something more deeply seated, which calls into question the Soviet model itself, as it has been molded throughout its history.

In essence, it is the lack of political democracy and of the right to dissent which makes the Soviet regime a model which the Italian Communist Party does not intend to pursue. L'UNITA also recalled the Soviet military interventions in Czechoslovakia and in Afghanistan, defining them as acts against peace.

Support for Solidarity

LD260236 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2300 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Excerpt] After recalling the breaks in the past, from Yugoslavia to China, which greatly damaged the cause of socialism and liberty, L'UNITA goes on to deal with the events in Poland, which were referred to by the Soviet leaders solely to accuse the Italian Communist leaders [words indistinct]. The overwhelming majority of Polish people supported Solidarity.

The paper goes on to say that Italian Communists are on the side of the working masses for a socialist society, based exclusively on their own initiative, on their participation and broadest consent.

After rejecting PRAVDA's charge of refusing to acknowledge the historic achievements of the Russian socialist revolution, the Italian Communists' document cites the armed interventions in Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan as facts in contrast to the proposals for negotiation and disarmament put forward by Moscow 1 year ago. Rejecting the accusation of playing in the hands of imperialism, L'UNITA says PRAVDA gives a distorted version and almost a caricature of the more general views of the Italian Communists.

NONSOCIALIST PARTIES COULD 'RULE COUNTRY BETTER'

PM221225 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 17 Jan 82 p 12

[Editorial: "The Government and the Four"]

[Text] There is no socialist majority in the Folketing. The leftwing's gains in the election were balanced out by the major defeat for the Social Democrats. The prime minister may well appeal to the Socialist People's Party to participate in realistic cooperation, but this cooperation will only be effective if the two parties are supported by the Radical Liberals. The Radical Liberals can rightly be taken to task for many things, but support for socialist policies is not one of them.

There is a clear nonsocialist [ikke-socialistisk] majority in the Folketing and because of this there was and is an alternative capable of governing. On the basis of the nonsocialist majority there were four parties which were ready to form a government, and which are probably still ready to do so. The Conservative People's Party, the Liberals, the Center Democrats and the Christian People's Party admit that they have a duty to the voters and to the situation in the Folketing. The four do not shrink from this duty in the interview published today by BERLINGSKE TIDENDE, and it is a duty to which they must remain true. If they did not do so, it would conflict with the direction in which the election result pointed, and it would also lay the foundation for the unreasonable prolongation of the Social Democratic minority government's life.

We are here dealing with four parties, each of which has a special importance for sections of the electorate. In certain areas there is considerable distance between the four parties' voters and also between their Folketing members. They will naturally have to proceed individually out of respect for their identities and positions. But in certain crucial areas the differences are so small that they cannot really matter. Without much difficulty the four parties could agree on a joint view of what the crisis in society is. On economic and financial policy, in their views of the balance of payments problem, unemployment and industrial policy the four parties could agree on a common approach. In the face of the proposals the government intends to make they must be able to act together, and their agreement must take the form of concrete proposals which are alternatives to Social Democratic policy. It is this burden which circumstances are forcing them to assume. If he wishes, Anker Jorgensen can choose to go to the left and, together with the Socialist People's Party, work out policies whose implementation the Radical Liberals will guarantee. This is a dangerous road and we must expect it to quickly reach a dead end. Or he could look facts in the face -- it is the four parties which are able to give society stable and long-term policies. This could be with or without the Social Democrats and it would be no tragedy if they made the wrong choice. There are others who could rule the country better.

ELECTION SHOWS 'FINNISH DEMOCRACY IS WORKING'

[Text] Mauno Koivisto's landslide victory in the Electoral College election -- which despite the opinion poll figures and advance tips about his popularity was large enough to surprise even his own supporters -- has opened the door a little to the third republic. In a week's time it will be thrown wide open when the weekend's victor in the Electoral College election is made the next president. This will mark the end of the long and fruitful Kekkonen era in our history.

The election result was -- as this column in some of yesterday's editions pointed out -- a personal triumph for Mauno Koivisto himself. He has long been carried along by a strong wave of popularity in the country. A large part of the explanation of this fact is that he has come to appear as an independent, almost a political actor on society's stage, without any direct connection with the political establishment. The election gave the voters an opportunity to raise him to the highest post in the country, and they really grasped the opportunity.

It is clear that the past years had created a great impetus among the voters which demanded expression at the ballot box. The fact that this was able to happen is a healthy sign. A positive feature is that the outcome was as clear and unambiguous as it was. It gives the next head of state a firm foundation on which to build, both within Finland and more especially abroad. It eliminates the possibility of future allegations of pressures from various outside sources. It shows that Finnish democracy is working, something which obviously did not fail to impress itself on the many foreign observers who followed the dramatic count of election night.

However, a presidential election is also a political election, and for the first time Finland has now chosen a Social Democratic president who will guide the ship of state for the next 6 years. It goes without saying that this choice was made with the support of those who are closest to him ideologically. A look at the voting figures for the Social Democrats, who were Mauno Koivisto's official supporters, shows when compared with previous Social Democratic election results that significant groups from outside the party -- some from further left, but undeniably also some from the nonsocialist side of the barricade -- have followed his flag. In the case of these latter their motives were obviously mostly emotional and personal -- the dividing lines between the political power blocs are not thought to have played much of a role. This means that there are now great expectations placed on the next head of state, and these amount to a challenge for him.

But a change of the guard in the country's highest office generally has political repercussions. Various circles have already begun to hint at changes in the power structure in society. It would also be surprising if the Social Democrats did not attempt to gain some party political advantage from the strong Koivisto surge in the election. We will see how far they succeed in the next parliamentary election, which will take place in a year's time if nothing unforeseen occurs.

It is already clear that a shift of power has taken place on the left. The Democratic League's [SKDL] catastrophic election results bears witness to this. Despite a well-fought election campaign Kalevi Kivisto failed to prevent a considerable loss of votes -- either through abstention or to Koivisto Nevertheless SKDL's electors could still retain the role of president-makers. But their problem is still the continued internal dissension within the group which, despite Kivisto's urgent plea on Tuesday [19 January] to the Taistoite minority for cooperation, still seems to have been impossible to heal. If the Taistoite faction does go its own way, the fragile ties which still formally hold the party together could easily be broken by a minor upset -- with consequences which in the longer term could transform the political pattern on the extreme left.

Dissension is also the scourge of the nonsocialists. In the duel for the presidency the nonsocialists did not succeed in time in agreeing on a joint candidate who could have been fielded against Koivisto. Instead the parties went into the election with their own candidates. And it would not be unreasonable to assert that the trio of the Swedish People's Party, the Center Party and the National Coalition Party succeeded surprisingly well this time in maintaining order in party ranks, despite their unfavourable starting position and the shortness of the campaign. As far as the Swedish People's Party is concerned, a large part of the thanks for this must go to the party's candidate, Jan-Magnus Jansson. The Center Party should also be thankful that it was Johannes Virolainen who stood as its figurehead, otherwise the election results would probably have been much less respectable than they actually were.

As far as the National Coalition Party is concerned, it would be reasonable to assume that the present setback will not be impossible to repair.

However, the middle groups and the Center Party in particular have reason to put their houses in order. The presidential change over means that the Center Party can no longer automatically count on the key position the party has occupied during the Kekkonen era in particular. The party's young chairman, Paavo Vayrynen, with his unsuccessful maneuvers last year within the government and with his desperate action in support of the wrong presidential candidate, will have to take part of the blame for this. And how many voters did Ahti Karjalainen frighten off when he refused to indicate once and for all that he would not run?

The Swedish People's Party seems fairly stable even in the longer term. But in the election the Liberal People's Party took a dive which does not bode well. The former protest parties, the Finnish Rural Party and the Constitutional Party of the Right, also took a dive. They seem to have been left up in the air when the original reason for their protest no longer exists. Nor has the Christian People's Party any reason to be satisfied. It is not clear what will happen to this quartet of our tiniest parties, nor is it clear what effect anything that did happen to them would have on the political map.

But if we confine ourselves to the middle groupings, developments in Sweden and Norway are a frightening indication of how things can go when the middle parties are squeezed between the shields of increasingly powerful forces to the left and the right. We cannot afford such developments in Finland. The center is needed as an equalizing and connecting link, and then unity and cooperation are the only cure. Moreover, this motto could also be said to apply to the whole nonsocialist camp, bearing in mind the coming parliamentary election.

The very first indication of how political life will work with Mauno Koivisto as president will be seen when the question of who is to form a government is taken up for discussion after his inauguration. He himself wants to retain the present model up to the election and has hinted that he is prepared to hand over the prime ministership to the Center Party. The move seems conciliatory. But we nevertheless dare to guess that the equation will not necessarily be that easy to solve. Here the next president will have an opportunity to demonstrate his talent as a master of political calculation.

ARBEIDERBLADET: STRAY IS 'OUT OF LINE'

PM220901 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 19 Jan 82 p 4

[Editorial: "The Stray Method"]

[Text] In the whole of the postwar period the maintenance of as broad agreement as possible over Norwegian foreign and security policy has been seen as an important objective. We believe that this has been a great advantage for a country as small as ours. The precondition for the large degree of success is that changing governments and changing foreign ministers have seen the value of cooperation across party boundaries in this area. The political parties in the Storting have been consulted every time the need has arisen.

It goes without saying that when foreign policy becomes a problem and the views of how Norway should react are divergent, the need for briefings and consultations with what are called the "Storting's bodies" is greatest.

Recent we have been faced with such a situation on both the Poland and Turkey questions. Nevertheless, the government has not taken any initiative to contact the parties in the Storting, apart from the signals made publicly in the foreign affairs debate immediately after the military coup in Poland.

The government alone has formulated the country's official policy on Poland, and Foreign Minister Svenn Stray has presented this policy to the meeting of the NATO Council of Ministers. The NATO meeting also took a decision in favor of sanctions against Poland, without making clear what sanctions individual countries would adopt. As far as we have been given to understand, the intention was that Foreign Minister Stray was to first present the Norwegian measures to NATO's permanent council at a meeting in Brussels next Thursday. Now is there anything at this stage which indicates that the government, the prime minister or the foreign minister had any intention of discussing these questions with the parties in the Storting?

In this situation Labor Party parliamentary leader Gro Harlem Brundtland was forced to make a move and utilize her right to demand a meeting between the foreign minister and the full Storting Foreign Affairs Committee.

It goes without saying that it is completely indefensible of the government and the top foreign policy makers to ignore the Storting in the way we have outlined here. With as weak a foundation as Kaare Willoch's minority government has, the government should be fully aware that the country's foreign policy center of gravity lies in the Storting. The foreign minister must also take this into consideration. This is all the more important since there is much to suggest that Foreign Minister Stray is a little "out of line" in his views on a number of current foreign policy questions, and is also out of line inside his own party and the government.

Our criticism of the government's way of conducting its foreign policy is not simply a question of formalities. To a very great extent it is also a question of realities.

It is an important question for all of us whether Norway's reaction to what is happening in Poland is to be sanctions and cold war on the U.S. model, or whether we should -- as the West Germans want -- maintain relations in order to be able to influence developments. At the Labor Party's National Executive meeting at Hamar last weekend former Foreign Minister Knut Frydenlund voiced clear support for the view advocated by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and West Germany's Social Democrats. We doubt whether Foreign Minister Stray has as clear a view of the question.

Relations with the NATO nation of Turkey are another important question on the foreign affairs map. At the party's National Executive meeting over the weekend Labor Party Chairman Gro Harlem Brundtland said that we cannot sweep the Turkey question "under the carpet of the violations and the extremely serious situation in Poland."

Norway has never respected military regimes in the NATO alliance. We were involved in initiatives to bring the ruling junta in Greece before the court of human rights. The then foreign minister, Andreas Cappelen, made use of NATO meetings to speak out against the officers in power in Portugal. In both Greece and Portugal Norwegian foreign policy played a role in the progression from dictatorship to democracy. It is therefore a break with some of the best traditions in Norwegian foreign policy when Danish newspapers are able to report that the Norwegian foreign minister "played a remarkably negative role at the NATO meeting to discuss Turkey."

KGB PLAYS MAJOR ROLE IN TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER

[Christopher Dobson and Ronald Payne article: "Comrades in Arms -- Thanks to Brezhnev's Artful Dodgers"]

[Text] As the NATO alliance wavers about sanctions against Russia, the ugly realisation is beginning to dawn that it is Western technology, purchased as well as purloined by the Russians, which has enabled them to construct the redoubtable war machine which threatens both Poland and the West.

Red Army tanks and guns, Soviet aircraft, missiles and warships were all created with the help of our research and development, our project designs and our industrial know-how. The SS-18 missiles pointing westward are guided by a micro-processor taken from an American stand at a trade fair. Soviet heavy artillery is built with machines bought from West Germany. The sale of American machinery for producing minute ball-bearings has helped to make Soviet missiles deadly.

These are just a few examples adding substance to the recent statement of Adml Bobby Inman, deputy director of the CIA, that most of the military technology which since 1964 has made the Russian armed forces so formidable came from America and her closest allies.

Yet it was only after the invasion of Afghanistan that America imposed a technology embargo which succeeded in hurting the Soviet computer industry. The Russian RIAD computer series had been based in the first place on an IBM 360 spirited away from West Germany in the sixties. Since then the Soviets have tried to keep up by buying their way into European computer firms on the Trojan horse principle.

It is the Polish crisis and the urging of President Reagan which have alerted the Europeans to the danger of technology seepage. Last week COCOM, a committee of NATO nations plus Japan, met in Paris to discuss means of limiting the export of military technology to Russia, though France, who had been active in selling strategic goods to the East, has already announced that she has tightened the screw.

Not before time the Europeans are to revise their 30-year-old list of material classified as strategic which may not be exported to Russia. It has been largely ignored for years and is hopelessly out of date. The West Germans are still responsible for serious leaks by selling American high technology products as well as their own based on American work.

Ever since the 1939-45 war when lease lend supplies to Russia were used as a basis for setting up modern Soviet industry, Russia has been allowed to exploit Western technology to build its war machine. Papers recently made available by the public record office show that even after the war Stalin was allowed to import the latest Rolls-Royce jet engines, copies of which powered the MIG's used against us in Korea.

That was just the beginning. Since then Soviet military scientists have devoted great effort to "clandestine acquisition" of the know-how and technology to construct military equipment better than our own.

Directorate T, the science and technology branch of the KGB, has thousands of technical and scientific officers trained at its own academy. In the field their cover is to appear as diplomats, trade mission members or representatives of the Academy of Sciences. A third of those who have dealings with Western academics and scientists are directorate men or from military intelligence. In this country there is not only a large Soviet Embassy but also a trade mission in Highgate with a staff of 50. In addition 30 inspectors are attached to British factories ostensibly for quality control of goods being sold to Russia.

It is estimated that there are at least 6,000 Soviet spies operational in the West and directorate T, constantly searching out military high technology for warlike purposes. This is the true arms race. Its task is to amass information about nuclear development, lasers, aerospace, fibre optics, metallurgy, chemistry and production processes. Micro-electronics, the heart and brain of modern weapons, is a subject high on their probe list.

Although America still leads in computers and electronics the Russians are catching up with the aid of other people's expertise. American officials suggest that while in 1965 Russia was 12 years behind it has now closed the gap to a mere three, or in some fields two years.

The directorate also takes keen interest in energy drilling, especially deep drilling at high temperatures, because the technology has ramifications for armour-piercing weapons.

A courageous Norwegian, code-named Arne, who was approached by KGB men when working in the oil industry and then agreed to work as a "double" for his own government, told us how they pumped him for information. He was controlled by a distinguished Soviet scientists, Dr Arkady Belozerov, secretary of the International Institute for Applied Systems Analysis in Vienna, who was forced to resign when the affair came to light.

When Arne provided the KBG with information freely available in a company publication he was asked to have it typed on official paper marked "secret". For the Russians, published information was too easy to get, and to justify the money spent they wanted to make its acquisition look more difficult to their masters.

Soviet researchers do in fact get a high proportion of their technical intelligence from open sources. They syphon off huge quantities of technical publications, defence sales pamphlets, even company reports, in the same way that their factory ships vacuum up fish from the sea bed.

Short of closing the open society, of course, it would be impossible to prevent the Russians from taking advantage of the capitalist system they despise. But there is already talk in America of restrictive legislation to limit the amount of high technology so freely available in the libraries and computers of the West, and Adml Inman has spoken of closer cooperation between government and scientists in the cause of national security.

Such measures are clearly necessary in Britain and in Europe as well as in America. It goes without saying that there is constant need to ensure vigilance in Western anti-espionage, but the problem does not end there. For the Russians buy as well as spy, and there are numerous items designed for industrial and peaceful use which can be exploited militarily. Air-traffic control systems can become missile guidance devices. In the Western wonderland Russians find that sophisticated 8-bit chips are used in computer games while less sophisticated ones are employed in missiles.

It would be wrong to pretend it is easy to plug the gaps through which the Soviets acquire the means to improve their war machine, but more enthusiasm is called for to prevent them benefiting from future developments meant to improve Western defences. To deprive Russia of the involuntary technological aid which strengthens her military muscle would be one way of limiting Russian ambitions and warning the Kremlin of the price to be paid for bullying Poland.

U.S., W. EUROPE SHOULD 'SHUT UP' ON SANCTIONS

PM251727 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 25 Jan 82 p 14

[Editorial: "The West Is Losing"]

[Text] Poland's crisis is testing the Western alliance to breaking point.

There is a misleading pseudo-sophistication about the way various Western leaders, such as Chancellor Schmidt of West Germany, call for "moderation" and "dialogue." President Reagan, for his part, has been relying on rhetoric and marginal window-dressing measures. Meanwhile, Russia is winning in Poland. Not for the first time, the Polish people are being left to fight the West's battles for it. The Poles have been doing just that, but are now being crushed, as they were in 1939.

Russia is re-conquering Poland. By last December, the country was well along the road towards casting off the dead hand of orthodox communist economic misrule. Russia's hierarchy could not dare permit that. Their own people suffer from just the same manifest inefficiencies and cruelties that the Poles were peacefully rebelling against. The example might have been contagious, so it is being stopped. Note that there was at no time a threat to Russia's military security. There was no question of Poland leaving the Warsaw Pact or interfering with Russia's lines of communication.

As a bonus for Moscow -- for which the Politburo must be truly grateful -- the action against Poland is shaking the NATO alliance fundamentally. It has set Western Europe and the United States snarling and backbiting against each other in a way not seen since NATO began. West Europeans are portrayed in the United States as a cowardly, avaricious lot, determined on "business as usual" with Russia and the Eastern bloc. America, on the other hand, is being attacked in Europe as hypocritical, willing to sacrifice European interests without jeopardising her own. The whole quarrel is epitomised by the unwillingness of either side to take the one major step, within its sphere, which would really bite against Russia. For Europe, this is the Siberian gas pipeline project; for America, the continuing shipment of grain.

Western Europe and the United States should at least agree to a moratorium on recrimination. It would be better if both the pipeline and the grain shipments were cancelled. But in the absence of that sensible decision, it would be wiser if both sides agreed to shut up on the subject. Economic sanctions are in any case a highly dubious means for persuading a great power to do something it does not want to do. For America and Europe to quarrel about them is lunacy. Coupled with the pacifism and defeatism now rampant in West Germany and the low countries, it threatens to bring the alliance to ruin.

The West must try to make it clear to Russia that suppression of even the limited freedom the Poles were aiming for will make it harder in the long run for communism to overcome its backbreaking economic difficulties, vividly described in a despatch from Nigel Wade this morning. Unfortunately, as things are at present, Russia has no particular reason to think that she will not continue to get Western economic co-operation, while still pursuing a policy of brute force.

PAPANDREOU, KIPRIANOU DISCUSS CYPRUS ISSUE 25 JAN

[Text] The Greek-Cypriot talks opened in Athens today. At 1100 Cyprus President Kiprianou visited President Karamanlis and conferred with him for 45 minutes. Then Mr Kiprianou called on Prime Minister Papandreou and had talks for about 1 hour, and immediately afterward a conference was held with the participation of the Greek prime minister and Cypriot president.

After the conference, which lasted until 1430, the prime minister stated to journalists that there is an identity of views between the Greek and Cypriot sides on dealing with the whole issue and that there is also complete cooperation, just as had been established at his previous meeting with the Cypriot president.

Referring to the intercommunal dialogue, Mr Papandreou said there are no indications it is bearing fruit and stressed that Turkey is cultivating an artificial climate of tension aimed at making Greece suspend its activities in support of the Cyprus issue. At the same time, Mr Kiprianou endorsed the prime minister's views and said that during the conference they established the correctness of the line being followed by both sides on the Cyprus issue.

The talks will resume at 1100 tomorrow and conclude on Wednesday at the house of Cyprus Ambassador Khatzimiltis.

Papandreou, Kiprianou Statements

NC251914 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Excerpt] After the conference Prime Minister Papandreou stated the following: [Begin recording] As you see, today's meeting was a working session. We held the first meeting today and there will be another tomorrow. There will be yet another meeting on Wednesday.

First of all I am truly glad that once again our dear President of the Republic of Cyprus Kiprianou is in Athens together with Rolandhis, Ioannidhis and their advisers. This is a very significant phase in the Cyprus problem. As you know, for some time now negotiations have been held on the ideas, the evaluation, the report -- if you want -- of former UN Secretary General Waldheim. I would like to stress that with regard to the Cyprus Government's handling of this dialogue, there is no disagreement between the two governments. From the very first meeting I had with Kiprianou, when I had just taken over the responsibility of the government, we jointly charted a policy which contained, as one of its basic elements with regard to the development of the Cyprus problem, our participation in the discussion -- the dialogue -- on Waldheim's evaluation. This procedure is advancing, and we should say -- perhaps President Kiprianou is in a position to say this better than I -- that these negotiations or discussions do not seem to be producing results so far.

Of course Cyprus, provided these negotiations do not lead to some acceptable agreement, reserves the right to set in motion international procedures, just as the Greek Government for some time, and more strongly, has repositioned the Cyprus problem among the circles of our partners in NATO, the EEC and other governments.

I stress again that for us the Cyprus drama is not due to the fact that two communities cannot come to an understanding between themselves, an impression that has been deliberately circulated for years by the other side. For us the Cyprus issue is an issue of foreign occupation, occupation of an independent member of the United Nations, and the international community should understand that a solution of the Cyprus problem cannot exist without the termination of foreign occupation.

This does not mean that the two communities do not have problems which cannot be solved through a constructive dialogue. However, this distinction is very significant.

Finally, yesterday, or to be exact the day before yesterday, while I was in Crete, I made a statement I wish now to repeat: Cyprus is an independent member of the United Nations, and our struggle in Greece is to support this struggle of our brothers so that an independent, nonaligned, unitary Cyprus may come into existence, so that the refugees may return to their homes, so that free movement and settlement may exist. This struggle constitutes a national duty for us because, despite the fact that Cyprus is a different state from Greece, and I stress this so that there may be no misunderstanding, deliberate or otherwise, Cyprus is an extension of the nation, as are our so many compatriots living in Australia, Canada, the United States and Europe. This national duty is strengthened by the fact that we are also a guarantor power -- something we should never forget.

Our meeting today, a study of the course of the negotiations, and more generally of the Cyprus problem, was very productive, and a contribution was made to this not only by Kiprianou and me but by Rolandhis, Ioannidhis, Katopodhis, Papoulias and other members around the table.

Ending, I would like to stress that today more than ever a close brotherly dialogue exists between the governments of Cyprus and Greece on the coordination of our movements and the charting of a common course on an issue that is of immense significance not only for the Cypriots but also for Greeks and more generally for the area.

My dear president, I want to stress again that you are welcome, that we are glad and moved when we can exchange views with you and chart a course for some fair solution of the Cyprus problem at last.

I would like to add a postscript to what I have said: In the past days the Turkish side has created an atmosphere of tension in relations. I would like to stress that this is artificial and merely constitutes diplomatic maneuvers for the creation of an atmosphere which they hope will discourage Greece from the firm course it has charted. I would like to stress that at this moment in fact there is no crisis, no impending clash, and my friend President Kiprianou shares this viewpoint. I wanted to stress this because unfortunately our press too has created impressions with its large headlines, which do not reflect reality and which perhaps damage initiatives connected with the Cyprus problem. [end recording].

After the conclusion of the talks with Greek Prime Minister Papandreou, President Kiprianou stated the following:

[Begin recording] First of all I want to express my warm thanks to Prime Minister Papandreou for his kindness and hospitality, for his guaranteed support and great interest in the developments of the Cyprus problem and for his friendship, which is an honor for me.

Indeed we had a very useful discussion, and earlier during our private meeting and later at the conference we exchanged reports and evaluations. We ascertained that the course we had charted during our first meeting in Athens was the correct one and that the initiatives we had decided on were the correct ones and we are proceeding on the basis of that course. Of course I would like to agree with the prime minister that the outlook and the dialogue are not good in the sense that there has been no progress, and this is something that must be accepted; that there has been no progress. Nevertheless, as we agreed then and again today, we shall exhaust all necessary avenues to ascertain whether there is any possibility for achieving progress. Otherwise, as you have so correctly said, we shall resort to other initiatives and of course to the UN General Assembly, without precluding other international forums.

The fact is that regardless of difficulties, with the support of many friendly states and peoples of the world, but principally with the decisive Greek support, as prime minister and dear friend Papandreou has repeatedly declared, with this support and multilateral strengthening, which constitutes the mainstay of our struggle, the struggle for survival and vindication, I believe that sooner or later, through the correct maneuvers and the coordinated efforts we have established, through the close and coordinated effort and cooperation we have instituted, I believe we shall be able to bring this mission to an auspicious end, that is, the vindication of the Cypriot people and the restoration of the complete freedom of the independent Cyprus state.

The prime minister stressed correctly that any solution of the Cyprus problem without the withdrawal of the occupation forces is inconceivable. Our firm position is that the full demilitarization of Cyprus should be included in a package solution of the Cyprus problem, because a demilitarized, free, independent, federated but unitary Cyprus, a fully sovereign, territorially integral Cyprus, would mean not only the eradication of a permanent seedbed of friction and unrest directly affecting the people of Cyprus and relations between Greece and Turkey, notwithstanding the fact that the Cyprus problem is not a difference between Greece and Turkey, but would also affect the situation in this sensitive area. Consequently a solution under the prerequisites I have mentioned will be a contribution not only to the Cypriot people, not only to Hellenism, but also to the cause of international peace and security in this area. That is, when we struggle for Cyprus' vindication, in fact we are not only struggling for restoration of the trampled rights of the Cypriot people, but we are struggling for a substantive contribution to the cause of international detente and peace.

Just as the solution of the Cyprus problem is inconceivable without the withdrawal of the occupation forces, any divisive solution is inconceivable. Any solution is also inconceivable that would deprive the Cypriot people of their inalienable rights, among which are the right of the refugees to return to their ancestral homes, the right to free settlement, the right to own property and the right of movement and in general human rights and basic freedoms.

I believe our talks, as always, have been very useful. We shall complete them tomorrow and the next day because we have begun to enter into more detail concerning the initiatives we are already implementing and adopting and which are connected with the further promotion of the Cyprus cause and the briefing of foreign governments and international organizations. At the same time, in conjunction with the dialogue, which as I said earlier will continue until it has been ascertained beyond any doubt whether it will be possible to have progress, of course within a reasonable time limit, we shall continue the effort for internationalization of the Cyprus problem because we have many hopes on this point, because internationalization to the greatest possible extent in the ultimate analysis may contribute to opening the way for a change in the unacceptable Turkish stance on the Cyprus problem.

Mr President, my advisers, Rolandhis, Ioannidhis and all the others who came with me from Cyprus, would like to thank you again warmly for your strong interest in Cyprus, and indeed I am very happy with the talks I have had. I am absolutely satisfied and of course the next round of our talks will be held in Nicosia on 27 and 28 February and 1 March, where you are expected by all the Cypriot people. [end recording]

PASOK NOT FOLLOWING THROUGH ON ELECTION PROMISES

[Editorial: "Promises and Actions"]

[Text] PASOK's basic election slogan was "PASOK in the government and the people in authority." The government party proclaimed at all levels that its intention was not to govern through its deputies and "staff" groups alone, but to rely on active people's participation in local self-government, in trade unions and in all mass organizations. These declarations have been tested for a long time now, and the nonimplementation has caused questions to arise together with concern.

--The batches of government economic measures were approved by a closed circle of "specialists" and "trusted personalities" after continuous consultations with the Chamber of Industry, of which the workers and their organizations were informed via television. Perhaps these measures did satisfy the industrialists but they are incompatible with the workers' expressed desire for measures to strike at the privileges of the plutocrats. Even the preparation of the government's income policy was carried out without participation of the trade union movement -- without discussion and without the workers' proposals and views being heard.

--The government proceeded with the preparation of the bill dealing with the nomarchs and the nomarchy councils without taking opinions of local self-government into consideration.

--The government pushed the bill on public administration through without prior discussions with the civil servants democratic organizations. This bill -- positive in principle -- lacks the most important and most urgent measure for democratization: approval of a genuine participation by the civil servants themselves in the administration of the civil service, public corporations and organizations.

--While the government hastily proceeded with its economic measures, it made a 180-degree turn in its effort to calm the industrialists and, instead of proceeding with the socialization which it had promised prior to the election, it now shows absolutely no interest in protecting the basic trade union rights of factory workers. At a time when arbitrary dismissals of trade unionists from factories proceed unchecked, the government drags its feet in ratifying protective legislation. At the same time tactics of postponement and delay are employed in respect to the vast issue of democratization of the trade union movement and registering all and any associations within the Greek General Confederation of Labor, the GSEE. This is also accompanied by sideline scheming.

--There are more examples: The bill on commercial rentals was pushed through without participation of the interested parties; the bill on family law is being drafted without basic participation of womens organizations.

People's reactions to these government methods are increasing. It must also be stated clearly that the government views these reactions with deep suspicion. It becomes increasingly clear that in an effort to avoid pressure from the people the government turns more and more to the easy way of controling mass movements "from above," perhaps because it suffers from the delusion that such methods can control and keep these mass movements within "permissible" limits. The unacceptable logic with which a new GSEE administration was appointed tends to become the rule of the government's policy in similar instances.

Intentions are not enough to bring about change. It is acts that count. Change is being tested under the people's criteria every single day by every single government decision and measure.

Real change cannot acquire "flesh and bones" and it cannot effectively strike at the interests of large-scale capital without unreserved reliance on the mass movement, without the encouragement and strengthening of people's initiative, without reliance upon all the forces which support change, and it cannot bring about the essential radical changes in all sectors.

A policy of true change is incompatible with lack of courage, hesitation and an apologetic attitude toward the rightwing. It cannot be prepared in ministerial offices, within the state's bureaucracy, between the "advisers" and the "specialists" and under consultations and the pressure of the oligarchy.

Administration of the country in the name of the people but without the participation of the people will sooner or later lead to a dangerous course and in the end will only strengthen the rightwing. What is needed to bring about change is not simply the replacement of personalities based upon narrow party criteria. Initiative must primarily pass into the hands of the people.

Even the smallest measure of true democratization is a thousand times more fundamental for change than dozens of replacements of personalities at the top by "trusted ones." The people themselves, who want change, are not prepared to "entrust" it to certain personalities. They are determined to claim it, to defend it by taking the initiative in their own hands through their struggle and through their unity.

DANGER OF KKE CONTROL OF CIVIL SERVICE SEEN

NC241140 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 23 Jan 82 p 2

[From the "Laconic" column: "It Prepares the Way for It"]

[Text] The speech by the KKE representative in the Chamber of Deputies on the civil service bill shed ample light on an aspect of the issue which thus far has not drawn sufficient attention from the public. There was, in fact, reference to party control of the state apparatus by PASOK but no reference to such party control by the KKE. There is, however, a strong awareness of this danger which, although not immediate, is none the less much more serious than the danger presented by the unbridled party control of the administration by PASOK.

The KKE representative said his party will vote for the bill because, although it does not find it totally satisfactory, it is in fact what is needed to open the way for the "democratization" of the state and it permits not only PASOK but also the KKE to take over its apparatus. When the KKE speaks of "democratization," it means party control. It means no political liberties. Every sector becomes "democratic" to the degree that it is controlled by the KKE. While, however, party control of the state by PASOK could in the end lead to the establishment of a totalitarian regime, party control by the KKE also fosters the danger of making the country a satellite.

Naturally, we cannot yet know PASOK's intentions. It has expressed clear totalitarian tendencies. All that it says and does justify serious reservations about its democratic spirit. If, however, in the end it does respect the parliamentarian regime and loses authority in the next election, it will leave behind it a state apparatus which will be deeply infiltrated by the communist party. It already opens the gates wide for the KKE. How far this party will go and how it will use the state apparatus is only a matter of time and opportunities.

TURKMEN BRIEFS ASSEMBLY ON FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

TA251516 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1450 GMT 25 Jan 82

[ANATOLIA headline: "Turkmen: Greece Should Not Miscalculate Turkish Reaction to Fait Accompli in Aegean"]

[Text] Ankara, 25 Jan (AA) -- Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen told the Consultative Assembly he would advise Greece not to miscalculate or be misled by wishful thinking about Turkey's possible reaction to any fait accompli in the Aegean.

Armenian Propaganda

Addressing the assembly during a debate on his ministry's budget, Turkmen expressed his conviction that the disgusting aspect of Armenian propaganda was now realized by world public opinion. Answering comments by members of the recent trial in Aix-en-Provence, France, of Armenian terrorist Max Kilndjian for armed assault on Turkish Ambassador Dogan Turkmen in Geneva, Ilter Turkmen said although the judge and public prosecutor had acted impartially, the jury had been "under heavy political and psychological pressure" -- hence the jury's finding of Kilndjian as only an accomplice.

Greece

The foreign minister said certain indications were detected since Prime Minister Papandreou's coming into power in Greece about the attitude of the Greek Cypriot community toward intercommunal talks. "We observe an acceleration of Greek and Greek Cypriot efforts to internationalize the Cyprus issue," he commented.

Islands Should Be Demilitarized

The islands in the eastern Aegean had been given to Greece on condition that they remain demilitarized under the 1923 Lausanne and 1947 Paris peace treaties, Turkmen noted. Since the 1960's Greece had militarized the islands "in violation of treaties" and against Turkey's written and verbal protests. "We insist that Greece fulfill its treaty obligations by returning the islands to their demilitarized status," he said.

Council of Europe

His government tried its best to maintain relations with the Council of Europe, Turkmen said.

Of the various political groups in the council's parliamentary assembly, several were able to assess objectively developments in Turkey since September 1980, knew about the traditions of the Turkish military and believed that a multiparty parliamentarian democracy would be restored with the announced timetable.

Additional Details

TA251701 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Reviewing the current unfortunate state of Turkish-Greek relations, Turkmen said one should not start from a position that conflicts and tension between the two countries are inevitable. He continued: Turkey's attitude toward Greece has always been one of negotiations and conciliation. It is the same today. However, Greece unfortunately does not reciprocate in the same manner; especially, the actions of the Papandreou government have so far been unconciliatory, opportunistic and negative.

Noting that problems exist such as the demarcation of the Aegean continental shelf, the Aegean airspace, the demilitarization of the islands and minorities living in Turkey and Greece, Turkmen added that the fact that the Papandreou government has suspended the negotiations that had been going on since 1976 has aggravated these problems.

He said: The current Greek Government has initiated a policy of escalation of tension by suspending negotiations with Turkey. We are waiting patiently for the day when Greece will realize the benefits of these negotiations.

However, Greece is not content only with suspending the negotiations. It is making new and unfounded allegations aimed unilaterally at changing the status quo in the Aegean and enabling the whole of the Aegean airspace and the continental shelf to come under Greek sovereignty. On the other hand, there are indications that Greece is preparing faits accomplis in the Aegean. We advise Greece not to miscalculate Turkey's reaction to faits accomplis and not to have any illusions.

NEW LOAN AGREEMENT SIGNED WITH KUWAITI BANKS

TA251815 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] A [word indistinct] loan agreement for $70 million has been signed in Kuwait between Turkey and a consortium of Kuwaiti banks. The agreement was signed by the head of the Central Bank, Osman Siklar, on behalf of Turkey. According to the agreement, the consortium will extend the loan for a period of 6 months with a low interest rate. The loan will be used to import oil from Iraq. This is the cheapest loan Turkey has been able to obtain on international monetary markets since 1978.

KURDISH MILITANT KILLED, FIVE OTHERS ARRESTED

TA221720 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 22 Jan 82

[Statement by the press and public relations department of the 7th Corps and Diyarbakir, Urfa, Mardin, Siirt, Hakkari and Van Martial Law Command; date not given]

[Text] Suphi Sik, who was wanted by the security forces for a long time, has been killed and five other persons have been captured in a clash between six members of the secessionist Kurdish Democratic Party organization and the security forces. Acting on a tip, security forces raided the house belonging to the organization in Cizre District, Mardin, on 21 January. Sik was believed to have fled abroad. Weapons and ammunition belonging to the militants were seized during the operation. A legal investigation in connection with those captured is underway.

Death Sought for 18

TA221543 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1530 GMT 22 Jan 82

[Text] Ankara, 22 Jan (AA) -- The trial of 199 members of the secessionist organization "National Liberators of Kurdistan" is scheduled to start in Diyarbakir on Monday, January 25, at the martial law court. In addition to secessionism, the gang is charged with 33 murders, 23 armed assaults, and several cases of armed raid and robbery in four southeastern provinces.

The military prosecutor is demanding the death penalty for 18 of the defendants, who include 14 teachers, 22 students, 21 civil servants, 19 workers, 79 self-employed, and 44 unemployed.

TURKISH-U.S. DEFENSE COOPERATION TALKS BEGIN

TA261130 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] The third meeting of the Turkish-U.S. defense industry cooperation working group has begun in Ankara. The Turkish working group is headed by National Defense Deputy Under Secretary Lt Gen Dogan Kromors and the U.S. group is headed by U.S. Defense Under Secretary Michael Lorenzo. Implementation and further development of projects in the defense and economic cooperation agreement signed between Turkey and the United States in 1980 are being discussed. The issue of giving impetus to the cooperation between the two countries in the light of Turkey's economic needs is also being reviewed.

The meeting of the Turkish and U.S. working groups will last 2 days.

OUTLOOK FOR TURKISH-SOVIET TRADE SEEN PROMISING

NC261410 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 23 Jan 82 p 1

[Editorial by Mehmet Barlas: "Turkish-Soviet Trade"]

[Text] "The 1982 trade agreement" signed the other day in Ankara between Turkey and the Soviet Union is a true documentation on developing friendship between the two countries. This agreement, which was signed on behalf of the Soviet Union by the director general of the Foreign Trade Department, Kuznetsov, envisages the volume of trade between the two countries to reach $600 million. Even more important is the fact that this agreement views 1982 as a transition year and that as of 1983 Turkish-Soviet trade will be on a "free exchange" basis.

Let us not forget that only two countries are conducting trade with Turkey on a "clearing" basis. One of these countries is the Soviet Union and the other is Albania. Despite this exceptional situation, Turkish-Soviet foreign trade relations -- which are in their 23d term, held the important percentage of 5.7 in 1980 and 3.9 of our general exports in 1981. The decrease observed in our general exports for 1981 compared with 1980 is due to our general exports drive. But in examining the figures, it will be seen that there has been an increase of 40 percent in 1 year in Turkish-Soviet trade.

This increase echoes the need one country has for the other, and the fundamental sentiments of friendship that are developing between them without any signs of decline. True, statistics do not reflect what can happen but only what may have happened. However, Turkey is going to import $290 million worth of goods from the Soviet Union in 1982 and it will export $310 million worth. But let us not forget that "agreed trade" is accompanied by lengthy bureaucratic obstacles and limitations. When the "free exchange" system is adopted in 1983, these figures will definitely increase.

The agricultural industry investments, which have particularly been speeded up, will form the cornerstone of future Turkish-Soviet trade. The Turkish mining industry too will be a mainstay in bilateral trade. Such Soviet products as liquid fuel, chemical products and metal alloys are of vital importance to our development.

The ups and downs of international politics introduce alternate "tension" and "rapproachement" to interbloc relations. Amid all these changes, Turkish-Soviet relations have continued to develop -- particularly after 1960 -- in an atmosphere of mutual understanding. Turkey is a country that has proved that sincere friendship can be developed with its neighbor, the Soviet Union, without upsetting its own bloc. Believing that economic cooperation can effectively contribute to peace, we hope the 1982 Turkish-Soviet foreign trade agreement may be auspicious.

EUROPEAN COUNCIL READY TO WARN TURKEY ON RIGHTS

NC252037 Paris AFP in English 1946 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Strasbourg, eastern France, 25 Jan (AFP) -- A majority within the 21-nation Council of Europe is ready to issue a serious warning to Turkey and condemn human rights violations there, council Secretary-general Frank Karasek said here today.

Mr Karasek said the council assembly, which will vote Thursday on whether Turkey should stay in the council or be expelled, is in a "very difficult situation," and he hinted that the Council of Ministers has not yet reached a definite decision on the issue and awaits the result of the assembly debate.

The assembly meeting opened this afternoon as the Political Committee was sitting to work out a draft resolution on Turkey. A reliable source said the rough draft did not include any call for Turkey's expulsion.

But a parliamentary source said the draft might include a call for one or more member states to inform the Human Rights Commission, in conformity with Article 24 of the European Convention of Human Rights, that Turkey had violated its clauses. Denmark and Norway had already urged this.

A similar procedure was adopted toward Greece under the colonels' regime. Greece then withdrew from the council of its own accord.

Other European MP's, including Greek and Portuguese, favor a "hard line" and are demanding that Ankara allow a Red Cross delegation to visit Turkish prisons, the appointment of a committee of international experts in constitutional law which would be consulted over drafting a new Turkish constitution, and the despatch of a Council of Europe delegation of observers to supervise the referendum on the introduction of the new Turkish constitution, which must be submitted to popular vote.

Yesterday, 27 Turkishnationals began a hunger strike here to back a demand for Turkey's expulsion from the council. The hunger-strikers were protesting not only the Turkish junta but also "American imperialism."

PEREIRA: NO UNILATERAL SANCTIONS TO BE IMPOSED

LD260010 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2330 GMT 25 Jan 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Andre Goncalves Pereira stated in Brussels today that Portugal will not apply any sanctions against Poland and the USSR on its own but is likely to do so in concert with the other NATO countries.

Among likely measures, Goncalves Pereira gave as an example a reduction in the diplomatic staff at the Soviet Embassy in Lisbon. He added, however, that the recent expulsion of two Soviet diplomats was totally unconnected with the Polish situation and was solely the result of the specific conduct of the two diplomats.

UK FAVORS TURKEY'S EUROPEAN COUNCIL MEMBERSHIP

NC262107 Paris AFP in English 2035 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Strasbourg, France, 26 Jan (AFP) -- British Minister of State at the Foreign Office Douglas Hurd today said he favored the retention of Turkey in the European Council, thus coming out against a motion to expell it on the grounds of human rights violations.

Mr Hurd made the statement at the European Parliament here.

The European commission's Political Committee earlier today rejected the motion, but its sponsor, Helena Roseta of Portugal, said she would resubmit it on Thursday to the council assembly.

Mr Hurd said the British Government believed that Turkey's membership in the council was important for Europe and that democracy would be restored in Turkey more quickly and easily if it remained in the council.

At a press conference, he said it was unlikely that the commission, which Britain currently chairs, would vote to expel Turkey as long as it sticks to a timetable for the restoration of democracy announced December 30.

He also suggested that Britain was opposed to a proposal submitted by the Scandinavian countries and approved yesterday by the Political Committee urging the European Commission on Human Rights to investigate "whether allegations of torture and other human rights violations (in Turkey) are founded."

The resolution also called on the European Human Rights Commission to consider sending an International Red Cross delegation to visit Turkish prisons.

GREEK MINISTER AFFIRMS STAND ON POLISH ISSUE

NC262127 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 2100 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Greece today voted against three of the four paragraphs of the Belgian chairman's proposals concerning the community's trade policy toward Poland and the Soviet Union. In today's discussions in Brussels, Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos insisted on the positions the Greek Government supported in the past, because it believes that these measures would make relations between East and West difficult, create obstacles to detente and cause problems for the dialogue in Geneva.

KREISKY TO QUIT UNLESS FULLY RECOVERED BY APRIL

[Peter Gnam report on interview with Chancellor Kreisky in Vienna -- date not specified]

[Excerpts] Vienna -- The fact that in the past 3 months Chancellor Kreisky has been ill and compelled to stay home more often than ever before is worrying his party friends considerably. Now the government chief has again been "put under house arrest" by his doctor because of a virus flu. That is ample reason to pose the question: Can Kreisky carry on, or can't he? The chancellor himself answered this question for KRONEN-ZEITUNG. His most important statement: In April his doctors will decide whether he can carry on.

The fact that he has had to take sick leave so often lately is getting on the chancellor's nerves. Kreisky: "You know that up to the age of 70 I was relatively healthy. I was able to go skiing and to play tennis. That is now no longer possible." "Until April I will comply exactly with the instructions of my physicians and will see whether I get back on my feet. In April an extensive, complete medical bulletin will then be released which will give exact information about my state of health. Anyone can then judge for himself. As far as I myself am concerned, the criterion is that by then I must be fully fit to work again if I am to decide to carry on. I will not do things by halves -- then it would be better if someone else were to take my place."

What is the chancellor suffering from? At present -- according to himself -- a serious virus flu. All of last week he was treated with antibiotics to get the fever down. Kreisky: "You can imagine that I felt rather bad." Yesterday the chancellor intended to get along without antibiotics. His return to the chancellery will depend on how soon his temperature gets back to normal without medication.

Asked about his general state of health, Kreisky says that his blood pressure has not been in order for some time ("I have neglected that"). Consequently he now has kidney trouble. His heart, he says, is absolutely okay. The chancellor sums up: "I am now taking much better care of myself than in the past and am doing what the doctors tell me, until April, then we will see how things will go."

BISHOP CRITICIZES KREISKY FOR REMARKS ON POLAND

[Summary] While Archbishop Cardinal Koenig yesterday declared that he was waiting for a talk with the Austrian Socialist Party leadership about Chancellor Kreisky's recent critical remarks about the role of the church in Poland, the St. Poelten Bishop Zak has sharply attacked Chancellor Kreisky. Zak, who is known to be the most rightist among Austria's bishops and for that reason was appointed the army bishop, charges in the church controlled NIEDEROESTERREICHISCHE NACHRICHTEN that Kreisky had not made his critical remarks about the church by any means accidentally.

"It remained for the Austrian chancellor to criticize the Polish church in a way that is incomprehensible for me, and to stab the Polish people in the back in their difficult, vital struggle for human rights, for freedom and for peace," he says, and adds: "The church in Poland is the only force which has been waging this struggle under the most adverse conditions for years and especially at this time. The fact that the great majority of the Polish workers are religious and faithful to the church seems to be a thorn in the chancellor's flesh."

SCHMIDT DEFENDS 'MODERATION OF LANGUAGE'

LD261606 Hamburg DPA in German 1524 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn/Tutzing, 26 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has urged that the East-West dialogue be continued despite the Polish crisis. In a speech at the annual reception of the Tutzing Evangelical Academy today, the chancellor at the same time defended the Federal Government's policy of "moderation of language" on events in Poland against accusations of moral weakness or relinquishing principles.

According to Schmidt, the Federal Government's attitude, toward Poland, is "based on the conviction, substantiated by its own experience, that tensions cannot be removed without a will for dialogue and the ability to discuss." In view of East-West differences, however, tensions could escalate into threats to peace which jeopardize the Federal Republic's political freedom and the peoples' existence.

The alliances' ability and willingness to talk is also of outstanding value from a security policy point of view, Schmidt said, referring to the goal of disarmament. There can be no security against others, but only with others, the chancellor said, and reaffirmed his concept of security partnership which was criticized by the CDU/CSU. This security partnership should not have eyes only for the enemy on the other side but should also recognize one's fellow man. This could apply as a wholly Christian principle.

In its "critical attitude" toward the military dictatorship in Poland, the Federal Government proceeds according to the Helsinki Final Act, Schmidt said. Referring to this, he renewed the demands to the "military regime" in Warsaw and the leading power, the Soviet Union, for a release of political prisoners, the lifting of martial law and a resumption of dialogue with the independent trade union. It in no way signifies interference in Polish internal affairs, Schmidt stressed, if the Federal Government publicly raises its voice in support of adherence to the Helsinki Final Act.

FOREIGN MINISTRY OFFICIAL VIEWS POLICY STUDY

DW262135 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0617 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Reporter Margarethe Limberg telephone interview with Dr Peter Corterier, minister of state in the Foreign Ministry -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] In light of criticism of the government's Poland policy within the Western alliance, a study by the Foreign Ministry planning department, published by DER SPIEGEL in excerpts, recommends a revision of German foreign policy. Given the differences of opinion, the study says, one must not fail to see that the FRG's ostpolitik threatens to conflict with the alliance's policy. The Federal Government yesterday said that there would be no revision of its course. Is the study unimportant and irrelevant?

[Answer] No, I wouldn't go that far. But first of all you should consider the day when this study was written, on 8 January. It means it was written some weeks ago and obviously is based on the experience we had in the weeks between 13 December when martial law was imposed in Poland and 8 January, that is to say, a time span when our policy in part was not understood and appreciated properly by our allies and when we did have our problems. We have drawn our conclusions, but not on the basis of this study because this was something that has been generally realized in Bonn.

Meanwhile all the demands raised in the study have been implemented on the basis of the statements made in the past weeks in the Bundestag debates on the budget as well as on Poland a week earlier.

[Question] Does this mean that the course has been revised?

[Answer] There has been no revision of course, nor does the study demand a revision of course. It says above all that we must present our policy better. We must make things clear whenever there are misunderstandings and that's what we have done.

[Question] SPD Chairman Willy Brandt obviously is concerned that the Federal Government may not be able to continue its course of circumspection, if the return to reforms in Poland is blocked. Do you share his view and how do you assess the chances?

[Answer] What we will be doing in the coming weeks and months naturally will very much depend on developments in Poland. There is no doubt about that. Therefore we will have to study the results of General Jaruzelski's speech yesterday very closely. I think it is too early to say at this point what the direction will be, whether it will be a step in the right direction and whether martial law will really be mitigated or whether it is nothing but a cosmetic change. We will have to study this closely.

[Question] By rejecting a show of muscles and by exerting restraint above all with regard to sanctions the Federal Government at times appeared to have been isolated within the Western alliance. Over the wekend France concluded the Siberian gas deal with the Soviet Union, the deal of the century, as the French themselves say. Does this deal exonerate the Federal Republic within the alliance?

[Answer] This naturally is a very interesting fact. It shows that very often you have to differentiate between what is being said and what is being done. The French Government now is being criticized partly in the same words and confronted with the same reproaches as the Federal Government. This shows that in the last analysis identical conclusions are reached on the basis of differing positions and partly differing interests.

[Question] The U.S. secretary of state and the Soviet foreign minister will be meeting in Geneva today. Originally they wanted to agree on a date for the resumption of the SALT negotiations. Now it seems that there are hardly any prospects for this. Can we expect at all that the two will come to an understanding on the arms control issue?

[Answer] To begin with, it is important that the Geneva negotiations on medium-range weapons in Europe are continued despite the tough U.S. reaction to the Polish events. This is a very decisive point. I think that even though they will probably not agree today on a date for the resumption of the talks on strategic arms, we must insist on the resumption of these talks in the future because the point here is not that we do the Soviet Union a favor or reward it for something, but that we enforce our common interest in the prevention of a nuclear war and survival.

[Question] You said we do not intend to reward the Soviet Union. So we also do not intend to punish it by heating up the arms race?

[Answer] I don't think disarmament and arms control negotiations can be a means of reward or punishment. The point is that we implement our common interest in peace.

[Question] The SPD Executive board adopted a security policy resolution yesterday which is to be discussed at the Munich party congress. The decision on NATO's dual decision will be postponed to a special party congress in 1983. The SPD demands a moratorium on short-range missiles and the inclusion of the French and British medium-range missiles for the duration of the Geneva negotiations. What does this resolution by the Executive board mean for the security policy discussion within the SPD?

[Answer] I think this resolution is of extraordinary importance because it was prepared through many weeks of work by a committee composed of representatives of the various trends within the party as well as experts. I think it is a good compromise between the various existing views, but it is clear. It is based on the dual decision. It backs the negotiations that are being held in Geneva at present. The issue of short-range missiles you mentioned is a very important problem because we must prevent a new race in short-range missiles while medium-range missiles are discussed in Geneva. The issue of the French and British systems has been broached quite generally. The resolution does not say in what negotiations they must be included. It only says that they must be considered in the balance between the East and West. I think this resolution is a good contribution to the security policy discussion in our country. I hope a large majority of the Munich party congress will also make it its own.

[Question] In your view, is it also apt to close the gap between the Federal Government, the federal chancellor and sections of the party?

[Answer] I think that the party, at least the majority of the party, will move together on the basis of this resolution.

BAVARIAN BANKER SUPPORTS SIBERIAN GAS DEAL

DW270939 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 27 Jan 82 p 4

[Text] Munich (SZ) -- The German banks do not intend to allow the failure of the natural gas deal concluded with the Soviet Union in the fall of 1981. Viewed from the banking angle, the deal is practicable and profitable, Ludwig Huber, president of the Bavarian Land Bank, said in a speech to the Munich club of the economic press. The Bavarian Land Bank, the largest institute of the savings banks with a 50-percent participation of the State of Bavaria, has assumed a 10 percent share in the consortium of banks. "This contract will not be called off by the banks," Huber said. The only way this would happen would be a refusal of the Federal Government to guarantee the deal through Hermes Insurance. However, this would be a political decision. Huber did not agree with the statements by Bavarian Minister-President Franz Josef Strauss against the natural gas/pipe deal. As for talks on an additional advance financing credit in the amoung of DM300 million, Huber declared: "We will not be a party to that."

HAIG-GROMYKO MEETING: A RETURN TO LINKAGE?

[Text] Although it is not yet known what Haig and Gromyko discussed in Geneva, Poland seems to have been one of the topics because otherwise the dialogue would not have lasted so long after the obstinate statements made in advance by the two gentlemen. Still, not much can be expected from the meeting. The tense relationship between the superpowers cannot but have repercussions on the negotiations on the medium-range missiles in Europe and on the envisaged talks on strategic nuclear weapons. It was only with hesitation anyway that the United States agreed to a resumption of the SALT negotiations. Haig has now hinted that he plans to postpone the date scheduled for March. Thus what Washington has done is to have made at least a partial turnaround. It seems that Washington plans to resume the policy of linkage after all -- the policy of tying negotiations to Soviet good behavior.

However, if Haig -- out of irritation over Soviet pressure on Poland -- plans to shelve the SALT negotiations, we cannot but fear that this attitude will have an impact on the Geneva medium-range negotiations in the event no end to martial law in Poland is in sight and tensions increase. It would be part of the logic of linkage but also part of the domestic pressure to which Reagan is subjected. What has kept him and Haig from calling off the Geneva negotiations so far probably is the repercussions for the Atlantic alliance which must be feared in that case.

It was the President's advocacy of the "zero option" which patched up the alliance.

The effects of a cancellation of the Geneva negotiations are illustrated by the SPD guideline motion concerning security policy [for the forthcoming party congress]. Despite "setbacks" the SPD plans to adhere to the "security partnership" with Moscow and to refuse to accept any "automatic" deployment of new nuclear weapons. In the event the negotiations are cancelled, the gap between the SPD's concepts and those of Washington may well become unbridgeable.

EEC FOREIGN MINISTERS CONFERENCE 'EMBARRASSING'

[Commentary signed STD.: "Just Embarrassing"]

[Text] Brussels, 26 January -- The Europeans are about to make themselves look ridiculous. Measures have been discussed for weeks by NATO and the European Community which are supposed to demonstrate to the Soviet Government and the Polish military regime that their action in Poland is condemned. The United States is pressing for economic sanctions. On 11 January NATO agreed that every member country will take the proper measures. However, what are the European Community's foreign ministers discussing during their 2-day talks in Brussels? You won't believe your ears: Export credit rates are supposed to be increased by half a percentage point for the Soviet Union, but naturally only if 14 additional countries cooperate -- and the French did not want to agree to even that immediately. France, which was the first in Europe to loudly condemn suppression in Poland, is suddenly not prepared to accept any disturbances in its business. Since the idea of not buying caviar, champagne, furs and diamonds from the Soviet Union as before seems to be a grave measure, it must first be examined carefully. This is just embarrassing.

MAUROY DISAGREES WITH U.S. ON POLISH SANCTIONS

[Text] Hamburg, 26 Jan (DPA) -- Premier Pierre Mauroy has disputed the United States' right to demand that the Europeans impose sanctions against the USSR and Poland without being prepared to make comparable sacrifices itself. "The United States has no right to demand sanctions from the Europeans which would place severe economic and social burdens upon us as long as they are not prepared to make similar sacrifices themselves," said the government leader in an interview with STERN magazine.

Mauroy went on to say that the policy of sanctions has, as history shows, always achieved dubious results. As far as Poland is concerned, France will fulfill its existing commitments but sign no new agreements with Warsaw as long as the Polish people are being suppressed. Before new negotiations with the Polish Government take place, martial law will have to be lifted.

The French premier stressed that it is completely normal for France and the Federal Republic to not always agree on the Polish issue. "On occasion, different areas of sensitivity" exist in the same way as the historical relations of our two countries with Poland have differed. The French press has perhaps not sufficiently taken into consideration the fact that the difficult, sometimes dramatic relationship between Germany and Poland forced the Federal Government to exercise a particularly high degree of restraint."

CHEYSSON: SIBERIAN GAS DEAL UNRELATED TO POLAND

LD261524 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Commenting on the subject of Siberian gas, External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson has said in Brussels that he disagrees with those who feel that France should not have signed the agreement because of the events in Poland.

[Begin Cheysson recording] I am deeply disappointed with this kind of reasoning. What is happening in Poland is dreadful; we have said this in many ways. Human rights are being trampled underfoot, the Helsinki acts no longer exist for Poland, and a people for whom we have very deep sympathy are suffering. But this has no connection with the fact that we need gas. Should the dramatic events in Poland result in the French people being deprived of gas, becoming more dependent on oil than ever and abandoning all diversification? We do not think so. [end recording]

SOURCES CLOSE TO MITTERRAND DEFEND GAS DEAL

[By Jean-Michel Caroit]

[Text] Paris, 26 Jan (AFP) -- The giant Franco-Soviet gas deal for the delivery of Siberian natural gas gives France an excellent lever to pressure Moscow, sources close to President Francois Mitterrand said here today. Reacting vigorously to scathing domestic and United States criticism of the deal, the sources said France would suspend the contract along with all other Soviet deals if Moscow were to intervene directly in Poland. They said France and West Germany had both indicated their clear opposition to economic sanctions against the Soviet Union as long as it withheld from direct intervention in Poland.

The sources said France had to "liberate" itself from high energy costs caused by the link between oil and the dollar if it was ever to achieve energy independence.

Prices in the gas contract -- for the delivery of 8,000 million cubic metres of gas each year for 25 years from 1984 -- are calculated in French francs, and are therefore not affected by fluctuations in the dollar.

Continuing to justify the gas deal, the sources said France had already done all it could to provide nuclear and coal alternatives to oil as an energy source. They said the gas deal was the only remaining alternative to an increasing dependence upon Middle East oil, which already constituted 80 percent of the country's oil consumption.

Replying to one of the main U.S. criticisms, the sources said France would be no more dependent on the Soviet Union for its energy in 1990 than it was now. They added that France's own underground stocks of reserve fuel would protect it from ever becoming over-dependent on the five percent of the national energy demand to be satisfied by Soviet gas. Sources close to the government are astonished at the indignation expressed on the gas deal by the United States, which, they are quick to note, did not impose a grain embargo on the Soviets as a result of the Polish crisis. The sources added that U.S.-Soviet trade links increased spectacularly last year, and that the United States was due to supply the Soviets with between 18 and 23 million tons of grain this year. They said that Paris had imposed strict limits on exports to the Soviet Union since June last year, and that France's military effort was the greatest among all the Western allies of the United States.

LE MONDE ANALYZES WEST GERMAN 'REALISM'

[Claire Trean dispatch]

[Text] Bonn -- "So you have come to interrogate us about reunification?" The reception at the SPD headquarters was bantering and the irony hardly concealed acute irritation with the French, their anti-German feelings and their readiness to either see old demons reappear or imagine new ones as soon as the FRG adopts a tone different from theirs. Yesterday, they saw a desire for power, vestiges of nazism, reappear whereas today they denounce the weakness, the neutralist temptation and the "leftist nationalism" of a country which was a lackey of U.S. imperialism and has now become the weak link in Atlantic defense.

It is true that the West Germans found it rather difficult to swallow the "we are struck with dismay" statement made from behind the Iron Curtain on 13 December by a chancellor who thus associated in unprecedented harmony the "dismay" of the East German party boss Honecker with his own. However, with a few exceptions, they lined up like one man behind the official "prudence" with respect to the Polish events, and they did not find it too surprising that the chancellor had to pay a visit to Washington before he agreed that the USSR was maybe not completely unconnected with the Warsaw coup. The crisis in the SPD and the disagreements on foreign policy within the coalition have been forgotten.

It took the Christian Democratic opposition some time to realize, with the assistance of foreign reaction, how it could benefit from the Federal Government's excessive caution. "It is the first time," CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl stated when engaging in a real review of the French press in the Bundestag, "that such criticisms have been directed at the FRG. You have squandered the fund of confidence which we have patiently built up."

But the chancellor's attitude, which has been consistent with West German logic, has shocked domestic opinion much less. The reactions which it has aroused abroad (especially in France) -- allusions to the German-Soviet pact and never-ceasing lucubrations over reunification have been much more critical.

As for Willy Brandt, he believes that the French have found the opportunity for which they were waiting so as to strike at their neighbors' backs and that they are seeking to resolve their domestic political problems by using Poland as a pretext. Some other people -- Daniel Cohn-Bendit, for instance -- have attacked the "facile and hypocritical nature" of certain French intellectuals "who changed their procommunist attitude only a few years ago and who demand sanctions while fully realizing that this will not prevent the USSR from invading Poland if it finds it necessary and that no one is prepared to die for Danzig, as they say." He has also attacked the cowardice of those who weep over Warsaw "but who do not even dare to denounce a government agreement with the communists which, morally, has been concluded at the Polish people's exprense."

They all believe that there is something more than lack of understanding in the French attitude toward the FRG -- an underlying notion that an Atlanticist and docile Germany gives French policy more freedom of movement. Mention has been made of General de Gaulle who took liberties with NATO at a time when the FRG was its strongest pillar and France is suspected of merely seeking to preserve the German buffer zone and the U.S. guarantees with respect to Europe's defense.

Indifference

Does the view that making a pretext of the Polish crisis for ending detente would be a mistake for the FRG and all of Europe really mean that the FRG is indifferent to Poland's fate and that it is sliding toward neutralism or isolationism? As far as indifference is concerned, it is being recalled that so far the main part of the material aid to the Polish population has come from West Germany.

"What is now happening in Warsaw," Mr Thomas Miro, a close aide to Mr Willy Brandt, states, "is as clear to us as to you. The only question is: What can we do?" Impose sanctions? It is emphasized here that the French attitude is essentially not different from that of Germany. To those who have seen some inconsistency between the attitude of the minister of foreign affairs, who subscribed to a joint NATO communique last week, and Willy Brandt's statements on the same day that sanctions are out of the question, SPD Manager Glotz replies that the Atlantic alliance has merely envisaged the "study" of possible sanctions and that the United States has taken care not to act in two spheres which could have an inpact on the USSR -- a grain embargo and the disarmament talks in Geneva. This has greatly pleased Chancellor Schmidt since what is at stake is both peace within his own party and matters of much greater importance for the FRG.

As for the celebrated agreement on gas supplies from the USSR to Europe, of which the FRG is the main Western signatory, efforts are being made at the Ministry of Economic Affairs to play down its political significance. "At present Soviet gas represents 17 percent of our consumption but only 5 percent of the total of our energy requirements. In 1986-1987 its supplies will have doubled but they will still represent only 6 percent of that total. Furthermore, we have considered possibilities of substitution and requested all enterprises concerned to ensure that they have the necessary technological capacities for reconversion in the event of the agreement being broken. If there is any dependence it is on the side of the USSR which needs foreign exchange and not on ours."

The Bonn government circles cite realism as justification for both their attitude toward sanctions and the prudent working -- to say the least -- of their statements with respect to the Warsaw coup, a realism based on experience no other Western country has had, that of partition and relations with the GDR. Those who have engaged in "bogus heroism and high-sounding phrases" (to quote Willy Brandt) are reminded of the early morning of 13 August 1961 when Berlin woke up divided into two by a wall "without the allies lifting a little finger since war was the only alternative. This the reality of Europe."

"What is the most effective way of helping the Poles," Mr Glotz asks, "maintaining contact with their rulers and seeking to influence them or playing the card of the aggravation of the East-West tension, which would immediately affect Poland's domestic situation?

"You do not make policy with sympathy." And he expressed his satisfaction with the fact that the FRG has remained the privileged interlocutor of Eastern countries.

Preserving Detente

Nonetheless Bonn does not want to isolate itself from its allies, nor does it rule out the possibility that it could adopt a tougher stance "if the situation were to deteriorate." Many people in various ministries and the organizations of the parties forming the coalition assert that they "remain optimistic" or are not "completely pessimistic" as to the development of the situation. Some of them say this without conviction, seeking to justify their initial interpretation of the military intervention, while some others say it because they would, in fact, feel satisfied -- deeming it a lesser evil -- with a bogus resumption of the reform process in Poland and the rehabilitation of a "nonpolitical" trade unionism once martial law is lifted and the internees released. One of the principles of German policy, Mr Glotz says, is to "help reformist groups in Eastern countries to conquer an area of greater freedom without risking any sudden halt as it happened in Czechoslovakia." This is the "German realism" which thus cooly determines Solidarity's fate. And this is one of the main reasons for passiveness, especially on the part of trade unions, with respect to events in Poland. The West Germans know -- and they have paid a high price to learn it -- that you do not trifle with Muscovite totalitarianism and they believe that Solidarity went too far.

Does this mean that the policy of detente which is defended in Bonn and which no one, even on the right, dares to repudiate, is tantamount to a status quo policy as far as the Eastern countries are concerned? "If you study recent developments in those countries," Mr Brandt's aide replies, "you will notice everywhere, with the possible exception of Czechoslovakia, some progress, even though only modest, toward more pluralism. For instance, committees for defending the Helsinki accords have been set up nearly everywhere. The policy of detente has played some role in this. Furthermore, things did not happen in the same way in Warsaw in 1981 as they did in Prague in 1968 or in Budapest in 1956. A peace policy presupposes a certain stability of the partners. For the past 35 years we have had to deal with the USSR which is both a military power respected by all, including the United States, and a dictatorship. This is a dilemma and I personally cannot see how you can extricate yourself from it."

It is the policy of detente, it is being emphasized here, that has made it possible to start negotiations on arms control. And it is also detente which has enabled the FRG to secure bit by bit some humanitarian advantages for the East Germans and to open up a little the border between it and the GDR which no one any longer expects to cease being a border at any time in the future.

So far FRG policy toward the GDR has been governed by a humility and pragmatism which are poles apart from the philosophical and nationalist designs which have frequently been attributed to it, especially in France. And you have to talk to Willy Brandt's entourage to make anyone finally condescend to disengage from a pragmatism which has been turned into a rule and for anyone to reply to questions concerning the long-term objective of inter-German relations even though they merely assert that there is none and that none is desired -- "any clear concept would be too rigid," Mr Miro stated. "No one knows what the future holds for the two Germanies because no one knows what future awaits Europe. It is impossible to imagine inter-German relations on their own because it is obvious that they will never develop much further than the general East-West relations." The West Germans are not in the process of withdrawing from a military alliance. They are letting it be known that Europe intends to manage its own affairs more independently. Everybody to his own methods.

CHEYSSON CRITICIZES U.S. MIDEAST POLICY

NC241728 Beirut Domestic Service in Arabic 1630 GMT 24 Jan 82

[Text] French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson has stated that he cannot understand the U.S. position which rejects negotiations with the PLO as long as it does not recognize Israel.

In an interview with MONDAY MORNING, Cheysson said that the organization is not a state and thus it cannot recognize a state, whether this state is Israel, France or the United States. Cheysson pointed out that the PLO's securing of the right to establish a state through negotiations will produce automatic recognition, because it is impossible to sign an agreement with a state without recognizing it.

The French minister said that his country did not support the resolution of the Arab group, which called for sanctions against Israel because of its decision to annex the Golan Heights. According to the provisions of the UN Charter, the imposition of sanctions is limited to cases of threats to world peace only, and this condition did not exist in this case.

Regarding the situation in the Middle East, Cheysson said that the Camp David agreements will exhaust themselves in April, and then these agreements will have to be supplemented by a new peace formula. Cheysson promised that in case a new regional initiative is announced, France and Europe will support it to the point of taking risks in order to carry it out.

KING HASSAN COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH OFFICIALS

[Text] Paris, 26 Jan (AFP) -- French President Francois Mitterrand's proposed visit to Israel in March will "greatly aid the Arab cause," Moroccan King Hassan II said here today after a one-hour meeting with Mr Mitterrand. King Hassan said he expected the French leader to tell Israel "with the frankness for which he is known, that you cannot continually defy justice and equity."

The king said there were no problems between Morocco and France, and that he expected cooperation between the two countries to "develop and improve." There had been speculation that France's Socialist president might raise the issue of human rights in Morocco, but King Hassan said the meeting that he and Mr Mitterrand had not discussed the case of Moroccan opposition leader Abderrahman Bouabid, who has been in detention since September.

(The French Socialist Party publicly criticised the Moroccan Government after last year's anti-government riots in Casablanca, which led to widespread arrests of trade union officials and opposition figures.)

(As the two leaders held their meeting in the Elysee presidential palace, a group of about 100 demonstrators held a silent protest nearby. The protest, organised by the Committee Against Repression in Morocco, was held back by a strong police cordon.)

Observers said the Moroccan monarch seemed afterwards to be deliberately trying to dispell reports of disagreements between Paris and Rabat in the wake of last year's change of French Government. They noted that the king was at pains to stress his close personal ties with the French head of state. He said the two of them had "searched with a microscope for the slightest problem (in bilateral relations), but we found nothing." The question of the Western Sahara, the former Spanish colony where Moroccan troops are fighting the Polisario Nationalist Movement for control, would be discussed at a dinner the two leaders were having tonight, King Hassan said.

SAUDI AMBASSADOR SATISFIED WITH MITTERRAND TALK

NC262024 Paris AFP in English 1933 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Paris, 26 Jan (AFP) -- Saudi Ambassador to Paris Jamil al-Hajaylan, who met today with President Francois Mitterrand, termed "short-lived but regrettable" a recent statement by presidential advisor Jacques Attali criticizing the judicial system of some Arab states. "I am firmly convinced that bilateral relations between France and Saudi Arabia are too solid to allow a short-lived but regrettable incident to interfere in these relations," Mr al-Hajaylan said on leaving the Elysee.

When questioned on the morality of French purchases of Soviet gas in a recent radio interview, Mr Atalli demanded whether France should be any more dependent on countries "where a robber has his hand cut off." Half of France's petroleum is currently supplied by Saudi Arabia. The Arab-language newspaper AL-MUSTAQBAL, published in Paris, said Mr al-Hajaylan protested the remark to the Elysee. It said the Saudi ambassador had met with a presidential aide to inquire if Mr Attali's remarks reflected the official French position.

AMBASSADOR TO PAKISTAN NAMED -- Paris, 21 Jan (AFP) -- Jean Gory, a diplomat formerly posted in Peking, Washington and Bombay, has been named France's new ambassador to Pakistan, the Foreign Ministry announced today. Mr Gory, who replaces Paul Antoine Henry in Islamabad, served in Peking in 1964, in Washington from 1966 to 1969, Tokyo from 1972 to 1976 and Bombay from 1976 to 1978. POLICE DENY RANSOM DEMANDED IN DOZIER KIDNAPPING [Text] Rome, 26 Jan (ANSA) -- A report of a ten million dollar ransom demanded by Italy's Red Brigades for the release of U.S. Brigadier General James Lee Dozier was described here today as "a colossal piece of nonsense" by one of the police officials in charge of the case, sentiments shared by American investigators in Verona. The general, who is the second in command of NATO ground forces southern Europe, was kidnapped from his home in the northern Italian city on December 17 and the report that his terrorist captors were demanding a huge ransom originated today in (? Geneva).

AU261944 Rome ANSA in English 1925 GMT 26 Jan 82

After denying any possible validity for the ransom report, the police spokesman in Rome referred to brigade communique Number Five found yesterday in a trash-can in the capital and said that the time the case will be brought to a close now appears more distant. He said that a number of lines in the document, turned up also (?in) Milan and Padua along with a photograph of the general with a long, unkempt beard, indicated that there is a degree of confusion within the terrorist ranks. Investigators are of the opinion, the spokesman said, that General Dozier is either not talking to his terrorist captors or telling them things of no significance for the "propaganda warfare" they are conducting.

The time the officer might be released could be later than expected because of the statement in the communique that, "the revolution has nothing to do with the bourgeoisie and capitalism," the police spokesman said. Other sections of the document insisted on "taking Italy out of NATO" and "taking the missiles out of Comiso," a reference to the plan to deploy American-made intermediate range nuclear missiles in Sicily at the end of 1983 or in early 1984.

Another communique found today in Naples, issued by a so-called "Red Flag Revolutionary Movement," apparently affiliated with the brigades, argued in favor of the "violent removal of the Italian link from the Atlantic alliance" and, after [words indistinct] the armed struggle of the "proletariat against the bourgeois capitalist state," affirmed that the Dozier case is connected to "the struggle to pry Italy out of NATO."

In another section of the document, "Red Flag" confirmed the opinions held by many Italian magistrates and police officials on links between Italian terrorism and European "revolutionary" movements. "To push forward the (anti-NATO) battle," the communique said, "it will be necessary [words indistinct] get away from the perspective of nationalism and resume on a new foundation of cooperation with all European revolutionary forces, and world forces."

PCI, SOCIALIST OFFICIALS ACT ON PRAVDA ARTICLE

[Text] Rome, 27 Jan (ANSA) -- The grave split which has exploded over the Polish crisis between the Soviet and Italian communist parties in an article carried by PRAVDA on Sunday and an immediate reply from L'UNITA, the Italian Communist Party daily, continues to form the central topic on the Italian political scene. Interest in possible repercussions on the international communist movement are now giving way to more domestic concerns such as the effects which the dispute may have on relations between the Italian parties, and even the fate of Premier Giovanni Spadolini's present government.

Even if using extremely cautious tones, the Communist Party has been quick to make its views known, entrusting the task to the chief editor of the party's ideological weekly, RINASCITA. Chief editor Luciano Barca, in outlining the party's thinking on the relationship between ideology and political action, chose the forum of an interview granted yesterday to the Liberal Party's weekly.

The Liberals are one of the five parties in Spadolini's ruling five-party coalition. The other four parties are the Christian Democrats, the Socialists, the Social Democrats, and Spadolini's own Republicans.

The nub of Barca's argument was that, throughout its history, the Italian Communist Party has always proven itself to be a "non-confessional party" which asks its members to support a "given program of renewal and transformation in society, apart from their backing for Marxism-Leninism...." According to some observers, one singular aspect of the interview was that Barca used the same arguments, and almost same words, as those with which a group of communist intellectuals polemicised with then party Secretary Palmiro Togliatti immediately after World War II, saying they would not "play the pies [as received] for the revolution."

The author, Elio Vittorini, who was leader of the group, was expelled from the party, but Barca's remarks go much beyond this rather bland expression of dissent. He said that the "Soviet model is not exportable," even that "it no longer works." The Italian Communists do not seek their reference-points "externally," he said, adding that rather they look "into our society, to the forces that are developing" there.

The Socialists too, in a letter sent to party Secretary Bettino Craxi by two leading figures in the party leadership, Antonio Landolif and Giacomo Mancini, are seeking to draw conclusions from the crisis between the Italian and Soviet communists. "The new attitudes of the Italian Communist Party," the two M.P.'s said, "cannot be considered as extraneous to Italian political reality, and it would therefore be a grave political mistake to think that developments in the political struggle are closed and circumscribed" within the present government coalition. The Communists are the major opposition party, ranking a short head behind the Christian Democrats in Parliament. The Socialists are the third party and the other major force of the Italian left.

According to the letter, faced by an event of such importance, the Socialist Party cannot continue with the "attitude of reticence, indifference, diversionary tactics or even distaste, which has been evident in its stance to date." According to the two M.P.'s, the situation should be faced "with determination and commitment" because it involves "facts from which there may be born a real turning-point in the life of the country and in the progress of the workers' movement.

Press Comments Further

[Text] Rome, 26 Jan (ANSA) -- The split between the Soviet Communist Party and Italy's Communists, signalled by the editorial published Sunday by the Soviet party newspaper, PRAVDA, and the Italian party's response appearing in today's edition of L'UNITA, the PCI organ, kept the headlines in the nation's dailies today.

LA REPUBBLICA of Rome headed editorial comment on the development, "Berlinguer Against Moscow," in reference to the Italian party secretary, Enrico Berlinguer. The right of center Milan paper, IL GIORNALE NUOVO, declared in its headline, "The PCI Rejects the Brand of Heresy." More pointedly, the Turin daily LA STAMPA said, "Prompt PCI Response to the Soviet Union: You Have Been Wrong for 25 Years" and CORRIERE DELLA SERA of Milan headed comment, "The PCI Rejects Moscow's Accusations."

According to LA REPUBBLICA, the process begun with the PRAVDA editorial and the Italian party response, a reiteration of the PCI's criticisms against the situation in Eastern Europe and a harshly worded attack on the way the Soviet article was expressed, "is irreversible." IL GIORNO, a Milan journal, told readers that, the PCI has erased sixty years of history" and IL MESSAGGERO, the mass circulation Rome paper, affirmed that, "The direction being taken by the Italian party is probably towards the opening of a new historic phase."

Most of the analysis in today's papers centers on the conduct of the Italian party, the largest Marxist alignment in the West, rather than on the Soviet side of the debate. "With the response to the PRAVDA attacks appearing on the pages of L'UNITA today," LA STAMPA editorialized, "the ties between the PCI and the Soviet party, already strained, are near the breaking point. The Italian Communists' official document is a tough one and contains subtle streaks of sarcasm as regards global policy conducted over the past 25 years by the Soviet Union."

According to LA REPUBBLICA, "The PCI response leaves no room for doubt on the fact that a break took place some time back. The exchange of accusations during the last 48 hours is nothing other than a formal report for world public opinion and the international communist movement," the Rome daily affirmed. "After the schism between the Soviets and Tito and Mao, we are now beginning the third act of a diaspora which has become unstoppable. The biggest party in the West is now an autonomous force," REPUBBLICA concluded, "without ties to the international lineup which still recognizes Moscow's leadership."

IL MESSAGGERO, after noting that a "new historical phase" is apparently opening for the Italian Communist Party, said it would be wrong at this time to demand of Berlinguer "new acts of loyalty." "It would be much more useful," the Rome paper continued, "to see inside the party and in dealings outside it the sort of conduct which is consistent with the acceptance of democracy in its highest and richest meaning."

IL GIORNO told its readers that, "Between the two brother parties, the Soviet party has never gone so far and, especially, has never made a distinction between a party and its leadership. "We can say, overall, that the PCI has not been excommunicated by Moscow but its leadership has," the Milan paper said. IL GIORNALE NUOVO took the view that, "The identity of a communist party does not disappear in function of its relations with Moscow. "This identity," the conservative paper added, "if it is to be credible and acceptable, must come from within the alignment. It is not on only the outside that the PCI must break the ties which have bound it to Moscow since 1921."

DETAILS OF POPE'S TRIP TO AFRICA RELEASED

[Text] Vatican City, 26 Jan (ANSA) -- During the Africa trip Pope Paul II will take from February 12 to 19, he will visit four states and 9 cities and cover a total of 14,300 kilometers, the Vatican press office reported today. The pontiff will go to Nigeria, stopping off in Lagos, Enugu, Onitsha, Kaduna and Ibada; to Benin with a stop in Cotonou; to Gabon Libreville and to Equatorial Guinea (Malabo) and Bata. He will meet with heads of state, the diplomatic corps, bishops, priests, member of religious orders, seminarians, laymen, workers, students, the elderly, the ill, and with Islamic authorities in these countries.

In Nigeria the pope will also meet with the Polish community there and with foreign workers. The papal plane will leave here for Lagos on Friday, February 12 around 1000 GMT and is expected to arrive in the Nigerian capital five hours later. His return to Rome is set for the evening of Friday, February 19. This will be the pope's tenth trip outside of Italy and the first since the attack on his life on May 13 of last year.

CALVO-SOTELO, SPOE LEADER DISCUSS POLICIES

PM251131 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 13 Jan 82 p 11

[Text] The government's possible failure to implement the autonomy pacts signed 31 July last between the government and the Spanish Socialist Workers Party (PSOE) was the central reason for the meeting held for over 3 hours at the Moncloa Palace by Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo and PSOE Secretary General Felipe Gonzalez yesterday. The two leaders exchanged information on their respective visits, to Brussels and the United Kingdom on the part of the prime minister, and to the countries of Central America and the United States in the case of PSOE leader Felipe Gonzalez.

They also examined the need for cooperation in municipal policy, the legislative timetable and the general situation in the country, according to what the socialist leader told journalists.

In the morning, Calvo-Sotelo received Deputy Premier and former Minister of Territorial Administration Martin Villa and Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca. The holding of the Andalusian election was apparently broached at these meetings. The date of this autonomy election was also discussed at the meeting with Felipe Gonzalez. The most likely dates remain 23 May or 6 June.

In the opposition leader's opinion, the principal "anxieties" in the autonomy issue, a matter into which "we did not go thoroughly," according to him, center on failure to implement the pacts -- "the most glaring is the Statute of Valencia, whose text does not respect the agreements" -- and the role of the Provincial Councils and the possibility of their being able to transfer powers to the autonomous communities. Calvo-Sotelo and the socialist leader agreed to appoint a committee which will review the government's conduct in relation to the pacts signed last July, and especially in the case of the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process.

When asked whether he deems the Basque and Catalonian governments' participation in this new autonomy stage to be necessary, Felipe Gonzalez denied that it was really new. "We only wished to see whether there were failures to implement what was agreed; we believe that there were, and Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo says that there were not. I have already said that I did not conclude the agreements with an exclusive intention."

As for the need for cooperation in municipal policy, the PSOE secretary general referred to the budget debate, in which the financing of transportation, for instance, did not figure, "and if there is no budgetary allocation, the municipalities can hardly be given money afterward." With respect to the legislative timetable, Felipe Gonzalez referred to the establishment of priorities, such as the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process, the university autonomy bill and the local government bill. He also said that he regards the situation in the country as better than a few weeks ago.

GIBRALTAR WORKING GROUPS FORMED WITH BRITAIN

[Text] The government has set up two working groups to examine what action the administration is to take on Gibraltar in view of the forthcoming reopening of the border and the resumption of negotiations between Spain and Britian. The group on economic affairs is headed by Juan Antonio Garcia Diez, deputy prime minister for economic affairs, and the group on political and administrative matters is headed by Rodolfo Martin Villa, deputy prime minister for political affairs.

Juan Antonio Garcia Diez has told the newspaper DIARIO DE CADIZ that the most appropriate formula for Gibraltar would be the creation of an under governor. The creation of such a figure, he adds, would resolve many of the problems which will be bound to arise in questions of relations between the community of Gibraltar and the surrounding area. Gibraltar is regarded as a military district. The area lies outside of the jurisdiction of the civil governor of Cadiz.

RETRIALS OF TWO ARMY OFFICERS CONCLUDE IN MADRID

[Excerpts] Two counts-martial held at the offices of the military governor of Madrid came to an end just after 1400. One was of Col Alvaro Graino for a letter by him published in DIARIO 16 which the Ministry of Justice considered to be written in terms damaging to the armed forces, the other was against Capt Juan Milans del Bosch y Portoles for having uttered words insulting to the king, which the prosecution regards as an offense insulting the head of state.

These two counts-martial are each being held for the second time. They were held for the first time last October but were afterwards declared invalid by the captain general of Madrid because of procedural errors. This time the prosecution is again calling for 7 months' imprisonment and suspension from duty for Captain Milans. The defense in each case is of the opinion that there was no intention to insult the armed forces in the first case nor to insult the head of state in the second, and as before are calling for free discharge. The tribunal, headed by the military governor of Madrid, has now retired to deliberate.

Receive Prison Sentences

[Text] Here is an urgent newsflash from the EFE agency which we have just received: Sentences in the courts-martial: Colonel Graino has been sentenced to 2 months and 1 day imprisonment for the serious offense of slander against the army. Captain Milans del Bosch has been sentenced to 2 months and 1 day imprisonment for insulting the head of state.

DECISION ON NEW AIRCRAFT TO BE MADE SOON

PM251149 Madrid ABC in Spanish 8 Jan 82 p 11

[Excerpts] Madrid -- "A decision on the plans for the future combat and attack aircraft is very likely to be made in this quarter," EFE has been informed by reliable sources. The program at present awaits a final decision, which will depend on the assessment of the cost effectiveness of the various prices to be quoted by foreign official bodies for aircraft previously shortlisted.

The future combat and attack aircraft program is prompted by the need to replace the U.S. F-5 and F-4 aircraft now in service. Since the first stage concluded with the selection of three types of aircraft, it is currently the F-16 from General Dynamics and the F-18 from Northrop which have the greatest chance of being purchased. "Our current technical and industrial level," military sources told the EFE news agency, "does not make it possible to develop in the aeronautical field the weapons systems necessary for achieving an air force capable of coping statisfactorily with the possible and foreseeable threats." It is asserted in air force military circles that in any event that dependence on foreign weapons sytems will be offset by the promotion of "a considerable number of jobs, and these will also undoubtedly be a major transfer of technology, and the kind of aircraft chosen will not curb the aeronautics and electronics industries."

Koivisto Interviewed

LD261916 Helsinki International Service in Finnish 1529 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Unidentified correspondent's interview with President Mauno Koivisto at the parliament building in Helsinki -- live]

[Excerpt] You have said that in everything important you can support the foreign and domestic political line of your predecessor, Dr Urho Kekkonen. What does this mean in practice?

[Answer] This was said of course, in very general terms, and I mention more precisely what I meant; in other words, the striving to maintain economic growth, cultural and social development and social equality. These are still important matters.

[Question] Dr Koivisto, how would you define Finland's neutrality?

[Answer] Our policy of neutrality is very decisively built on the treaty [of Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance] concluded with the Soviet Union, and this policy has made it possible for Finland to play a greater role in the world than just in our corner of it. Most recently Finland has been able to make its own active contribution in connection with the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. Finland has credibility. Finland and the other neutral and nonaligned countries have their tasks in promoting world peace and understanding among peoples.

[Question] There has been much talk about foreign policy. How, in clear words, do we maintain our good relations, especially with the Soviet Union?

[Answer] Everything is naturally based on trust, the striving to maintain and develop trust. We have a genuine friendship that has developed between our peoples, not just our leaders; we have many common interests and we are conducting a lively trade and lively contacts in other fields. These have been developing constantly.

[Question] You just mentioned the word trust. Your predecessor, President Kekkonen, based his foreign political line very largely on good personal, trustful relations. Does your style differ from this?

[Answer] Not in this respect. The question naturally is whether anyone, after Urho Kekkonen, can achieve such a position either nationally or internationally, whether anyone can be as respected internationally and especially in the Soviet Union as was Urho Kekkonen.

[Question] How are your personal relations with foreign countries, (? including the Soviet Union)?

[Answer] Well there is not much to complain about in them, I hope that they will develop in the future and that I, for my part, will achieve as good personal relations as possible.

[Question] Finland also has traditionally good relations with the Nordic countries. Are they so good that no problems will arise?

[Answer] Naturally, we always have problems. We had problems especially when Sweden drew much of its labor force from us. Now we are in a more equal position. Of course, Norway, thanks to its oil resources, will develop quickly and change the situation with regard to economic relations. We do not yet know what will ensue from developments in Norway, from its strong economic development. But our countries are very similar, we have found it relatively easy to adopt similar positions on most international issues and I believe that relations among the Nordic countries will continue to develop at their own stable rate. There are no big problems in sight, although there are, of course, small problems continuously.

[Question] What kind of initiatives could Finland propose with regard to achieving the much discussed nuclear-free north?

[Answer] Finland has shown great initiative. On the initiative of President Kekkonen, the matter was discussed last year, especially early last year, and the discussion was very lively. Clearly very much depends on the attitude of the Nordic countries, but the big powers also play a very decisive role. It is clear that the attitude of those states that have nuclear weapons, their contribution, to the nuclear-free zones is very important.

[Question] Is there any indication of concrete moves with regard to the nuclear-free north in the very near future?

[Answer] That is unlikely, but discussions are taking place all the time and preparations must be made in the event that concrete steps could be achieved in future.

[Question] During the election campaign there was much talk about increasing development aid considerably. How would you, as president, wish to promote this goal?

[Answer] The question is, above all, one of the use of state funds. I have understood that there is readiness to use state funds -- and readiness in society -- to take on the real burdens resulting from increased development aid. This has emerged, and I believe that development aid will accordingly rise in coming years.

[Question] Turning to domestic policy, in which the president has extensive powers, how do you intend to use these powers, considering the background of your great popularity and the legacy of your predecessor?

[Answer] Well, I have expressed the matter as follows: Very sparingly, I hope that the press will not pressure me to express my views on the work of the government, because this would perhaps mean that the clear will of the parliament would not be realized. (?In my view) the government is essentially to make all decisions. It is very exceptional for the president to have any differing view or words about them.

[Question] However, the press is inclined to pressure people. If this were done, might it have some effect?

[Answer] I think that now it would be reasonable to note that the press has obtained plenty of material recently, and I, too, as head of the government have for my part contributed to the fact that the press has had something to discuss and report. I start from the premise that we should now return to daily work and attention should be paid to what the government does. Now, of course, the formation of the government will be of very great interest.

[Question] I would like to continue with the formation of the government. It will be one of the central issues in the near future. When do you intend to start talks on a government?

[Answer] In the normal way. After the parliament has organized itself, the talks will start. It would, of course, be good to maintain a brisk pace, but on the other hand, there is nothing urgent at the moment. The budget for this year has been settled in good time in the appropriate way; thus there is no desperate hurry. But obviously if a decision does not begin to emerge, the difficulties will grow rather than diminish.

[Question] These government talks will then start next week with the traditional speaker's round?

[Answer] Next week, in the traditional manner.

[Question] The next government will probably be formed on the present basis; this has been noted, but the question of prime minister seems to have become a little more difficult. Is it now quite clear that the prime minister should come from the Center Party, in which direction you, too, have been looking?

[Answer] In my view this is a question on which there is nothing new to say. Perhaps next week will shed more light on the matter.

[Question] Going so far as to propound the theory that the formation of a majority government fails, would this mean the dissolution of the parliament?

[Answer] If it does not appear in a reasonable time -- this means relatively soon -- that a government can be formed, this would obviously result in growing anxiety, as has often been said. As we know, the regular parliamentary elections are due in just over a year, so if a solution is not found quickly, it will be uncertain whether a solution is found at all.

[Question] In other words, as growing anxiety would undoubtedly arise in that situation, what would be your view, if you want to express it, in the event that a majority government cannot be achieved? Will we be faced with the dissolution of the parliament or possibly a minority government and elections at the normal time?

[Answer] This is naturally a very sensitive question on which it is difficult, in this situation, to say much more, but clearly there is now reason seriously to investigate quickly whether a government can be formed. This would be desirable in every way. It is too early to talk about anything else at this state.

[Question] Perhaps it is also too early to speak about the participation of the National Coalition Party at government level. Perhaps this will be decided only after the elections.

[Answer] I expressed my wish before the elections that we could continue on this basis until the parliamentary elections, and then, depending on the results of those elections, examine the matter again.

[Question] Dr Koivisto, are there parties in Finland that you do not wish to see in government?

[Answer] First, I think it appropriate to note that governments are formed here in the following way: The question is which parties are prepared to cooperate, how we can achieve a sufficient majority, which ought to be about two-thirds [word indistinct] in the parliament. In my view this question, the question of eligibility for government, will not arise at all in this connection.

[Question] You are also an economist; it is your special field, as you have already noted. If a very tight spot is encountered, would you, despite your feelings about parliamentarianism, which you have mentioned here -- if there is a very tight spot, do you intend to offer your help, for instance in solving big economic and labor problems?

[Answer] I believe that it is very understandable that I shall very closely observe the management of those affairs that I have chiefly dealt with for such a long time. But I think we must start from the premise that the labor organizations manage their own affairs. It is, of course, often the case that the government takes part, or will regularly take part, but the question is only in which way. The state powers must participate because the state is the country's biggest employer. When civil servants' salaries are decided, the government takes part; usually it takes part at an earlier stage. But the starting point is that the labor organizations manage their affairs without the government trying to tell them what to do, although of course messages are always sent in both directions, and the government manages its own affairs. Naturally the organizations express their own wishes to the government, sometimes [word indistinct] they try too hard to bind the government's financial management in the future.

[Question] In your new post you will undoubtedly need reliable assistants -- and I am not talking about a court -- but how do you intend to prevent yourself from ending up in the solitude of an ivory tower in this high position?

[Answer] I do not believe that this danger exists. But the best adviser of the president is the government.

[Question] Finally, Dr Koivisto, although you are known as a man who does not make big promises, and especially in economic matters tends to present pessimistic views, what do you promise the Finnish people during the next 6 years?

[Answer] In my view we should start from the belief that, although international developments sometimes seem somewhat sad at times, sense will win in the end. We should give importance to the most important matters: that peace should prevail and that relations between nations, especially between the big powers, should develop in a more favorable direction.

We have good conditions for developing our country. Our position is stable, our position is recognized, our economy is on a firm basis, we have a very uniform cultural basis, which keeps us together, we have all the conditions that should allow peaceful economic and social development to continue as in the past.

VIROLAINEN ADDRESSES KOIVISTO, PARLIAMENT

LD271154 Helsinki International Service in Finnish 1000 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Speech by Parliamentary Speaker Johannes Virolainen on the occasion of the inauguration of President Mauno Koivisto at the parliamentary building in Helsinki -- live]

[Text] Mr President:

The majority of electors have elected you as president of Finland for the next 6-year term.

You, Mr President, have now made the solemn vow, required by the constitution, in front of the parliament. On this occasion I wish to convey to you on my own behalf and on behalf of the parliament our respectful greetings now that you are assuming the leadership of the country's affairs in the most responsible office of the republic. I hope that the confidence shown by the citizens in the elections will encourage you in your high office to work for the good of the Finnish people.

You are assuming the office of head of state after Urho Kekkonen, the respected president, who has served for a long time. It is a demanding and challenging task. Your experience as member of the Council of State and your work as prime minister, provide you, Mr President, with good qualifications to implement the policy laid down by your predecessor. We are convinced that successful cooperation will continue between the president and the parliament, with the defense and impartial supervision of the rights of the Finnish people as our goal.

Now that you are assuming your office, our democratic state and our social system are on a stable basis. Finland's international position is secure, and there is internal calm in the country. From this basis we must continue our social construction together and be able to meet the constantly and rapidly changing challenges of our time. Many large and difficult problems are awaiting decisions. Finland's economy is struggling within a worldwide recession. Unemployment is alarmingly high, and especially thousands of young people see their future as uncertain, even hopeless. The government must restore the faith and confidence in the Finnish society and its future.

Work for the solution of the nation's internal problems must not at all reduce our vigilance in those matters that affect the development of our country's international position. The Finnish people have adopted the Paasikivi-Kekkonen line, which is a foreign policy of peace, conciliation and friendship, the firm foundation of which is the Finnish-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance. On this basis we can continue our development safely, even within the current changing conditions of the world. Conscious of the central importance of foreign policy for the success of our small country I believe that the parliament and the entire Finnish nation will give their support for your work as leader of our country's foreign policy.

Mr President, now that you have entered your high office in the service of the fatherland, I convey to you the respectful congratulations of the parliament, and the whole Finnish nation. As representatives of the Finnish nation we will give you our support in your work for raising the spiritual and material culture of our fatherland, for promoting cooperation between nations and for safeguarding world peace. We wish you happiness and success in your important task for the benefit of the Finnish people.

Koivisto Inaugural Speech

LD271210 Helsinki International Service in Finnish 1000 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Speech by President Mauno Koivisto on the occasion of his inauguration at the parliamentary building in Helsinki - live]

[Text] Mr Speaker, esteemed representatives of the Finnish people:

I have now in front of the parliament made the solemn vow in accordance with Article 24 of the Constitution and I am assuming the duties of president for the next term. I am deeply conscious of the responsibility and obligations connected with this high office. To the best of my ability I will deal with the duties of the president, stipulated for him by the constitution, in cooperation with the parliament and the government while enjoying its confidence.

According to the constitution the president decides on the nation's foreign relations. In this sense I consider it my most important task to make sure that our foreign political line, built and mapped out by Presidents J.K. Paasikivi and Urho Kekkonen, will be unconditionally observed. It is most important that the good neighborliness with the Soviet Union, based on the Finnish-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance, will continue to strengthen, that Nordic cooperation will develop on the traditional basis and that our relations with other states remain good. For my part I will do everything possible so that the international respect and confidence enjoyed by our active peaceful policy of neutrality will be preserved and strengthened.

Our democratic social system enjoys the support and confidence of the citizens. In my position as head of state I will, remaining outside and above parties and interest groups, work to the best of my ability as the impartial defender and guardian of the rights of the whole nation, the different social groups and every citizen. The president makes his decisions with the aid of the Council of State, enjoying the confidence of the parliament. For this reason the mutual relations between the president, the parliament and the Council of State must be open, honest and strive for cooperation. This will be my guideline in the office of the president.

Now that I am assuming the office of president I wish, with all my heart and in the name of the nation, to convey to my respected predecessor, President Urho Kekkonen, my warm thanks for the great work he has done for the fatherland. For over 25 years as head of state, he has with a sure and skillful hand guided our realm in a way which has brought us security and internal unity. Urho Kekkonen will remain in the history of our nation as a leader without equal.

Mr Speaker, I thank you for your kind words and congratulations. Esteemed deputies: The internal unity of the nation, mutual respect and esteem are matters that must not be forgotten in political activity. The old proverb says: Know yourself, respect others. Working together and striving for cooperation we can make our fatherland a better, more just and more equal place for every citizen to live. I hope that I will receive from you and from the political group you represent help and support in order to be able to work, according to the best of my ability, for the good of our nation, for the safeguarding of the freedom and independence of our country and for peace and mutual understanding.

PROVINCIAL GOVERNOR LIKELY TO BE PRIME MINISTER

[Tor Hognaes dispatch]

[Excerpt] Helsinki, 20 Jan -- Ahti Karjalainen (Center Party) is being mentioned in preliminary discussions as possible prime minister in the new government after Mauno Koivisto's inauguration as president. However, Center Party sources are unsure whether Karjalainen will become prime minister. It is thought that Koivisto intends to give the post to Provincial Governor Esa Timonen, 57, of the Center Party, who was a minister in the sixties and seventies.

Koivisto knows Timonen from this period and knows that he is held in high regard within the Center Party. Timonen sees himself as an adherent of the so-called K-line [Karjalainen line] within the party, but is not as controversial a figure as Karjalainen. In purely psychological terms it might be a mistake to appoint Karjalainen prime minister, also with regard to the internal conflicts within the Center Party, some observers say. This is why the present finance minister, Ahti Pekkala (Center Party) has been mentioned as a serious alternative. But Pekkala has proven himself to be a talented finance minister and is needed in the post for the drafting of next year's budget.

Next year's budget will be difficult to balance.

No matter what, Koivisto must have a workable government on the same left-center foundation as the present one. For this reason the government must have a strong foreign policy profile. Therefore Koivisto is planning to appoint Social Democratic Party leader Kalevi Sorsa foreign minister. Sorsa is held in high regard in the Soviet Union. He is also known as an active leader of the Socialist International's disarmament group. An old Kekkonen man as prime minister would be further proof that there is no question of any attempt to alter the foreign policy line, which is something that the minority communists are claiming.

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S ADDRESS TO CONGRESS REPORTED

LD270826 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0600 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] The President of the United States, Ronald Reagan, intends to further harden his attitude toward Poland and the Soviet Union. Speaking to the U.S. Congress last night, Reagan said that he would order new sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union if the crisis situation in Poland worsens further. Reagan's speech dealt mainly with economic problems in the United States. He gave special emphasis to his plans to place certain economic obligations of the federal state on to individual states. Reagan promised to make a special speech on foreign policy in the near future. Concerning major power relations he mentioned, however, that the United States intends to maintain good relations with the Soviet Union on the basis of the still gorwing military might of the United States.

SWEDEN

ICA PROGRAM ON POLAND NOT TO BE BROADCAST

PM261555 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 22 Jan 82 p 10

[Kurt Maelarstedt dispatch]

[Excerpt] Washington, 21 Jan -- The USICA Information Service will broadcast a program about Poland to millions of people around the world on 31 January. The ICA chief described the program as "perhaps the biggest show in the history of the world," while critical voices are already speaking of "propaganda." Swedish television has declined to broadcast the program.

"We think that this is in principle a U.S. manifestation which is not without interest but in which we do not want to take part. It is almost a platform for U.S. foreign policy and we are assuming that the program will be reported by our news programs," Swedish TV-2 planning chief Hannes Oluelund told DAGENS NYHETER.

TV-1 planning chief Gunnar Olin said that TV-1 had refused partly because the channel had recently devoted much attention to the Polish crisis by interrupting ordinary scheduled programs for the gala at Stockholm's opera house [charity performance in aid of Poland] and by transmitting a documentary drama about Poland.

DENKTAS: PAPANDREOU VIEW ON CYPRUS 'UNFORTUNATE'

TA261603 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1548 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Lefkosa, 26 Jan (AA) -- President Rauf Denktas of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus has said that it was unfortunate but not a surprise to hear Prime Minister Papandreou talk of Cyprus as an extension of Greece. Reacting to a statement made by the Greek premier after an interview with Greek Cypriot leader Spyros Kiprianou, Denktas said such statements harking back to the idea of enosis would not solve the Cyprus issue. He hoped Greek and Greek Cypriot leaders would refrain from such statements which might destroy the chance for the two communities on the island to coexist under a federal system.

KONUK RESIGNS AS LEADER OF PEOPLE'S PARTY

TA261942 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1930 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Leader of the Democratic People's Party [DPP] Nejat Konuk has resigned from his post. A statement by the DPP administrative council says Konuk offered his resignation from the party in a letter he submitted to the DPP administrative council. In a letter to the chairmanship of the Turkish Cypriot legislative assembly, Konuk stated that henceforth he would serve in the assembly as an independent deputy.

NORTH TO INSIST ON OPENING OF UN ARMS CONTAINERS

[Ziya Akcapar report]

[Excerpt] Nicosia (HURRIYET) -- TFSC Foreign, Interior and Defense Minister Kenan Atakol discussed the question of the "arms theft" yesterday with UN special envoy Hugo Gobbi. In a statement following the meeting, Atakol recalled that TFSC President Denktas invited Gobbi to his office the other day and asked for information on the arms and ammunition that ought to be under the control of the UN peace force. He added: "We discussed this matter with the honorable Gobbi today and asked for detailed information on issues that must be clarified. He answered most of our questions and promised to answer the remainder later. The facts will be disclosed when we receive all the answers to our questions."

In addition, various intelligence organizations are investigating the arms theft. According to initial information received, most of the 10,850 cases of arms and ammunition which are supposed to be under the control of the UN peace force are still in place, but the contents have been removed.

According to reliable Greek Cypriot sources, a large part of the arms and ammunition was stolen during the Greek junta's coup against Makarios in 1974.

It is observed that both the United Nations and the Greek Cypriot authorities are "using this as an excuse" in the hope of mitigating the circumstances.

It is reported that the TFSC is not satified with formal statements and will insist on the opening of all the cases, one by one, to see if the actual quantity of arms stolen at the connivance of these responsible for their safekeeping tallies with the list in the hands of the United Nations and the Turkish Cypriot authorities.

BAYULKEN: NATION WILL DEFEND INTERNATIONAL RIGHTS

[Text] Ankara (THA) -- National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken has stated that "the present legal position cannot be altered by faits accomplis." He was commenting on Greece's efforts to arm the Aegean islands and extend its territorial waters to 12 miles. Bayulken said: "Turkey's moderate stand stems from the fact that it adheres to agreements which are in keeping with international law." Stating that "Turkey believes international treaties cannot be altered unilaterally." Bayulken added: "Turkey has defended and will continue to defend at every forum the rights which international treaties stipulate."

Bayulken stated that it is impossible to believe a report that the TFSC will proclaim independence during the first week of February, and added: "I see no link between the report in question and the current talks and the policy of the Turkish Government."

Referring to the embargo imposed on Turkey by Norway, Bayulken said: "It is impossible to find a logical explanation and interpretation for Norway's behavior. It is incompatible with our bilateral relations and with our cooperation in NATO." As to whether the other Scandinavian countries will follow Norway's example, Bayulken said: "No such situation has arisen as far as our military cooperation with Denmark is concerned. As a matter of fact, we have no important relations concerning military cooperation with the countries in question or important projects to implement."

Bayulken said that work underway between Turkey and the United States, as well as with the FRG, toward the modernization of the Turkish armed forces is satisfactory. He added: "As I have stated at the Consultative Assembly, projects such as the joint efforts with the United States on modernizing our tanks, manufacturing various types of rockets and ammunition, improving our naval installations, constructing new types of warships, and revising our air force are going ahead as planned. As far as the FRG is concerned, work on implementing the agreement signed last year, involving special aid of 600 million marks for the manufacture of Leopard tanks and contributing toward the modernization of Turkey's tanks, is continuing satisfactorily."

Stating that reports about an increase in the number of Turkish troops in Cyprus from 26,000 to 36,000 are untrue, Bayulken made this comment on the official announcement by Greece that it will repair and maintain Soviet auxiliary military and cargo ships: "This matter had come up earlier as well. Previous Greek governments realized that such an agreement is not compatible with NATO relations, and therefore did not implement a similar agreement. It is understood that the new Greek Government is in favor of such an agreement. It is obvious that NATO will evaluate this situation in the same way it has done before."

TURKMEN: EUROPEANS MUST BE REASONABLE, UNBIASED

NC261538 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 22 Jan 82 p 7

[Nilufer Yalcin report]

[Excerpts] Ankara -- Responding to our questions on the latest international developments concerning Turkey, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen stated that "the consultative assembly of the Council of Europe must act in a reasonable, calm and balanced manner on the subject of Turkey's membership." Turkmen said that "the attitude of the EEC toward the fourth financial agreement will soon be taken up at the meeting of the Council of Ministers." He added: "I see no reason why the financial agreement should not be put into operation in 1982."

Turkmen stated that Turkey too will participate in the CSCE meeting in Madrid on 9 February at "foreign ministers level." Commenting on Israeli Defense Minister Sharon's statement that "Israel's strategic defense covers Turkey as well," Turkmen said: "This statement by the Israeli defense minister has no meaning whatever. Turkey's defense problems are not in any way linked with Israel. Israel has no place in Turkey's strategic concepts. If Israel wishes to have a secure defense it should pursue a peaceful policy in the Middle East."

Replying to our question regarding the Madrid conference, Foreign Minister Turkmen said: "As you know, the Soviet Union has announced its opposition to discussing the Polish question at the conference. The Eastern European states are not expected to attend the conference at ministerial level. I can't say what their attitude will be. However, it is obvious they will try to prevent the Polish question from being discussed."

Asked what kind of developments he expected between these organizations and Turkey, Foreign Minister Turkmen replied: "As the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe is a parliamentary organ, it is difficult to guess the nature of the advisory decision it will take on Turkey." Asked whether it is likely that relations between Turkey and the EEC will become normal in 1982, and what the expectations are from the financial agreement, Turkmen said: "As far as I observed in my recent contacts in Europe, the majority of the EEC countries are in favor of developing and maintaining normal relations with Turkey. During my recent contacts in Brussels I observed that our honorable head of state's new year's message has created a very positive effect. But on various pretexts, a small minority tends to block Turkish-EEC cooperation.

I belive this matter will be discussed at the EEC ministerial level. The EEC is feeling the pulse of the ministerial council on the subject of the financial agreement. I see no reason why the financial agreement should not materialize in 1982." Asked if the FRG would be effective in this respect, Turkmen replied: "Federal Germany's attitude will play a significant role. The country has a definite weight in Turkish-European relations."

Council of Europe Draft

TA261715 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] A draft resolution envisaging the continuation of Turkey's membership in the Council of Europe was adopted by the council's political committee. It has been announced that the draft resolution, prepared by Austrian parliamentarian Steiner, will constitute the basis for discussions on Turkey to be held at the plenum of the Council of Europe's consultative assembly. The draft resolution stipulates that in the light of the continuing restoration of democratic institutions, Turkey's membership in the council should continue. The draft is expected to be discussed by the plenum tomorrow before it is submitted for a vote on 28 January.

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT GROUP CONCLUDES WORK, DEPARTS

Meets Labor Leader

TA261615 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1525 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Text] Ankara, 26 Jan (AA) -- Rapporteur of the European Parliament political committee Uwe von Hassel and two MP's accompanying him met President Ibrahim Denizcier of the Turkish Confederation of Labor "Turk-IS" Tuesday. Von Hassel said he had been briefed by Denizcier on the state of the labor unions in Turkey. He believed human rights and labor rights would be well covered in the new Turkish constitution to be drafted.

Denizcier said he had told the EEC parliamentarians Turkey could solve her domestic problems herself, and outside intervention would only make the leaders less flexible. He had also told the visiting MP's Turkey and Europe could not do without one another.

[Text] The European Parliament political committee rapporteur on Turkey, Uwe von Hassel, has left Turkey. Von Hassel, who arrived in Ankara on 24 January, met with head of state Gen Kenan Evren, Consultative Assembly Speaker Sadi Irmak, constitutional committee members, certain ministers and officials of the Turkish Confederation of Labor during his stay in Turkey.

TURKISH-U.S. DEFENSE COOPERATION TALKS CONTINUING

[Text] The Turkish-U.S. defense industry cooperation working group is continuing its work in Ankara. The implementation and further development of projects concerning defense in the economic cooperation agreement signed between Turkey and the United States in 1980 are being discussed at the meeting. The subject of accelerating cooperation between the two countries in the light of Turkey's economic needs is also being taken up.

Michael Lorenzo, U.S. under secretary of defense, who is in Turkey to participate in the third round of meetings of the Turkish-U.S. defense industry group, was received today by the deputy chief of the General Staff, Gen Necdet Oztorun, and the national defense under secretary, Gen Celal Bulutlar, separately before he met with National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken.

In a statement after the talks, Bayulken expressed his belief that the results to be reached at the working group's meetings would benefit both countries. He added that talks were being held in a cordial atmosphere in keeping with the existing links of friendship and alliance between the two countries. Lorenzo said their goal was to reach constructive results in the talks.

The meeting of the Turkish-U.S. working group, which started today, will continue tomorrow. The U.S. delegation headed by Lorenzo will depart Turkey on Saturday.

32 LEFTIST MILITANTS ARRESTED IN ISTANBUL

TA261815 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Summary] A statement by the Istanbul Martial Law Command press and public relations department says that as a result of operations conducted by the security forces, 32 persons belonging to the illegal Turkish Communist Party -- Marxist-Leninist -- Revolutionary People's Unity have been arrested.

The suspects are being accused of killing eight persons, wounding three others, planting bombs in various places, armed robbery and other crimes. The following weapons belonging to the suspects were seized: A Kalashnikov rifle, 6 pistols, and 280 rounds of ammunition.

Death Urged for 5

TA192028 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 19 Jan 82

[Summary] The trial of the 49 members of the illegal Turkish Communist Party Marxist-Leninist Revolutionary People's Unity organization has begun in Adana. The prosecutor at the 2d Military Court of the 6th Corps and Martial Law Command demanded death penalties for five of the suspects. The militants are being tried for murder, assault, armed robbery, engaging in shootouts with security forces and attempting to change the constitutional order by violence.

TCP: EVREN RESPONSIBLE FOR OUTCOME OF DISK TRIAL

TA261152 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 26 Jan 82

[Letter from Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen to Gen Kenan Evren, dated 12 January]

[Text] The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee feels the need to alert you to the murder attempt being made by means of the trial of the 52 officials of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK], who face the death penalty. In this trial, which is being carried out at the 2d Martial Law Court of Istanbul, justice, law and human rights are being mocked before the eyes of the world. State of war regulations, which were not used even against the fascist chief Turkes or against his gang of murderers who shed the blood of thousands of citizens, are now being used against the union leaders. These unionists, who have been brought to the gallows, are being deprived de facto of their right to defense. They are being tried with fascist methods under a dictatorship which has eliminated democratic freedoms and lifted the constitution.

The lives of these 52 unionists are in danger. They face the death penalty only because of their union activities. The prosecutor could not name a single terrorist act with which to accuse the 52 unionists. The activities, strikes and May Day demonstrations by hundreds of thousands of workers are being put forward as crimes. By means of this preposterous pretext and through the 52 unionists, the ruling circles want to eliminate the freedom of the Turkish working class and of the toilers to form unions and to stage strikes to protect their natural rights, their jobs and salaries and to improve their living standard. The trial is not only against the 52 unionists but against the millions of persons who earn their living with their labor.

One accusation leveled against the DISK officials is that there was an organizational link between DISK and the TCP. This is entirely false. There is not the slightest organizational link between our party and DISK or any union affiliated with DISK. However, the workers support our party members because they best defend the working class' interests. From this it can be deduced that the working class is becoming increasingly class conscious and not that there is an organizational link between DISK and the TCP. The truth is that one of the goals of the trial is to portray DISK as an illegal organization. The other goal is to drown democracy in the unions and to eliminate the rights of every worker, regardless of his political views, to become a member of a union and to be elected to the administration of a union. It is to defend fiefdoms within the unions.

The increasing activity of the most reactionary, pro-U.S. and fascist factors within the army since 12 September 1980 has been reflected in the increasing falterings and inconsistent steps of the National Security Council. While neighborliness and cooperation in relation with the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries was mentioned at first, the lie of a Soviet threat was spread. The slogan of preventing terrorism was replaced with the slogan of arresting communists, unionists and patriots.

The plans of the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] to infiltrate the army and stage a coup are being forgotten and are being replaced by the lies that DISK planned to destroy the state. The fascist leaders of NAP are being acquitted one by one and the court sessions on the connections by NAP with the army are being held in camera. What does that show? What sort of bargaining is being conducted between Turkes and your administration to ensure that the NAP associates in the army are not uncovered?

This course of events is gaining more dangerous demensions now that U.S. imperialism is increasing international tension. Those who want Turkey to pull the Reagan administration's war chariot are pointing their attacks toward the working class and its union and political organizations. We see that Ataturkist officers and NCO's within the armed forces are concerned about these developments. The Kemalist circles which at first supported the military junta, which had claimed to be Ataturkist, are now increasingly against this course of events.

The trial of the 52 unionists, who face the death penalty, is a provocation to bring the patriotic sectors of the army face to face with the people. In this way the ruling circles are trying to place the entire army in the service of reactionism in the so-called democratic system of the future. The oppression of thousands of unionists, worker representatives and progressive forces is entirely contrary to the Helsinki agreement, which was signed by the Turkish Republic. Furthermore, our administration, following NATO, leveled accusations at Poland based on the Helsinki agreement. In Poland there is a legitimate government, a working parliament and a valid constitution, not a government that assumed power in a military coup. The legitimate government of that country is taking just measures against the enemies of socialism who are undermining the economy and who brought the country to the brink of civil war with a view to assuming power by force.

Your administration, which released the murderers of thousands of citizens, which wants to punish 52 unionists by death, which arrested tens of thousands of citizens and which banned political parties, is not based on any legal foundation. No, Poland and Turkey are not the same. The defense of human rights in Poland looks like a funny robe on the military dictatorship of Turkey and on the United States and other NATO members that support such dictatorships.

The trial of the 52 unionists, the prosecution of thousands of workers, is causing great anger and hatred among all freedom-loving forces throughout the country. While resisting the barbaric oppression of the military dictatorship, the TCP is not interrupting, and will not interrupt, its struggle against the attacks on DISK and our working class. On behalf of the TCP Central Committee, I believe all honest persons in the country will be on the side of the 52 unionists. This trial is incompatible with our remarks about a return to democracy. A condition for turning these remarks into something other than a maneuver is to free the 52 DISK officials and thousands of patriots who have nothing to do with terrorism, to reopen DISK, to lift the pressures on the Turkish Confederation of Labor, to lift the ban on all political parties except the fascist NAP.

No member of the National Security Council can say he is outside this attempt at murder by claiming that the courts are independent. As chairman of the National Security Council, you cannot rid yourself of the responsibility before the Turkish people for this grave crime. That is why we are warning you once again.

BRIEFS

POPULATION STATISTICS -- Based on the 1980 general census, the State Statistics Institute has announced that of the total population, calculated at 44,736,957, about 22 million are under the age of 19 and half of the latter group is comprised of children under the age of 9. The number of persons over 50 years is about 6 million. [Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Jan 82 TA]

UNIONISTS PLEDGE SOLIDARITY WITH POLISH WORKERS

AU261434 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 26 Jan 82

[Statement by the Austrian Trade Union Federation (OEGB) on the day of solidarity with the Polish workers]

[Text] Vienna -- For over 6 weeks martial law has been in force in Poland. Most leaders of the independent Solidarity trade union are imprisoned. The human and trade union rights are daily being violated in Poland. The OEGB was one of the first trade union movements in Europe which, on 14 December, clearly and resolutely condemned this development.

In view of the forthcoming day of solidarity with the Polish workers on 30 January the OEGB, in agreement with the ICFTU, the World Confederation of Labor and the European Trade Union Federation, renews the demands for: 1) Immediate release of the imprisoned trade unionists; 2) Restoration of the democratic and trade union rights as laid down in the Gdansk agreement and 3) Resumption of negotiations between the government and the freely elected workers representatives.

The political and economic crisis in Poland can only be resolved through readiness for cooperation and not through the dictat of martial law. The OEGB asks the Polish Government to permit entry into Poland for a delegation of the International Labor Office and of the Free Trade Union Movement so that it can acquaint itself with the situation of the Polish workers.

KURDS PERMIT CONTACT WITH KIDNAPPED AUSTRIANS

AU261428 Vienna KURIER in German 26 Jan 82 p 16

[Summary] Late on Sunday evening Ferdinand Hennerbichler, special emissary of the Austrian Foreign Ministry who was dispatched to Iran to try and locate the three Austrians kidnapped by Kurds in Iraq on 25 November, informed the Foreign Ministry by telephone that he had succeeded in establishing contact with the kidnappers and their prisoners. According to his report, he was able to speak by radio with the three men -- Walter Brendinger, 35; Stefan Schmidt, 44; and Otto Stern, 51 -- and they told him that they were all well and waiting to be released.

Johann Plattner, Austrian ambassador in Tehran, told KURIER by telephone that the only problem now was the bad weather prevailing in the Iraqi-Iranian Kurdish region. There is a great deal of snow in the mountains there, and the danger of avalanches and unfavorable weather conditions have made it impossible to date for a helicopter to land at the Kurdish camp that is about 2,500 meters up in the mountains. According to the ambassador, this camp is perfectly safe, but the path down to the valley is not. Under the present conditions, it would take more than 3 days to get down to the valley. The kidnappers have not demanded any ransom, and both the Kurds and the Iranian authorities are interested in effecting the three Austrians' release as quickly as possible. Hennerbichler will stay on in the Iranian-Iraqi border zone for the time being to keep in contact with the camp.

HAIG-GROMYKO TALKS 'GREATLY WELCOMED' BY BONN

LD271520 Hamburg DPA in German 1457 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 27 Jan (DPA) -- The Federal Government has "greatly welcomed" the "broad exchange of views" between U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko in Geneva as a continuation of the dialogue between the two superpowers. This was stressed to newsmen in Bonn today by Government Spokesman Kurt Becker, who said that the Federal Government had been briefed by the U.S. side in great detail on the course of the talks.

SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski called the extensive exchange of views a step in the right direction. "Anyone who, like us, is interested in seeing that there is no further aggravation of international tension because of the tragic events in Poland must strongly support contacts of this sort," he said.

For the FDP the foreign policy spokesman of the Bundestag group, Helmut Schoefer, particularly stressed that despite the tense relations between the superpowers the talks in Geneva had turned out to be very intensive.

WOERNER ASKS SUPPORT FOR REAGAN'S POLICIES

LD271830 Hamburg DPA in German 1651 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 27 Jan (DPA) -- The CDU/CSU has called upon the countries of West Europe to support President Reagan's foreign and security policy. In a statement on this part of Reagan's state of the union message, Deputy Chairman of the CDU/CSU Bundestag group Manfred Woerner said in Bonn today that realism and resolution, combined eith fairness and balance, are a good foundation for a foreign policy -- especially with regard to the USSR. Woerner advised the Federal Government to align its foreign policy more closely to these criteria rather than lapse into compliance and consideration of vociferous minorities. Woerner welcomed the fact that, despite developments in Poland, the United States is still ready for arms control negotiations.

'OFFICIAL' TELEPHONE LINKS WITH POLAND RESUMED

LD271838 Hamburg DPA in German 1743 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Bonn, 27 Jan (DPA) --Telephone communications between the Federal Republic and the Polish People's Republic were resumed "at the official level" on Monday. The Federal Postal Ministry said on enquiry today that for the time being only embassy and consular calls are allowed. Telex traffic, which was resumed in mid-January, is possible only with Polish Government authorities but not with private persons. Since 19 January the Polish postal authorities have again accepted and delivered telegrams. The Federal Ministry points out, however, that delivery cannot be guaranteed.

GENSCHER RECEIVES BULGARIAN FOREIGN MINISTER

[Text] Bonn, 27 Jan (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Genscher today received Bulgarian Foreign Minister Petur Mladenov who is in Bonn for a working visit scheduled to last just under 2 days. German diplomatic circles welcomed this contact as a further opportunity to explain the German attitude the Polish question to a member of an East bloc government.

A private talk with Genscher tonight and dinner at his private residence will be followed tomorrow by talks between the delegations and a call by Mladenov on Chancellor Schmidt. German-Bulgarian relations have been described in Bonn as satisfactory. The Federal Republic is Bulgaria's most important Western trade partner. Even so, trade is capable of further development, it was stated.

Mladenov's visit is in response to Genscher's contacts in the Bulgarian capital last July.

PROTEST LODGED WITH GDR ON JOURNALISTS BAN

LD271304 Hamburg DPA in German 1122 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Excerpts] East Berlin, 27 Jan (DPA) -- Klaus Boelling, head of the FRG permanent representation in East Berlin, today lodged a formal protest with the GDR Foreign Ministry on the ban on Western journalists reporting from a synod. Speaking to newsmen after a talk with Karl Seidel, chief of the department for relations with the FRG, which lasted only 10 minutes, he accused the GDR of deviating from the agreements reached between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Erich Honecker, chairman of the Council of State, which were reached at Werbellinsee in December.

Boelling said that for the first time this had "quite clearly departed from an agreement" between Honecker and Schmidt on the subject of improved working possibilities for journalists. The GDR's decision accorded neither with the spirit nor the letter of the relevant passage in the communique on the Werbellinsee meeting which stressed the "great importance of comprehensive information for relations between the two German states."

The GDR formally rejected the protest but made no comment on the matter.

Boelling expressed to Seidel the expectation that the GDR would correct its decision. He said he assumed that the GDR leaders, like the Federal Government, will do their utmost to preserve in difficult times "that which we positively established at Werbellinsee."

JOINT BORDER COMMISSION BEGINS TALKS 27 JAN

LD271500 Hamburg DPA in German 1417 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] Magdeburg, 27 Jan (DPA) -- The joint border commission of the FRG and the GDR began 2-day consultations in Magdeburg today. Among topics to be discussed at the 59th session of this commission are the maintenance of border waters and flood protection on the Elbe.

PRESS COMMENTS ON REAGAN'S ADDRESS TO CONGRESS

'Superhuman Optimism'

DW281019 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 28 Jan 82 p 3

[Commentary by Washington correspondent signed TER: "Naive Belief"]

[Text] The U.S. budget deficit is supposed to be "less than $100 billion." If the optimist Ronald Reagan is wrong, it could easily grow beyond that mark. It is a fact that enormous budget deficits will continue to exist in the United States for years. Thus it is also a fact that Ronald Reagan has given up one of his projects, namely that of bringing about a balanced national budget.

In almost every other field, Reagan remained loyal to himself. He even disregarded the opinion of important tax advisers in favor of his beliefs, and gave priority to principle. Reducing taxes and getting the economy going is the credo of U.S. doctrine. In his state of the union message, President Reagan rejected any consideration of closing the budget gap the natural way, so to speak, by increasing taxes.

If Reagan had embarked on the way toward higher consumer taxes, people would have pointed to him as someone who had deserted his own cause. Now he is said to be following rigorism. There is certainly some stubborness and obstinancy involved in the decision to stick with a course which has brought about mainly unemployment and recession.

In such a situation, which would have caused other people to turn back fearfully long ago, Reagan is demonstrating almost superhuman optimism. His message says that the upturn will come and that everything will soon be better. His way of thinking is dominated by a naive belief in the ability of a strictly private economic system to regenerate itself. The principle cannot be sacrificed even if the consequence is severity -- not now, not so close to the finish. An increasing number of Americans are beginning to lose their breaths in this "spurt to the finish line."

'Brave Jump Forward' Needed

OW281057 Bonn DIE WELT in German 28 Jan 82 p 2

[Horst-Alexander Siebert commentary: "The Threatening Deficit"]

[Text] Reagan, who was undecided last week, has demonstrated steadfastness in the decisive hour by sticking to his economic program. However, his refusal to have tax increases in such faraway years as 1983 and 1984, which would have in part neutralized the swelling of the defense budget and the enormous tax benefits will turn out to be a great mistake. There is no other way to lower interest rates in the United States, and all other Western countries are also involved because of the United Statesl leading role in the monetary field.

A brave jump forward was necessary because only in such a way can the gloomy inflationary projections be depressed. The White House will be surprised by Wall Street's reaction. It is equally important, however, that without realistic interest rates, the U.S. economy cannot get going. The following threat seems possible: a brief recovery in late summer which will quickly collapse. There is no way to ignore the fact that high deficits create inflation and make money more expensive because of the monetary shortage. The Republicans could very well lose in the elections in November.

Unfortunately, we must say the following: Reagan did not bear in mind the interests of the allied countries and the Third World which is hungry for credits. Some day the administration will have to deal with the problem of to what degree its economic policy is detrimental to other nations.

OFFICIALS DEFEND 'INDEPENDENT' ENERGY POLICY

Mitterrand Comments

LD271308 Paris Domestic Service in French 1200 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Text] At the Council of Ministers there was a commentary on the stir caused by the signing of the French-Soviet contract on Siberian gas. Here are details live from the Elysee from Dominique Souchier:

Yes, I can tell you that tomorrow the premier will set out the French position on this question in the National Assembly. However, without waiting for this report to the National Assembly, the president made a comment in the Council of Ministers. He said that France has embarked on a path from which no one will divert it: building an independent policy. Independence, and the security of France, Francois Mitterrand added, depend on its ability to assume control over its economy, just as it relies on its own defense effort, the respect for its alliances and on the organization of collective security in Europe.

Last, Francois Mitterrand recalled at the Council of Ministers that France's effort on behalf of the Polish people was by far the most substantial among all the nations involved in the struggle for human rights in Poland.

Mermaz Supports

LD272158 [Editorial Report] Paris Domestic Service in French at 1810 GMT 27 January broadcasts "Facing the Public" panel interview of Louis Mermaz, chairman of the National Assembly. Mermaz answers questions put to him by five journalists: Noel-Jean Bergeroux of L'EXPRESS, Francois Jacquemot of L'EST REPUBLICAIN, (Paul Guilbert) of LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS, (Renault Mazur) of French Television and Michel Lemerle of Paris Radio.

Questioned on the French-Soviet gas contract, Mermaz affirms that in his view, the USSR is responsible for the situation in Poland, but he asserts that he does not see how such a contract could have any bearing on the destiny of the Polish people. He points out that among the Western countries, France is giving the most aid to Poland.

Asked whether he thinks that the destiny of the South African people will be changed if France sells arms to South Africa, Mermaz says one cannot compare France's intentions toward South Africa with those of the USSR.

Returning to the subject of the French-Soviet gas contract, Mermaz says: "Now, if we want to reverse Yalta, not only in words, but by deeds, then we must give ourselves the minimum means of power. And a certain number of commercial agreements with countries like the USSR -- allow me to say this to you -- is, after all, one of the ways by which we can rid ourselves of the dictatorship of the dollar. What is the Reagan system doing to help us, given its policy of taxes and interest that it practices and imposes on the countries in the Atlantic zone of influence? And do I have to tell you that the United States has never sold so many goods to the USSR? It is Mr Reagan, who misses no opportunity for saber-rattling, who has considerably increased the deliveries of grain to the USSR, as far as I know."

Mermaz reiterates that France is doing more than any other Western state to help Poland, not only in words but also financially.

"With regard to this French-Soviet gas agreement," Mermaz continues, "the government has taken care to let it be known that if misfortune would have it that there is an aggravation of tension between Poland and the USSR -- let us speak frankly, an armed invasion of Poland by the USSR -- this gas delivery will be broken, this contract will be broken."

CHEYSSON INTERVIEWED ON MIDDLE EAST POLICY

NC271938 Beirut MONDAY MORNING in English 25-31 Jan 82 pp 46-56

[By Mona as-Sa'id]

[Excerpts] French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson said last week that the Camp David agreements will have given all they can give after Israel's withdrawal from Sinai in April and must then be complemented by a "further peace process." He added in a private interview with MONDAY MORNING in Paris: "We feel that if a number of Arab countries agree to turn the Fahd declaration into a proposal and a basis for negotiations, this would represent remarkable progress."

The interview with Cheysson was conducted in English at the Quai d'Orsay on January 20. The full transcript follows:

[Question] Does the postponement of President Mitterrand's visit to Israel after the annexation of the Golan Heights imply a cooling of French-Israeli relations, or was the postponement only meant to avert the anger it would have caused in the Arab world had it gone ahead on schedule?

[Answer] I say no to the second point. As to the first, I think one has to be more enlightened. We want to keep our friendly relations with Israel. We want peace, and our idea of peace is that it will be based on a number of simple principles: the right of the states, including the Israeli state and the state that the Palestinians will establish some day, to live in security; the right of the people to express themselves fully in self-determination, and that includes the establishment of a state, the rejection of any unilateral decision that affects international resolutions or decisions, and the fact that things should result from negotiations.

When Israel or any other state -- in this case Israel, regarding the Knesset law on the Golan Heights -- goes against any of those principles, we denounce it. We condemned this law (on the annexation of the Golan Heights). It is a direct violation of international law. The Israelis are an occupying power in the Syrian territory of the Golan. They had no right to bring this occupied territory under their jurisdiction and administration, so we condemned that action.

But this does not change the fact that we hope there will be peace in the Near East some day, and there can be no peace without Israel. How could there be? Therefore, we feel we should maintain our relations with Israel. We feel we should continue to say the same things in Israel and elsewhere.

We were shocked by that (Knesset) decision. I said that in the first few moments after it became known. We were associated with the condemnation issued by the Ten, and we condemned as a French Government -- the president made a statement about it. And of course, the preparations for the visit of Mitterrand to Israel were suspended.

But now those preparations are being resumed, because we want the visit to take place. We think it can play a useful role. There is a certain authority involved in Mitterrand going to the Middle East and saying in Israel what he said in At-Ta'if, what he said in Paris.

But as the preparations were interrupted for one month, the visit has been delayed for one month. This, however, does not affect our basic position in the Middle East, which includes our relations with Israel.

[Question] So Mr Mitterrand will go to Israel in March despite the fact that the Golan problem has not been settled?

[Answer] Yes, then what? Should we say that because Israel has done something which is unacceptable, which we consider null and void, there will never be peace. If we don't discuss things with Israel, that means that we have no more hope that there can be peace.

There can be no peace without Israel. Therefore, one has to talk to Israel, even when one condemns some of its actions.

[Question] To what extent do you think President Mitterrand's visit to Israel will contribute to the search for peace in the Middle East?

[Answer] We think that what he says has a certain authority, especially if he says it in the region itself, in Israel itself. You have great experience, so you won't be surprised to know that almost every Arab leader I have met has asked me when I am going to Israel and whether and when President Mitterrand will go to Israel and say the same things they heard from me when I met them. And when there is a war, you need two to make peace, and one of the two is Israel.

[Question] But is Israel ready for peace?

[Answer] Well, if it were ready, the peace negotiations would already have started, which is not the case, but we must press them. What else can we do? Sit in a corner and wait? We could do that, of course. That is what most countries in the world do, but during that time, the Lebanese, the Palestinians and others suffer. So we think it would not be honest to simply wait and see.

[Question] France has issued verbal condemnations of the annexation of the Golan Heights, but it has not supported the Arab-sponsored sanctions resolution...

[Answer] We voted for the first Security Council resolution condemning the (Knesset) law, but we cannot vote for a resolution that calls on those specific articles of the charter, because we have never used those articles anywhere in the world.

For us, the expression "sanctions" is a very, very important one. We consider there is only one body in the world which is competent to decide on sanctions, and that body is the Security Council. The General Assembly can recommend, others can talk about it, but the Security Council is the only body in the world which is in a position to decide on sanctions, which would then be obligatory. And so far, never in history has the Security Council decided on sanctions, not even when there was open war.

We consider that the utilization of that specific article of the charter, which calls for sanctions in the event of a threat to world peace, is the most powerful deterrent in existence, and it has never been used so far. We are not ready to use it for the law on the Golan, despite our condemnation of that law. We consider that this law is null and void, should be condemned, should be censured -- put it any way you like -- but we cannot consider it a threat to world peace.

[Question] Most Arabs feel that the opposition to sanctions in this case is tantamount to condoning the annexation. We take it you do not think that feeling is justified?

[Answer] No. We are not approving or condoning what has been done. We simply see that these sanctions, as provided for by the Security Council in the event of a direct threat to peace, do not apply. That's the point.

[Question] After the annexation of the Golan, after the Western opposition to sanctions, after the Syrian warning that Damascus might sign a strategic cooperation agreement with Moscow, and after Syrian Foreign Minister Abd al-Halim Khaddam's recent visit to the USSR, does France feel that Western handling of the situation in the Middle East is pushing Syria into the Soviet camp and facilitating the spread of communist influence in the Middle East?

[Answer] There is no Western handling of the situation in the Middle East. I wonder who is handling what in the Middle East.

I was in Syria myself five months ago and I had long discussions with the foreign minister, who is a friend of the president. They say very clearly that, considering Israel's military power, they are in bad need of military support from the outside, and for them, of course, "outside" is the USSR. So, the fact that relations between Syria and the USSR have been strengthened by the buildup of military power in Israel is not only an argument; it is a reality. But I can't see much Western handling there.

[Question] The Israeli Government has just announced that it is withholding acceptance of European participation in the Sinai force pending further clarification of the EEC's attitude towards the peace process. What would France's attitude be if Israel made its acceptance of French participation conditional on full support for the continuation of the Camp David process or on renunciation of the Venice declaration, including the declaration of support for PLO "association" in the peace talks?

[Answer] Our policy is very clear. Within this policy, we think we can agree to contribute to the Sinai force within the terms which created that force.

That force was created by an Israeli-Egyptian agreement. There are terms of reference in that treaty, in those various documents. We accept those documents which create the force and define its terms of reference. If we participate, we will be bound by those terms of reference, but we will not be bound by the rest (of the terms of the Israeli-Egyptian agreements). We are not signatories of the agreements, and in legal terms, we do not accept more than the terms creating and defining the force.

This is the common position of the four European countries that have offered to contribute to the force. This is the position as blessed by the Ten. As you know, there was a resolution by the Ten recommending that the four states approached should agree to go into the force as defined by those various documents. For the rest, the position of the Ten has been defined progressively: The first important statement on the matter was the Venice declaration, which still holds, of course. And we went beyond the Venice declaration in some respects -- we the French in particular -- because we now call for a Palestinian state, which is not part of the Venice declaration but goes beyond it, and because we have had to add such things as the condemnation of the Golan law, which is not part of the Venice declaration.

But the Venice declaration still holds, along with all the qualifications that were added to it afterward. And if one, two or three of those directly concerned with the Sinai force cannot accept us as we are...well, we can't change that. We are what we are. For the time being, we do not know that Israel has refused our participation. They have sent us a letter, and one of us -- the British -- answered that letter a little while ago. We will see what happens in this exchange. Anyway, there are still many concrete points to be discussed: What will the composition of the force be, when should it arrive, what will the legal status of its members be, etc., etc.

[Question] Is it your impression that Israel's reluctance to accept European participation in the Sinai force is an attempt to delay or block the April 25 Israeli withdrawal from Sinai?

[Answer] We have no indication whatsoever that Israel is anxious to postpone the withdrawal. They know that it would be a breach of the agreement. I have seen the Egyptians more recently than the Israelis, and the Egyptians have made it very clear that they will not accept any postponement and will consider any postponement a breach of the treaty. So for the time being, we have no reason to think that the Israelis will still be in Sinai on April 26.

[Question] But how do you explain the Israeli reluctance to accept European participation? Could it be a sign of an approaching Israeli attempt to delay or abort the April 25 withdrawal?

[Answer] The withdrawal could take place even if we didn't go. We are not alone in that force. The core of the force will be American, and I understand that the Fijians, the Colombians, the Australians, the New Zealanders have agreed to go, so they could do it without us. We offered to go because we were asked. If they change their minds, all right, we shall not go. That would not be dramatic.

[Question] Do you think it will reach that point?

[Answer] No, I don't think so. We have no reason to think they are going to change their minds.

[Question] What would France's attitude be if the withdrawal was postponed or cancelled?

[Answer] I don't see why we should consider this extreme case now, but that would create a very serious situation. As you know, many people have criticized the Camp David process, but we have considered it progress, and one reason why we considered it progress is that it has proved that negotiation between Israel and one of its former enemies is possible. If the treaty produced by the negotiation were to go without implementation, that would mean that this process does not work, and that would be really dramatic. It would show that negotiations between Israel and an Arab state cannot result in the implementation of what has been signed, and that would be a very serious development. But again, for the time being, I see no reason to fear that.

[Question] There have been several reports in the Israeli and international press about Israeli plans to undertake a number of hostile actions before April 25 -- including an attack on south Lebanon, an attack on the Syrian missiles in the Al-Biqa', attacks on the nuclear reactors in Libya and Pakistan, and so on. Do you find these reports credible?

[Answer] Hypotheses. The strange thing in this story is that, from what I have read in the press, these were hypotheses advanced by one of the ambassadors in Tel Aviv, and I really wonder how they leaked to the press, and the leak was, well, deliberate; I also wonder why.

Ten incongruities, I think, were put to us. Why not more? Why not less? I don't know. Let's keep our feet on the ground and wait until something happens, if anything is to happen.

[Question] The so-called "missile crisis" in the Al-Biqa' has been going on for...

[Answer] With no attacks on the missiles until now. That doesn't mean it won't happen, but I just note that it has not happened.

[Question] Israel's war planes flew over the Al-Biqa' yesterday, drawing fire from Syrian SAM batteries for the first time since last year. Does this indicate to you that the crisis is coming to a head?

[Answer] As you said, the same thing happened last year and there was no invasion of the Al-Biqa' and no bombing of the Syrian missiles. This time, it could be like last year and it could be different. I really have no idea.

[Question] In the event of an attack on the south of the Al-Biqa' what would France's reaction be?

[Answer] I cannot answer on the strength of a hypothesis. You could suggest any hypothesis, any guess: The Russians coming in, for instance. Anything can happen. I don't know. We will see if it happens. I hope it won't.

[Question] Mr Klibi told us last week that President Mitterrand had informed him that France would seek to play a bigger role in the search for Middle East peace. What kind of role is France contemplating?

[Answer] It's not that we intend to play a bigger role in the future; we have been trying to play a bigger role since we came to office. I don't think we have devoted more time and attention to any part of the world than we have to the Middle East since last May. We have made more journeys to the Middle East than any other region, and we have met more leaders from the Middle East -- either here in Paris or in the region itself -- than from any other part of the world.

This is because we feel that the continuation of war, cold war and tension in the Middle East is extremely dangerous -- dangerous for the region and therefore for us, but mostly dangerous for the people out there. The people suffer. The Lebanese people are the victims: Every additional month means more death, more hatred, more misery in Lebanon. The Palestinians suffer: They are crushed, they live in camps, they have no homeland and no future, and they don't know when they will have a state.

And the more time passes, the greater the danger that everything will finally be in the hands of the superpowers and that the countries in the region will be no more than objects the future of which will be decided between the two. We would hate to see that happen, for the sake of the people in the Middle East but also for our own sake. Should that happen just next door, we would be very frightened.

[Question] There has been some confusion over your statements in Israel and Egypt regarding Camp David, the Venice declaration and the European peace role in general. Could you clarify these matters to us? For instance, does the EEC consider the Camp David agreements and the so-called autonomy talks an adequate framework for the solution of the Palestinian problem and the achievement of a comprehensive Middle Eastern peace?

[Answer] First, I cannot speak on behalf of the European Community, but still, I know what my partners feel. Among the members of the European Community, I think they considered that Camp David represented progress. But even we who considered and still consider that Camp David represented progress -- we never believed that Camp David was sufficient to establish peace, the main reason being that one of the most difficult problems, which is the future of the Palestinian people, cannot be dealt with by Israel and Egypt alone. Other Arab countries and the Palestinians themselves must be part of that negotiation. The Camp David process, by definition, covers only part of the Middle East; it does not cover all parts of the Middle East, particularly the parts where most of the Palestinians are.

Therefore, we have never thought that Camp David can lead to final peace. We thought that it proved negotiations between two former enemies possible, and we still do. We thought, and we still think, that progress was made when two fighters decided to make peace. We thought, and we still think, that withdrawal from and peace in Sinai represents progress. But we have never thought everything can be dealt with through the Camp David process.

[Question] How would you explain the confusion over your statements on this general subject?

[Answer] There are two reasons. One, that the first quotations of my statement were incomplete, whether that was done on purpose or not I leave to a good journalist to judge.

The second reason is that there was some misunderstanding of my statements, which were possibly not clear enough. I wanted to say that in the Middle East -- as in Central America, Africa or Asia -- we do not consider that we can propose a plan and take an initiative on our own. We would not allow countries that do not belong to Europe to tell us how we should deal with each other as Europeans, and we don't think we should tell countries or people in the Middle East what they should do.

And therefore, I said that there would be no initiative, that we were not going to start any action.

But at the same time, we have always said -- and this interview shows clearly -- that we are ready to enter into any action, to take risks, to give guarantees, to be present, to do whatever is needed, provided those in the region propose it, start it, launch it. The initiative as such should, in our opinion, come from them, but then we would be ready to enter into any action.

Any anyway, we continue to declare, to criticize, to express our opinion. What we stated in Venice was called a declaration, and that was what it was -- a declaration. At the end of that declaration, there is a reference to a European initiative. That initiative has not taken place, and we think it can take place only if it is called for by those concerned in the region. Then, of course, we would be in favor of not only an initiative but action -- European or French or both.

I don't think it is up to countries outside the region to propose a plan. To support a plan, yes; to guarantee it later, yes; but to propose it, no. In our opinion, the value of As-Sadat's initiative lay in the fact that he was a direct fighter against Israel. Had the same initiative been proposed by the prime minister of Denmark or the president of France, it would not have had the same value, because we are not directly involved or directly concerned.

But if an initiative is taken by anyone in the region, or if we are called upon to take it, then I very much hope that we will enter into action. And that action, of course, will be along the lines defined by the Europeans in the last few years -- in the Venice declaration and all the subsequent statements.

[Question] You made a statement about the Fahd plan and Camp David last week which was denied a few hours later...

[Answer] My statement about the Fahd plan was never denied, because it was and remains our opinion. That was not the part that was denied. What was denied was a summary presented by a news agency which quoted me as saying that the Fahd plan is good and the Camp David agreements are dead. I have never said that the Camp David agreements are dead. It would be absurd for us to say that they are dead when it is within their framework that we have offered to send a few doctors and nurses to the Sinai force.

But the part of my statement about the Fahd plan was not denied. My president said in At-Ta'if and we have repeated many times that we consider the Fahd declaration the most ideas that have been put forward [as published]. We don't say that we agree with them completely -- it is not our business to agree or disagree with this or that point anyway -- but we consider that if that declaration becomes a basis for negotiation, great progress will have been made.

[Question] So you are in favor of both Camp David and the Fahd plan...

[Answer] It's not that we are in favor of the Camp David agreements. We did not make those agreements. We consider that they represented progress. I say "represented" because we think that by the end of April they will have given everything they had to give. There must be a further process. We really cannot imagine how Camp David could be enlarged in such a manner as to enable it to address the main problem of the Middle East -- the Palestinian people.

Whatever the procedure, there must be a starting point for negotiations. We feel that if a number of Arab countries agree to turn the Fahd declaration into a proposal and a basis for negotiations, this would represent remarkable progress. But it is up to them; we cannot help in that.

[Question] Does France approve of President Reagan's policy of non-negotiation with the PLO pending public PLO recognition of Israel?

[Answer] To be candid, I don't understand that position. I can't imagine that there will be peace if you don't negotiate with those who are fighting. Does anyone consider that the Palestinians are not fighters? Then one must talk to someone who represents these fighters, and that is the PLO -- who else? Secondly, I don't understand that question of recognition. The PLO is not a state. How can a non-state recognize a state? It makes sense to talk about whether Syria should recognize Israel, but how can an entity like the PLO -- which is not a state, which cannot be a government because it has no territory -- recognize a state? They cannot recognize the U.S., or France, or Israel. That is impossible. So this is a question that I do not understand.

Another question that can be put is: Can there be negotiations with the PLO if the PLO denies Israel's right to exist? That, I would say, is a very serious question. If there are to be negotiations between two parties, each must accept the other's right to exist, and obviously, the day we come to the negotiations, the PLO must be at the table. That day of course, one must ask the PLO if they recognize Israel's right to exist, and if the answer is no, they cannot take part in the negotiations.

But the question is not recognition of Israel as a state. Israel does not need that; it has been recognized by the world community; it exists; it has recognized borders and boundaries. It is Israel's right to exist that could be and should be recognized by the fighters. Finally, suppose the negotiations start, and suppose the PLO is at the table, and suppose the PLO is given the right to build a state. Then, automatically, the PLO recognizes Israel, because if there is peace there is an agreement, and when you sign an agreement with a state, you recognize that state.

So I really do not understand the question of PLO recognition of Israel -- no more than I understand the question of recognizing the PLO, which is not a state and cannot be recognized as a state.

[Question] Is France doing anything to influence U.S. policy on this point?

[Answer] The U.S. is a democracy, and in any democracy, facts tend to become progressively better known. There are more and more voices in the U.S. stressing that there must be discussion with the PLO if there is to be peace in the Middle East. The U.S. Government has not said so yet, although there have been indirect contacts between the PLO and the U.S. Government.

[Question] The failure of the Arab committee to make significant progress towards peace and stability in Lebanon has once more raised the question of an "international solution" with former President Camille Sham'un leading the campaign for international intervention. Do you consider an international attempt to defuse the Lebanese crisis possible -- either at the level of the UN or at a multi-national Western level?

[Answer] We the French always have the same approach: We believe in nothing which is not inspired and decided by the people concerned themselves. Remember what I said about south Lebanon: It is in the hands of the Lebanese Government and of Lebanon's neighbors to have that part of Lebanon protected and returned to Lebanese authority. If they don't decide to take action on the south, how can they do so on the whole of Lebanon?

And if the decision does not come from Lebanon, from the region, we would be very much against international intervention which is decided outside Lebanon and the region. Lebanon is a state. It has authority. It is up to that state, to that authority to express what it wishes.

If Lebanon wishes, in agreement with its neighbors, to have an international force, then yes, there could be a hope there. But the proposal, the initiative, cannot come from the outside.

[Question] What do you think is behind the wave of anti-American terror in Paris?

[Answer] I wish I knew. Is it anti-American? It is true that the two incidents -- one attempted murder and one murder -- were against members of the American Embassy. If this is so, is there a connection with what has happened to American diplomats in Italy, in Belgium? Is there an effort to shoot at American diplomats in Europe to create a feeling of anxiety, possibly the beginning of panic, or to build up tension between the Americans and their allies? It could be, but we don't really know.

Relations With Egypt

NC272222 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1900 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Paris, 27 Jan (MENA) -- French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson has described President Husni Mubarak's forthcoming visit to France as an important event. At a meeting that took place at the Foreign Press Association today Cheysson said in reply to a MENA question that Egypt and France are linked by old and close relations and that Egypt is a state with great dimensions. It has ancient traditions in national issues, and it is natural that France should show interest in it.

Cheysson said that Egypt has an important role which no one can deny. He asked: Which Arab country can ignore such an important role? Cheysson declared that the developments in the area demand that France maintain close relations with Egypt. The desire for peace in the Middle East, he said, prompts us to pay much attention to Egypt in view of its great importance and because it showed through its preparations for and full implementation of the Camp David accords that negotiations are possible, since many had had doubts about the possibility of achieving this between conflicting parties in the Middle East.

Cheysson added: If the Camp David accords achieve total withdrawal from Sinai -- and this is what we hope and this is what prompts us to take risks -- this will prove that negotiations can lead to withdrawal from the occupied territories. This is a joint goal of the two sides, of all those who voted for resolution 242 and the Arab states and the forces represented by the PLO. In other words, Egypt would have proven that negotiations are possible. Cheysson said that despite France's concern at the assassination of the late president, Anwar as-Sadat, President Husni Mubarak has affirmed his authority and followed the way of democracy. This made France very happy and prompted us to support Egypt in its present stability. The French external relations minister said that although the visits of three French ministers to Egypt at the same time -- the defense, external relations and youth ministers -- was a coincidence, they sought to confirm France's close cooperation with Egypt. This will be further supported and confirmed by President Mubarak's visit to France. He added that no such opportunity has availed itself since we came to power.

During the meeting, Cheysson discussed President Francois Mitterrand's forthcoming visit to Israel. He pointed out that the principle of this visit existed before Mitterrand was elected president of the French Republic because he had promised to visit Israel if he were to be elected. Cheysson emphasized in this respect that President Mitterrand will not visit the occupied territories during his visit to Israel but that the president has made it clear that meetings might be held in west Jerusalem.

Cheysson also asserted the importance of negotiations in the Arab-Israeli conflict. He said: I cannot understand those who seek peace but refuse to talk with Israel. I also do not understand those who claim to hope for peace but ignore the existence of a Palestinian people who have the same rights as the other peoples. Cheysson said: Yes, talks must be held with the Israelis and talks with them must take place in their country; also talks must be held with the Arab states in their countries. Talks must be held with the Palestinians who do not as yet have a state or a government but an organization that represents the fighting forces, namely the PLO. Therefore, talks must be held with the organization. This matter is clear and I wonder what sane person can deny this.

GENERAL DOZIER FREED: FIVE TERRORISTS ARRESTED

[Excerpts] Rome, 28 Jan (AFP) -- Italian police freed kidnapped United States General James Dozier today, arresting five terrorists who were guarding him in an apartment in Padua, northern Italy. ANSA news agency and Italian radio said that a commando of Italy's CIGOS elite police corps had stormed the apartment.

Gen Dozier is the highest ranking American officer with North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) forces in Europe, as deputy commander of NATO forces in southern Europe. He was kidnapped on December 17 from his home in the northeast town of Verona by a seven man commando. The kidnapping was soon claimed by the leftist terrorist organization the Red Brigades.

Police described General Dozier's health as "quite good." He was still at police headquarters in Padua.

In the Italian Parliament, members broke into prolonged applause when House Speaker Maria Eletta Marini announced that the general had been freed.

General Dozier was released at about 1030 GMT, police said. The flat where he was held is located in a building in the historical centre of Padua some 80 km (50 miles) from Verona.

According to Italian television, police pinpointed the terrorist hideout last night. The release operation was carried out by the police special intervention squad known as the "Leatherheads."

Dozier in U.S. Hospital

[Text] Rome, 28 Jan (AFP) -- U.S. General James Dozier, freed by Italian police today after six weeks captivity at the hands of the Red Brigades terrorist group, was admitted into an American military hospital in Vicenza, the U.S. ambassador to Italy said. Ambassador Maxwell Rabb told a news conference here that General Dozier had been placed under medical observation for an indefinite period at the Camp Ederle base in northern Italy. Mr Rabb asked the press to respect the privacy of the general and his family.

Earlier Rumors on Release

[Text] Rome, 28 Jan (AFP) -- General James Lee Dozier, the deputy commander of NATO forces in southern Europe kidnapped by Red Brigades extremists on December 17, could be released very shortly, according to Italian newspapers today. The daily LA REPUBBLICA said rumours had circulated last night in Verona, the northeast Italian city where he was seized, concerning payment of a 9.8 million dollar ransom for his release.

Newspapers referred to optimism among investigators in Verona, and among American diplomats. Observers here recalled, however, that the fifth Red Brigades communique on the kidnapping, found Monday in Rome and Padua did not hint at any possible early release. On the contrary, the tough wording said the working class had "nothing to negotiate" with the bourgeoisie.

Friends of Gen Dozier have offered a reward of around two million U.S. dollars to anyone helping to find him alive.

ENI ANNOUNCES NATURAL GAS AGREEMENT WITH USSR

AU280832 Rome ANSA in English 0817 GMT 28 Jan 82

[Text] Rome, 28 Jan (ANSA) -- An agreement covering technical and economic aspects of Siberian natural gas supplies for Italy was announced last night by the Italian State Ente Nazionale Idrocarburi (ENI), the national energy agency. The ENI communique, which sparked sharp reactions from the ministries for Foreign Trade and State Participation industries, reported that "the technical-economic understanding reached has been submitted for evaluation to the Italian Government responsible for authorizing the formal conclusion of the contract" with the Soviet Union.

The note was responded to by a Foreign Trade Ministry statement which declared that, "No one can think of leaping over the government in this phase by carrying out a fait accompli policy." The State Participation industries minister, responsible for ENI, issued a note which affirmed that, "there has been no conclusion to the negotiations underway between ENI and the Soviet authorities involved."

In the wake of developments in Poland and discussions in Western governments on the prospects of applying economic sanctions against the Soviet Union, the Italian Government has adopted the stance of a "pause for reflection" on the matter of buying Siberian natural gas from the Soviets and involvement in the pipeline project for pumping the gas to Western Europe.

Government Withholds Approval

[Text] The National Hydrocarbons Board has reached agreement with the Soviet Union on the Siberian gas pipeline, but the government has not yet given the green light to the operation. There has been a number of statements and explanations on this announcement this evening. Senator Chiaromonte, addressing a Communist Party meeting on state shareholding, said he learned that an agreement was reached yesterday at the technical level. Immediately afterwards the Socialist Party's economic office stated that any technical agreement referred to by Chiaromonte would not alter the situation, since the need remains to abide by the pause for reflection called for recently by Spadolini before political ratification by the government.

The Ministry of State Participation pointed out that only a number of technical points had been examined in depth, but subsequently the National Hydrocarbons Board issued an official note stating that it has reached technical and economic agreement on the supply of Siberian gas to Italy, which could entail some 8 billion cubic meters per annum at a price similar to that agreed to by the Germans and the French. Now it is up to the government to authorize the formal conclusion of the contract. Finally the Ministry of Foreign Trade pointed out that the decision rests with the government and no one can bypass it by a policy of fait accompli. The pause for reflection therefore remains valid.

ALGERIA'S BEN YAHIA MEETS WITH COLOMBO, SPADOLINI

LD272226 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 27 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Algerian Foreign Minister Ben Yahia is in Rome on a 3-day visit. During a meeting with his Italian counterpart, Colombo, both sides expressed their wish to reach agreement on the problem of supply of Algerian gas. Colombo said the question was discussed in an open and constructive spirit.

After his meeting with Colombo, the Algerian minister conferred with the prime minister. Spadolini confirmed the commitment of the Italian Government to eliminating the causes of tension in the Mediterranean and to promoting peace and security in the area.

As to the crisis in the Middle East, Spadolini emphasized the determination of the Italian Government to promote the relaunching of negotiations between the parties concerned with special attention to bilateral relations, and both sides stressed their desire to work toward their development in all sectors. In this context the discussion went on to the question of the price of Algerian gas.

DEFENSE MINISTRY DELEGATION TO VISIT BEIJING

[Text] Rome, 27 Jan (ANSA) -- A delegation from the Italian Defense Ministry will go to Beijing at the beginning of February, official sources announced here today. The mission, to be led by General Giuseppe Piovano, the ministry's chief secretary and national armaments director, will prepare for the upcoming official visit to China of Italian Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio, a socialist.

FRENCH PRESIDENT MITTERRAND TO VISIT IN SPRING

[Text] Paris, 27 Jan (ANSA) -- French head-of-state Francois Mitterrand will make an official visit to Italy at the end of February or the beginning of March, according to officials here today. Generally reliable sources said that Mitterrand would come to Rome after the Franco-German summit set for February 23 and 24 and prior to his trip to Israel from March 3 to 5. He will be accompanied by numerous ministers to put into practice his expressed desire last month to hold consultations with all the European Economic Community partners. At least for the time being, however, high-level contacts between France and Italy will not be set up on a regular basis as they are between France and West Germany.

During Mitterrand's visit to Rome he will also be received by Pope John Paul II in Vatican City. French diplomatic circles also revealed that Italian head of state Sandro Pertini is expected to make an official visit to France in April.

CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATS HOLD COUNCIL SESSION 22 JAN

AU231438 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 23 Jan 82

[Excerpt] Rome, 23 Jan (ANSA) -- The Italian political scene is dominated today by the national council meeting of the relative majority Christian Democratic [DC] party.

The sessions began here yesterday in what can only be described as a state of seige after discovery of terrorist plans to attach the building with rockets and bazookas led to massive security measures throughout the area.

In his keynote speech, DC Secretary Flaminio Piccoli said that seven points were up for discussion and that among the most important were those having to do with reform of the party's statute and the setting of a date for the party congress which is to be held in Bari no later than April. Piccoli said that even if there were a government crisis this would in no way delay the congress opening.

Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani urged his listeners to be more pragmatic and adopt proposals that would simplify matters at hand, especially with regard to statute modifications.

In a reference to the terrorist plans to assault the building and to massacre participants in the DC council, party President Arnaldo Forlani said that Christian Democrats had always been in the front line of defense of the nation's institutions. No threat nor sacrifice could crack the DC's commitment to the Italian people to fight for democratic values and freedoms, he said. He said that the country had entered a decisive stage in the battle to wipe out plots and crimes perpetrated by "the enemies of democracy." The blood of so many victims calls for maximum resoluteness from the state and all the country's democratic forces in combating terrorism, Forlani stated.
